THE ISLAMIC TEXTS SOCIETY

Preface

THE PART OF THE world in which Islam grew up is renowned for possessing the oldest legal systems known in recorded history, and Islamic law, more than a millenium old, is relatively new in comparison with other systems. In Islamic legal theory the law preceded society and is considered to be as eternal as God. Tradition has it that God revealed himself through a divine law, communicated to men by His Prophets, either written by God's own finger on tablets made of stone, or sent down to the nearest Heaven to be available for revelation by Ángel Gabriel.

Originating from so high a source, law always held a paramount place in the eyes of peoples who lived under divine guidance. It is no wonder that the prestige of the divine law among peoples in that world is without parallel in history. For the law was not only founded on religion and sanctioned by God, but in it the whole spirit of the faith may be said to be epitomized.

Islamic law has preserved its basic character since its formative period. In modern times the greatest challenge has come from the West, and Islamic law is bound to feel the impact. Many a Muslim country has adopted legal concepts from abroad without regard to their suitability for the social milieu. Muslim and Western legal systems have often operated side by side and conflicts between them have been inevitable. But the new law has not been able to command the respect of the public nor has the old law met the necessities of modern life. However, the advocates of the traditional system have had little to offer in the way of a constructive legal reform which might adapt Islamic law to modern conditions of life. In the second and third decades of the twentieth century critics of the two systems keenly felt that the widening gulf between them should be bridged.

Following World War II a revival in the study of Islamic law set in, stemming partly from the rise of several Islamic countries to statehood. Some of the new states stressed the Islamic creed, and the older states declared Islamic law to be a source of legislation. The most constructive approach to modernizing Islamic law is reflected in the new civil codes, notably in the law of contract and property, which Dr. 'Abd al-Razzāq al-Sanhūrī has drafted for Egypt, Syria, 'Irāq, and Libya. As a result, a growing interest in the study of Islamic jurisprudence has become noticeable in the Muslim world, in an effort to gain a deeper understanding of the nature of legal reform.

The Muslim world today is facing a problem of legislation not unlike that which faced it in the first two centuries of its existence. During that time Islam expanded rapidly and absorbed new elements of culture and tradition. As a result, the Muslim world abounded in legal doctrines, the advocates of each vying for supremacy over the others. It was Shāfi'ī who provided in the ninth century of the Christian era a systematic legal method by which to synthesize the various legal doctrines into a coherent system. A thorough study of that system will explain how legal problems were resolved in the formative period as well as the approach and the method of reasoning employed in their solution. It is impossible to understand the implications and the trends in modern Islamic legal reforms without an appreciation of the nature and development of classical Islamic jurisprudence.

I have been assisted by important suggestions and comments made on the work as a whole or in part. I should like to thank in particular Shaykh Muḥammad Abū Zahra and Dr. 'Abd al-Ḥalīm al-Najjār for their valuable assistance, and Dr. 'Abd al-Razzāq al-Sanhūrī and Dr. Chafīk Cheḡara for helpful suggestions. Comments on one part of the work or another have been gratefully received from Sir Hamilton Gibb, Emil Lang, Nabia Abbott, Leo Strauss, and Marshall G. D. Hodgson. Above all I should like to thank Edwin E. Calverley and Harold Glidden for their invaluable assistance and suggestions. Finally, I wish to acknowledge the aid given by the School of Advanced International Studies of The Johns Hopkins University, and the grant extended by the Rockefeller Foundation, which enabled me in 1958 to work in Cairo and Damascus on manuscripts and other works connected with this study. None of these persons and institutions, however, is responsible for any errors which may be found in the volume or for the views expressed in it.

Translator's Introduction

THE HISTORICAL BACKGROUND OF THE RISĀLA

Islamic Jurisprudence before Shāfi'i

LAW IS A SYSTEM of social control established for the purpose of maintaining an ordered society among men. Different societies develop different legal systems, but every matured system reveals the ways in which the society from which it sprang endeavors to protect what it honors. Islamic law, the product of Islam's centuries of stored experience, is the embodiment of the Islamic ideal life. It is the framework of Islam itself. For although religion describes what the ideal life should be, the law indicates the right road to follow (indeed the term sharī'a bears this meaning) in order to arrive at the ideal life. Thus the law of Islam, the sharī'a, has the character of a religious obligation; at the same time it constitutes a political sanction of religion. As a consequence, the sharī'a has greater practical importance to Muslims than the creed, and its study is ranked higher than a supererogatory prayer by Shāfi'i, the founder of a school of law and the author of the Risāla.

In Islamic legal theory the sharī'a is derived from a high divine source, embodying God's will and justice. Unlike positive law, it is regarded as the ideal legal order; but, like positive law, it mirrors the character of the society in which it developed. The idealization of the shari'a as the perfect legal system was the product of legal speculation which occupied the minds of jurists for generations; but the one who for the first time laid down a systematic legal reasoning for such an idealization was Muḥammad b. Idris al-Shāfi'ī. The impress of his systematic method, which has never been superseded in Islam, has remained permanent.

In what circumstances did Shāfi'ī develop his system?

The Founder of Islam, whose main preoccupation was with religious reform, had, perhaps, little reason to alter the sunna, the customary law prevailing in Arabia.¹ Muḥammad's opponents argued, however—not without good reason—that he had violated the established law of the land. Notwithstanding Muḥammad's reiteration that he merely intended to replace false idols by Allāh, the repudiation of idolatry itself implied the violation of the sunna, since idolatry was part of the customary law of Arabia. Law and religion were so closely intertwined in primitive societies that an attack on religion was a violation of law at the same time. Muḥammad's call to abandon idolatry in favor of the Deity resulted inevitably in the establishment of the supremacy of God's law—as communicated in the Qur'ān—over "idolatrous" law. Thus the Qur'ān became the basic source of legislation. The sunna, though it continued to supply raw material for legislation, took second place in the eyes of the Muslim community.

Muḥammad's death, though coinciding with the sudden expansion of Islam, brought prophetic legislation to an end.² The administrative decrees issued by the early caliphs (successors to Muḥammad) supplied answers to many legal problems; but disputes and legal questions relating to purely local matters were bound to be settled on the basis of the custom and precedent of each locality. Tribal customary law existed in Arabia before Islam, just as laws and customs in Syria and 'Irāq were inherited from earlier civilizations. Roman (Byzantine) and Persian (Sasanian), to say nothing of earlier Babylonian and Aramaic, laws must have supplied the Muslim jurist with raw material on the strength of which he issued opinion whenever an authoritative text failed to provide an answer.³

Several centers for legal study developed, stemming from local differences in legal traditions and social conditions, but the two principal centers which radiated their influence to other parts of the empire were those of 'Irāq (Kūfa and Baṣra) and the Ḥijāz (Madīna and Makka). The 'Irāqī jurists seem to have won the reputation of exercising personal reasoning more than the Ḥijāzī jurists, and Abū Ḥanīfa (d. 150/767), founder of a school of law, as well as his followers were credited with the liberal use of analogy as the basis for their legal reasoning. Abū Ḥanīfa's method of reasoning, reputed to have been applied more extensively than those of other jurists, was in fact the common method used by the 'Irāqī jurists, while the Ḥijāzī jurists, who claimed to follow the tradition more consistently, actually used personal reasoning no less than their 'Irāqī contemporaries. The Ḥanafī jurists in fact paid more attention to traditions than their contemporary critics claimed despite their reputation that they were unacquainted with these traditions. Opinions of early 'Irāqī jurists, such as Ibrāhīm al-Nakha'ī (d. 95/713) or Ḥammād b. Abī Sulaymān (d. 120/737) were invoked on the strength of traditions traced back to the Prophet Muḥammad through a transmitter like Ibn Mas'ūd or Caliph 'Alī.⁴ These traditions may have included the sunna of the Prophet as well as traditions from his Companions. But the attempt to justify the adoption of local custom on the strength of traditions was as much a recognition of the overriding authority of an authoritative text as it was an unconscious effort to Islamize the developing body of law in the newly conquered territory.

The re-assertion of the sunna after Muḥammad's death was probably more visible in the Hījāz than elsewhere. For in Arabia it was customary that the sunna, whether laid down by forefathers or by an individual of some weight, should be binding on the community. When Muḥammad first introduced Islam, he was denounced as the violator of the sunna for attacking traditional idolatry. But when Islam was established, the Prophet as the spokesman of the community was cited to provide guidance for legal decisions. After his death Muḥammad's sayings and decisions became precedents on the strength of which jurists made decisions. These precedents constituted the sunna of the Prophet and provided the substance of traditions.⁵

Against such a background the Hījāzī jurists could claim that their school represented the school of tradition. They resided in the cradle of Islam, where the sunna was better known, and they set forth the doctrine that the sunna was an overriding authoritative source. Thus the Mālikī school, known as the school of tradition, claimed that its legal opinion represented the Islamic tradition more closely than the Ḥanafī school. It criticized the 'Irāqī jurists for their use of personal opinion and analogy on the grounds that their knowledge of the Prophet's sunna was palpably lacking. However, a close examination of Mālik's opinions indicates that he made use of prudence," in M. Khadduri and H. J. Liebesny (eds.), Law in the Middle East (Washington, D. C., 1955), Vol. I, pp. 45-46.

personal opinion no less than his Ḥanafī contemporaries. One may even discern that Mālik had departed from the Prophet's sunna in favor of personal opinion. A case in point is Mālik's insistence that a contract, once concluded by an offer and acceptance, regardless of the khiyār al-majlis (right of option of the parties to a contract as long as they have not separated), was binding on the two parties.⁶ Mālik's opinion was based on local practice; but sound though it may seem from a legal viewpoint, it conflicted with the doctrine of the Mālikī school that the authority of tradition was always overriding.⁷

The place occupied by Shāfi'ī in Islamic legal history is determined largely by the character of the age in which he lived. In a later age, once the gate of ijtihād (personal reasoning) had closed, he would have been a great jurist with a moderate view as to the development of the law. But in his age a great jurist was necessarily drawn into ikhtilāf (disagreement), or the controversy between the schools of tradition and personal opinion. What was to be the position of tradition in relation to the Qur'ān and other sources of the law? What was to be the position of opinion and analogy in relation to the Qur'ān and tradition? At a time when scholars were raising such questions, a man profoundly learned in the tradition, and passionately convinced of its significance, was compelled to take part in the controversy between the advocates of tradition and the advocates of opinion in order to defend the former's claim to supremacy. At first, Shāfi'ī aroused those in favor of tradition, giving them leadership and supplying methods of defense against the advocates of opinion. Later on, after settling in Egypt, Shāfi'ī seems to have felt more strongly the need to strike a balance between the two schools of thought, and he sought to find a common ground of agreement.

⁷ The tradition concerning khiyār al-majlis, however, might have been circulated after Mālik's death. See J. Schacht, Origins of Muhammadan Jurisprudence (Oxford, 1950), pp. 159-60.

Shāfi'i's Life

It was in this milieu that Shāfi'i played so significant a role in resolving the conflict between the two schools of law. Growing up in the Ḥijāz, the home of tradition, he became a follower of Mālik and then went to 'Irāq, where he was exposed to the legal reasoning of the 'Irāqī jurists. In the latter part of his life, in Egypt, where he could reformulate his legal opinions with detachment and rewrite his books, he founded a new school of law by synthesizing the two other schools. Shāfi'i's career falls, therefore, into three well-marked periods. The first, the period of apprenticeship, begins with his study of the law in Makka and Madīna, where he was given a thorough training in the traditions, and extends to his deportation to 'Irāq. The second, in which he was exposed to the legal reasoning of the 'Irāqī jurists, ends with his departure for Egypt; and the third lasts from his settlement in Egypt, where he became the "master," to his death.

A number of biographical accounts of Shāfi'i have come down to us, although the very earliest are apparently lost. Even in biographical sketches written by Dāwūd al-Zāhirī (d. 270/884) and Zakariya b. Yahya al-Sājī (d. 307/920), reproduced in later accounts, a great deal of legend had already crept into the story of Shāfi'i's life. The chronology presents great difficulties, as the conflicting narratives about Shāfi'i's visits to 'Irāq and his return to Madīna indicate.

The biographical account by Abū Muḥammad 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. Abī Ḥatīm al-Rāzī (d. 327/938) is the earliest that has reached us.⁸ Rāzī's work is scarcely more than a collection of oral reports dealing with certain aspects of Shāfi'i's life and character, some of them reproduced from earlier biographical sketches such as those of al-Zāhirī and al-Sājī. But this source is quite inadequate as a complete account. Later writers, who dealt more fully with the subject, have often drawn heavily on Rāzī's biography and have reproduced many of the legends that had gathered around Shāfi'i's life. The great works of Abū Nu'aym⁹ and al-Khaṭīb al-Baghdādī¹⁰ add very little to Rāzī's account. The first full story is given by al-Bayhaqī (d. 458/1065)¹¹ and reproduced in a well-organized and attractive manner by al-Fakhr al-Rāzī;¹² inevitably, it includes a great deal of legend. Later biographers, notably Ibn 'Abd al-Barr,¹³ Subkī,¹⁴ Ibn Ḥajar,¹⁵ and Nawawī,¹⁶ add but little to earlier accounts. More recent sketches by Ibn Kathīr¹⁷ and Murtaḍa al-Zabīdī,¹⁸ draw heavily on earlier authorities. There are also several unpublished biographical accounts¹⁹ which add practically nothing new. A full critical study of Shāfi'i's life has not yet been written.²⁰

The earliest authorities disagree as to whether Shāfi'i was born at Gaza, a small provincial town on the Mediterranean Sea, or at 'Asqalān (Askelon), a larger town not far away, in the year 150/767.²¹ Probably Shāfi'i's mother, shortly after Shāfi'i's father died, spent some time in Palestine among the Yamanite tribes—to whom her ancestors (the Azd tribe) belonged—before she and her son arrived at Makka, for the authorities state that Shāfi'i was scarcely two years old when he left Gaza, but that he had reached his tenth year when he arrived at Makka.²² We know little about Shāfi'i's early life, except that he was brought up in Makka in poor circumstances and that from his youth he was devoted to learning. Traditional stories, legendary for the most part, give an account of his early devotion to poetry, chivalry, and legal studies. Such traditions have him learning the Qur'ān by heart at the age of seven, committing Mālik's al-Muwatta' to memory at the age of ten, and being declared fit to give legal opinions at the age of fifteen.²³

Certain facts about his parentage may conceivably have affected the future course of his life.²⁴ His father belonged to the tribe of Quraysh, the tribe of the Prophet Muḥammad, and his grandfather al-Muṭṭalib was a brother of Muḥammad's grandfather. The descendants of al-Muṭṭalib took an active part, on both sides, in the struggle between Muḥammad and the Makkans, but they all supported Muḥammad after his first victory at Badr in 2/624. This history may have given Shāfi'i prestige, arising from his belonging to the tribe of the Prophet and from his great grandfather's kinship to the Prophet. It also may have inspired him with the idea that to him was bequeathed the mantle of the Prophet's tradition and that he should stand to defend it. These facts made him, like other descendants of the same clan, a beneficiary of the Prophet's share of one-fifth of the spoils of war.²⁵

After spending some time among the Beduins, Shāfi'ī returned to Makka to study law under Muslim b. Khālid al-Zanjī (d. 180/796), Muftī of Makka, Sufyān b. 'Uyayna (d. 198/813), and others.²⁶ Although he was declared qualified to practice law by al-Zanjī, Shāfi'ī desired further legal training and set out to study under the leading jurist of the Hijāz, Mālik b. Anas (d. 179/796). He was probably twenty years old when he left Makka for Madīna.

There are several accounts of how Shāfi'ī became the disciple of Mālik. The traditional story is that he went to the Governor of Madīna, armed with a letter of introduction from the Governor of Makka, and requested an audience with Mālik. After some hesitation, the Governor made his way to Mālik's house in the company of Shāfi'ī. Mālik seems to have been impressed by Shāfi'ī's intelligence, and he allowed him to read al-Muwaṭṭa' under his guidance. As a follower of Mālik, Shāfi'ī remained in Madīna until Mālik's death, by which time he had already gained distinction as a brilliant jurist.²⁷

Shāfi'ī had the good fortune to attract the attention of the Governor of al-Yaman, who was on a visit to the Hijāz, and who was impressed by his learning and industry. He helped Shāfi'ī to enter the service of the state at about the age of thirty and to rise rapidly in it. This service was short-lived, however. Shāfi'ī proved to be a just administrator, but he was soon entangled with local interests and factional jealousies, which brought him not merely dismissal from his post but also deportation in chains to 'Irāq, on the alleged charge that he was a secret follower of the Zaydī Imām Yahya b. 'Abd-Allāh, a pretender to the caliphate and an opponent of the ruling dynasty in Baghdād.²⁸

Shāfi'i appeared before Caliph Harūn al-Rashīd at al-Raqqā ('Irāq) with other conspirators in 187/803. The other conspirators were put to death, but he was pardoned when he eloquently defended his loyalty to the caliph on the ground that he was the descendant of a great grandfather who was related to the great grandfather of the caliph himself. Some authorities state that the famous Ḥanafī jurist, Muḥammad b. al-Ḥasan al-Shaybānī (d. 189/805), who was present at the court when Shāfi'i appeared before the caliph, defended him and said that he was a well-known student of the sacred law.²⁹ Most authorities agree that the caliph was delighted with Shāfi'i's conversation and became his patron.³⁰ This incident brought Shāfi'i into close contact with Shaybānī, whose books he had copied, and impelled him to devote the rest of his career to legal studies, never again to seek government service.

The contact with Shaybānī's circle had a great impact on Shāfi'i's legal reasoning. Until that point, as a follower of Mālik, he had been exposed to the teaching of only one school of law. He had, it is true, known of the opinions and arguments of the 'Irāqī jurists, but he had not heard them at first hand. We are told that he took an active part with Ḥanafī jurists in discourses and arguments, that he strenuously defended Mālik's position, and that he seems to have earned the reputation of being the Upholder of Traditions for his efforts to establish the supremacy of traditions.³¹ But those discussions must have made him aware of the weaknesses of the Mālikī school, which Shāfi'ī began to appreciate after settling in Egypt, as well as the points of strength in the legal reasoning of the 'Irāqī jurists. Some authorities stress the difficulties encountered by him in his arguments with the Ḥanafī jurists, and one declares that Shāfi'ī was driven out of 'Irāq by them.³² Most authorities, however, believe that Ḥanafī followers complained to Shaybānī of Shāfi'ī's criticism, but that Shāfi'ī, though avoiding a stand against Shaybānī directly, determined to stand on his own in his legal reasoning. Some authorities state that Shaybānī, upon hearing the complaints of his followers, invited Shāfi'ī to a debate on the points of difference between them;³³ they also state that Shāfi'ī emerged triumphant over Shaybānī, although Ḥanafī sources insist that Shāfi'ī was defeated.³⁴ These circumstances must have been difficult for Shāfi'ī, who, as protégé of Shaybānī, may have tried honestly to avoid an open conflict with him, as some authorities indicate.³⁵ Nor was Shāfi'ī's position strong enough to take an open position against Shaybānī, an influential man at the court, and his followers.

This uncomfortable situation must have influenced Shāfi'ī in the decision to leave 'Irāq in 188/804 and to settle elsewhere. He went via Ḥarrān and Syria to Makka, where he had begun his early legal studies. As a disciple of Mālik, he was well received and began to lecture at the Sacred Mosque. His teachings, however, revealed unexpected differences with Mālik, for his thorough grasp of the Mālikī and Ḥanafī legal opinions made him aware of the shortcomings of both. He made a deep impression on many students of law, including Aḥmad b. Ḥanbal (d. 241/855), who was studying in Makka at that time, but his influence in the Ḥijāz must have been limited. His departure from Mālik's opinions disappointed

Shāfi'ī returned to Baghdād in 194/810. His legal reasoning had matured, and his stature as a jurist had grown sufficiently to permit him to follow an independent line of legal speculation. It was during this period that he accumulated the material for the legal system that was destined to leave so deep a mark upon Muslim law. After a span of three or four years, Shāfi'ī decided to leave Baghdād for Egypt. It is not quite clear why he made this decision. The authorities state that while in Baghdād he attached himself to 'Abd-Allāh b. Mūsa, who invited him to settle in Egypt. We are told that the Caliph al-Ma'mūn (d. 218/833) offered him the position of a judge, but he declined it.⁸⁷

Shāfi'ī's departure from 'Irāq took place in 198/814. It was the same year that the Caliph al-Ma'mūn established himself in Baghdād, having defeated his brother al-Amin a year earlier and inaugurated a regime in which the rationalist philosophy of al-Mu'tazila assumed a predominant position. In 213/827 the Caliph officially proclaimed the doctrine of "the creation of the Qur'ān" in opposition to the Orthodox view of its eternal nature as co-existing with God. In 218/833 he decreed that no qāḍī who did not subscribe to this doctrine could hold an office in the state, and an inquisition for the trial of those who rejected the doctrine was instituted.⁸⁸ This anticipated atmosphere of intolerance to orthodox views, it has been suggested by a recent writer,⁸⁹ drove Shāfi'ī to settle in Egypt. At the age of fifty Shāfi'ī seems to have made his final choice between his love for power and his love for the law, and he decided to settle in a place where he could concentrate on legal speculation in relative quiet.

Remote from the center of court intrigues, and on good terms with the Governor of Egypt, Shāfi'ī found himself in a congenial position. During the five years he lived in Egypt, he devoted all his time to teaching and to dictating his works to his students. We are told that his leading disciples—al-Rabī' b. Sulaymān al-Murādī (d. 270/880), Abū Ya'qūb al-Buwayṭī (d. 231/845), and Abū Ibrāhīm Ismā'īl b. Yaḥya al-Muzanī (d. 274/877), to mention but three—were in the habit of writing down Shāfi'ī's spoken words, and that Shāfi'ī would correct the text when it was read aloud before him.⁴⁰ Thus, Shāfi'ī's disciples in Egypt were responsible for all of the books that are known to us now, whether copied or dictated from his original writings. Doubts have been raised as to whether some of Shāfi'ī's writings—such as the Kitāb al-Umm—were not actually composed by a disciple.⁴¹ If some of his words have been changed or rephrased, however, the contents of the books must comprise Shāfi'ī's own legal reasoning and ideas, for Shāfi'ī's biographers agree that his books were handed down to us as recorded by his students and one of the students, who wrote a Summary (Mukhtaṣar), agrees with Shāfi'ī's fundamental opinions as recorded in his collected works.⁴²

Shāfi'ī had difficulty persuading his opponents to accept his opinions. He followed an independent line of legal reasoning, often disagreeing with leading jurists, among them his great master Mālik. The disagreement aroused Mālikī opponents, who presented themselves to his circle to take issue with him, but his great abilities as an attractive teacher and skillful debater silenced them. One authority asserts that in an argument with Fityān, a Mālikī follower in Egypt, Shāfi'ī triumphed, but the intemperate loser, failing in persuasion, resorted to abuse. The Governor, a patron of Shāfi'ī, ordered that Fityān be punished by being paraded through the streets of the city bearing a plank and stating that this was the penalty for abusing a descendant of the Prophet's near of kin. Enraged by this degrading punishment, Fityān's followers turned upon Shāfi'i after one of his lectures and resorted to violence. Shāfi'i, badly injured, was taken to his house, where he died a few days later.⁴³ The incident gives us a picture of the consequences which heated controversies between rival schools of thought could generate.

It is possible that Shāfi'i's death was not caused entirely by his opponent's attack. Shāfi'i was known to suffer from a serious intestinal illness which kept him frail and ailing during the latter years of his life. He died on the last day of Rajab, 204 (20 January 820), in Fustāt (Old Cairo), and was buried in the vault of the Banū 'Abd al-Ḥakam, near Mount al-Muqattam. The qubba (dome), still in existence, was built by al-Malik al-Kāmil, the Ayyūbid Sultān, in 608/1212. It has always been a prominent place of pilgrimage, and it was still impressive and revered by many a Shāfi'i admirer when visited by the present writer in 1958.

Shāfi'i's Personality and Character

Tradition paints Shāfi'i as a handsome man who paid attention to his appearance. When his hair turned grey in later years, he was in the habit of dyeing it dark red. He was tall and slender with an attractive face and a pleasing voice.⁴⁴ He was a man of impressive personality, respected for his straightforwardness and revered for his piety. Although a man of meager resources, gaining little remuneration from his study of the law, he was generous with his friends as well as with the poor. That generosity became the favorite theme of many later biographers, who described him as giving away to the poor everything that his hands had acquired.⁴⁵ His will shows his concern for the emancipation of his slave, as well as for the welfare of all his relatives and associates.⁴⁶

From early childhood Shāfi'ī seems to have displayed a sharp intelligence and a good memory. We are told that at an early age he had memorized a great deal of ancient Arab poetry, in addition to the Qur'ān and Mālik's al-Muwatta'. Eloquent in speech and an expert in the Arabic language, his interest in poetry and language preceded his interest in law. Only when he was reminded, as one authority puts it, that it was more dignified to become a jurist than a poet, did he turn to the study of the law.⁴⁷ Whether or not this story was invented afterwards to account for Shāfi'ī's legal pursuit, he did grow up in a center where the legal profession tempted many a Muslim scholar. He certainly chose a field in which he distinguished himself not only as a great thinker and a skillful jurist, but as an expositor of the sharī'a without equal.

Although the study of law was Shāfi'ī's main concern, his early biographers state that he was acquainted with other branches of Islamic learning. Later biographers tend to depict him as a scholar whose knowledge was encyclopedic. One of these stories, related by al-Balawī, paints him as discussing with Caliph Harūn al-Rashīd, in his first audience with that caliph, almost every conceivable branch of knowledge, including Greek medicine and philosophy in their original language.⁴⁸ The early sources of his life give the impression that he was opposed to theology and prohibited discourse on it in his presence.⁴⁹

of Shāfi'i's loyalties. He is depicted as a man who gave secret support to an 'Alid pretender to the caliphate, but who, upon appearing before Caliph Ḥarūn al-Rashīd, demonstrated that his loyalty was to the 'Abbāsīd rather than to the 'Alid house.⁵⁰ When reproached afterward for betraying a certain sympathy for the 'Alids, Shāfi'i did not deny it, on the ground that he was a distant kinsman of theirs. Proof that he took an active part in a conspiracy against the central authority appears insufficient. At any rate, Shāfi'i seems to have removed himself completely from politics and palace intrigues and never again accepted a position in the service of the state. His single-mindedness and straightforwardness prompted him to stay above factional differences and personal jealousies.

Nor was he ready to compromise with the fellow members of his profession. He did not shrink from showing disagreement with the Ḥanafī jurists in 'Irāq, despite Shaybānī's intercession with the caliph to secure his pardon, because Shāfi'i's differences with Ḥanafī doctrines were genuine legal differences. When he lectured afterward in Madīna, he showed just as much legal disagreement with Mālikī followers, although he never ceased to pay high tribute to his great master Mālik. He betrayed, perhaps, a certain inflexibility in his relations with rival schools because he maintained so high a standard of legal reasoning that his disagreement with others appeared sharp and uncompromising. He was too much of a scholarly perfectionist for his contemporaries.

Tradition also depicts him as a great debater who emerged triumphant from every argument with his rivals. Ibn 'Abd al-Ḥakam, one of his disciples in Egypt, pays high tribute to the ability of his master in the art of defeating his critics.⁵¹ The Mālikī jurist Fityān, it will be recalled, resorted to violence because his tongue failed him when he sought to challenge Shāfi'i's persuasive argument. Although Ḥanafī jurists reject Shāfi'i's ability to withstand a discussion with Shaybānī, early accounts state that Shāfi'i conducted debates with Ḥanafī jurists with great skill.⁵² Both the Risāla and the Kitāb al-Umm bear witness to Shāfi'i's scholastic ability in pursuing an argument to its logical conclusion. A great portion of the Risāla is, in fact, written in the form of a debate between Shāfi'i and an interlocutor, who, in most cases, is a disguised critic of Shāfi'i's doctrines.

THE COMPOSITION AND STRUCTURE OF THE RISĀLA

Composition of the Risāla

MOST AUTHORITIES are agreed that the Risāla was written after Shāfi'i resided in 'Irāq.⁵³ It was perhaps one of his earliest works, although we are told that before he left 'Irāq he had composed another book, entitled Kitāb al-Hujja, and perhaps others, which have failed to reach us.⁵⁴

Traditional accounts state that the Risāla was originally written at the request of 'Abd al-Rahmān b. Mahdī⁵⁵ in order to explain the legal significance of the Qur'ān and the sunna. While an invitation from a leading 'Irāqī traditionist to Shāfi'i, who had made a reputation as the Upholder of Traditions, seems quite conceivable, the earliest extant sources on Shāfi'i's life are silent on the point. Neither Ibn Abī Hātim al-Rāzī (d. 327/938) nor Abū Nu'aym al-Iṣfahānī (d. 430/1038) gives the slightest suggestion that the Risāla was written at Ibn Mahdī's request. Abū Nu'aym merely states that Ibn Mahdī once remarked that al-Shāfi'ī was "an intelligent young man"⁵⁶—a statement which may mean that Ibn Mahdī had read either the Risāla or any one of Shāfi'ī's other books and concluded that he was an intelligent man; it does not necessarily suggest that the Risāla was written at Ibn Mahdī's request.

Nor do the sources mention that Ibn Mahdī and Shāfi'ī ever met. A tradition related by Shāfi'ī on the authority of Ibn Mahdī, recorded in one of his books,⁵⁷ was sharply contradicted by al-Sarrāj al-Bulqīnī, on the ground that the two men had not met; but al-Bulqīnī accepted the traditional story that the Risāla was sent by Shāfi'ī to Ibn Mahdī. That the two men may never have met does not weaken the possibility that Ibn Mahdī had requested Shāfi'ī to write the Risāla; but it does raise doubts as to the reliability of later reports that such a request had been made.

The first authority to state that Shāfi'ī composed the Risāla in response to Ibn Mahdī's request was Bayhaqī. One of his narratives, based on information transmitted by Mūsa, son of 'Abd al-Raḥmān Ibn Mahdī, states that Mūsa's father had complained to Shāfi'ī that Mālik's legal opinions had been distorted in Baṣra, and that Shāfi'ī responded by writing the Risāla to Ibn Mahdī. Mūsa, moreover, claims that he had seen the text of the Risāla written in Shāfi'ī's own hand.⁵⁸ Bayhaqī also reports a narrative, on the authority of al-Ḥārith b. Surayj al-Naqqāl, to the effect that al-Ḥārith, who earned the name of al-Naqqāl (the carrier) because he carried the Risāla, had himself delivered the work to Ibn Mahdī.⁵⁹ Later authorities repeat virtually the same version of the story that Ibn Mahdī had invited Shāfi'ī to write the Risāla.⁶⁰

Perhaps Ibn Mahdī made known to Shāfi'ī his desire for a book in support of the authoritative sources of the law and against the prevailing tendency to use personal opinion. It was unlikely that Shāfi'ī could produce a work as original as the Risāla virtually on the spur of the moment, the impression given us by the sources. The theme of such a work must have been in Shāfi'ī's mind for a long time, and the book was either ready when Ibn Mahdī asked for it, or it was simply a matter of putting into writing what had already crystallized in Shāfi'ī's mind. A methodical legal reasoning, inferior in quality though it may have been in the first version of the Risāla, must have been in preparation for a long while. It is even conceivable that the narrative concerning Ibn Mahdī's request may have been circulated after he had seen or received the Risāla from Shāfi'ī. How Shāfi'ī conceived the idea of writing a book dealing with the subject of uṣūl (sources of the law) in a completely novel manner is exceedingly difficult to determine. But the age in which he lived and his involvement in the controversy between two opposing schools of thought must have given him the external stimulus to reflect on the subject. His keen intellect and extensive knowledge of the law made him eminently qualified to search fruitfully for the interrelationship of the sources which separated rival schools of law. But the structure and arguments of his reasoning must have evolved in his mind after long study and reflection.

The Old and the New Risāla

Shāfi'ī's treatise on jurisprudence has become universally known as Kitāb al-Risāla Fī Uṣūl al-Fiqh, often abridged as Kitāb al-Risāla or simply al-Risāla. The word risāla, which means an epistle, or a communication in writing made to an absent person, came to be used as a result of the traditional story that this book had been sent in the form of an epistle to 'Abd al-Raḥmān Ibn Mahdī, who had asked Shāfi'ī to write a treatise on the authoritative sources of the sharī'a. Thus the book at first acquired the unofficial title of al-Risāla, and this later became the formal title in all the manuscripts that have been preserved or published. Most of the writers who refer to this treatise, whether in the original or the revised form, call it Kitāb al-Risāla or al-Risāla. Thus the Risāla has become for all students of Islamic law the recognized title of Shāfi'i's book on jurisprudence.

Internal evidence shows that Shāfi'i himself never called his treatise by this name. More than half a dozen times, Shāfi'i refers to it either as "Our Book," "My Book," "this Book," or simply the "Book."⁶¹ These references demonstrate that the title of al-Risāla became current after Shāfi'i's death and that Shāfi'i himself, if the name was current in his time, did not recognize it as the proper title of his book.

The authorities are agreed that Shāfi'i composed two treatises on jurisprudence, both referred to as al-Risāla; the old one was composed in 'Irāq and the new in Egypt.⁶² The old Risāla is described as a book in which Shāfi'i set forth a systematic study of the Qur'ān, including its general and particular rules and its abrogating and abrogated communications, and of the sunna as the authoritative sources of the law. Some authorities state that it also dealt with ijmā' (consensus) and qiyās (analogy).⁶³ Since the text of the old Risāla has failed to reach us, except perhaps for a few passages reproduced in some later authorities,⁶⁴ it is difficult to define precisely its scope and arguments. We are told, however, by some authorities who were acquainted with both versions that the new Risāla was superior in quality to the old.⁶⁵

authoritative sources, must have been in the nature of an apologia for the school of tradition, owing to Shāfi'i's pre-occupation during his first residence in 'Irāq with arguments against Ḥanafī jurists. Although the old Risāla may have dealt with Shāfi'i's opposition to personal opinion and the free use of analogy, it is inconceivable that it dealt with Shāfi'i's differences with Mālik, as expounded in the new Risāla, since in 'Irāq Shāfi'i had taken the position of a supporter of Mālikī doctrine against the criticism of Ḥanafī jurists. In the brief quotation which Bayhaqī cites from the old Risāla, there is evidence that Shāfi'i clearly supported the position of the Hījāzī traditionists, who held that the narratives of the Prophet's companions were authoritative, since they had been in close association with the Prophet and understood the meanings of his sunna. He also accepted the opinions of the Successors, if there was agreement among them.⁶⁶

The new Risāla, however, reflects the mature thinking of Shāfi'i after he settled in Egypt, and as its substance and arguments indicate, it deals with the whole subject of the sources as they were reconstructed in his mind in his later years. Internal evidence not only bears witness that the new Risāla was composed in Egypt, since it contains cross references to books which were written or dictated by Shāfi'i after he settled there,⁶⁷ but it also demonstrates that in its present form the new Risāla was written or revised toward the end of its author's life.⁶⁸ Thus it reflects his mature legal speculations at the height of his career as a leading jurist.

The new Risāla is a compact treatise composed in a style which demonstrates that its author was an expert in the Arabic language. However, his use of a new terminology and new legal concepts often compelled him to repeat or redefine his terms and arguments. This is specially noticeable in his discourse with an interlocutor who demands explanation or repetition of ideas which Shāfi'i may already have discussed in other sections of the book. Moreover, the problem of proper cross-referencing, which confronted other scholars, was not always satisfactorily solved,⁶⁹ and compelled Shāfi'ī at times to repeat his ideas. Often he refers the reader to other sections of the Risāla without a precise indication as to which section he means.⁷⁰

However, the Risāla's structure seems fairly sound and logical, and Shāfi'ī's arguments are set forth in a systematic manner and carried to their logical conclusions. The author begins his subject with a discussion of general topics in jurisprudence, supported by detailed examples, and then takes up the authoritative sources of the law. He pays particular attention to the sunna and traditions, not only because of the complexity of the subject, but also because he sought to establish their overriding authority. Finally, he discusses rather briefly the two other sources of the law, consensus and analogy, and concludes with a critical evaluation of certain other methods of reasoning such as istihsān (juristic preference) and ikhtilāf (disagreement). From this logical order, the author makes some three or four digressions in which he discusses certain topics which belong more appropriately to other sections of the book.⁷¹

Shāfi'ī's knowledge of ancient Arabic literature assisted his literary style. In those days no one could be a great scholar unless he was a master of the Arabic tongue. He must also have had the gift of lucid and eloquent expression and the ability to quote freely from the Qur'ān and from ancient Arabic poetry. It is precisely these qualities of exactness and eloquence which are characteristic of his style. He could, moreover, arrest attention by a turn of expression, or a fine classical phrase, and he could sum up a point of law tersely in a maxim. Though he had all these gifts, Shāfi'ī's style is at times discursive and, in the Risāla in particular, too compact for clarity and, not infrequently, obscure. In comparison with other jurists, however, his style rises to eloquence.

The Order and Sources of the Risāla

Since the structure and substance of the old Risāla are not known to us, it is extremely difficult to state precisely to what degree the text of the new Risāla was based on the old. Both internal evidence and the narratives of the authorities seem to indicate that Shāfi'i had, perhaps, composed the second Risāla anew. Once asked about Shāfi'i's books, Ibn Ḥanbal replied: "The books Shāfi'i wrote in 'Irāq were far from perfect; after settling in Egypt, they were rewritten and perfected."⁷² Bayhaqī, as well as other authorities, endorse the idea that the Risāla was rewritten in Egypt, and they give the impression that the old and the new editions were two different books.⁷³ Internal evidence suggests that not all of Shāfi'i's earlier works were at his disposal after he settled in Egypt. In Chapter X of the new Risāla, Shāfi'i states that the transmitters of some of the traditions that he cited were omitted because not all his earlier books were with him.⁷⁴ In his Kitāb Ikhtilāf al-Ḥadīth Shāfi'i again apologizes for the fact that he did not have the first version of the book.⁷⁵ These statements indicate that some of the works Shāfi'i composed in 'Irāq, perhaps including the old Risāla, were no longer available to him after he settled in Egypt.

Finally, we may raise the question of the sources from which Shāfi'i drew inspiration and information. This is not an easy question to answer specifically, since Shāfi'i makes no reference in the Risāla to books which he may have consulted. In his other works, the Kitāb al-Umm in particular, he devotes whole sections to discussions with other jurists—such as Awzā'i, Mālik, Abū Ḥanīfa, Abū Yūsuf and Shaybānī—which clearly indicate that he had studied the works of these eminent jurists with care.⁷⁶ His biographers give the impression that Shāfi'i was acquainted with almost all scholarly works.⁷⁷

Traditional accounts portray Shāfi'i as taking an early interest in learning. He committed the Qur'ān to heart at seven and Mālik's Muwatṭa' at ten. These two books undoubtedly left a great impression on his mind and supplied indispensable sources for his legal training and speculation. The Qur'ān served the double purpose of supplying raw material for legislation, as the basic source of law, and an inspiring ideal for the scholar who aimed at shaping his system of law in harmony with that model. There are 220 Quranic citations in the Risāla, given either as specific rules of law or as examples for formulating principles or maxims of law.

Next to the Qur'ān, Shāfi'i stressed the Prophet's sunna. We are told that the old Risāla was written mainly to defend the viewpoint of traditionists concerning the overriding authority of the sunna. In the new Risāla, not only does Shāfi'i study the sunna as a source of law, but he also draws heavily on it in formulating his rules and maxims of law. Over a hundred traditions are cited in the Risāla, several of them repeated as examples at various points. Most of these traditions, it seems, Shāfi'i related on the authority of the masters under whom he studied in Makka and Madīna. His two greatest authorities are, of course, Mālik, from whom he quotes thirty-eight traditions,⁷⁸ and Sufyān b. 'Uyayna, from whom he quotes thirty-five traditions.⁷⁹ From his other masters, he cites six traditions from 'Abd ai-'Azīz al Darāwardī (Madīna),⁸⁰ four from Ibn

'Abd al-'Azīz (Makka).⁸⁵ From al-Yaman he quotes five traditions on the authority of Yahya b. Ḥassān, to whom he refers as the "trustworthy authority" without mentioning his name,⁸⁶ and from 'Irāq he relates three traditions on the authority of 'Abd al-Wahhāb b. 'Abd al-Majīd al-Thaqafī.⁸⁷ A few other traditions either are related without authority or are cited with an incomplete list of authorities.

From the viewpoint of legal speculation we are inclined to believe that Shāfi'ī's main inspiration was derived from the intense debate with Ḥanafī jurists in 'Irāq to which he had been subjected. He not only had to study their works, Shaybānī's in particular, which he copied, but also to reflect on the underlying principles separating him from those jurists. His arguments with the Ḥanafī jurists must have had greater influence on his legal speculation than his biographers indicate. After settling in Egypt, Shāfi'ī acknowledged his indebtedness to the Ḥanafī jurists and paid high tribute to the contributions of Abū Ḥanīfa and Shaybānī to the sharī'a.⁸⁸

Much of his legal material and many of his ideas Shāfi'ī owed to the teachings of his masters, which he stored in his memory. His debates with his rival scholars and his discussions of legal questions with colleagues and disciples must have contributed greatly to his knowledge and to the final formulation of his opinions. To be specific on these matters is difficult, however, for even if a disciple did contribute his share in a discussion, it was customary for the disciple to record the account in his notes on the authority of his master.

SUBSTANCE AND ARGUMENT OF THE RISĀLA

The Vocabulary of the Risāla

THE VOCABULARY of the Risāla raises questions not only of legal nomenclature, but also of literary and philosophical terminology. Shāfi'ī rarely defines his terms, assuming that his followers and readers will be familiar with the general and technical words from the context of his writings or from the common usage of the time. Thus before we proceed to the fundamental ideas embodied in the Risāla, it may be useful to discuss briefly the meaning of some of its cardinal terms and expressions. Four sets of terms deserve particular examination.

In the first set, there are general terms which need elucidation, such as 'ilm (knowledge), al-bayān (declaration), and 'adl (justice). By 'ilm, Shāfi'ī always means legal knowledge derived from the authoritative sources of the law; some rules are obligatory for men individually (farḍ 'ayn), such as prayer and fasting, and some are obligatory for them collectively, such as the jihād. He equates knowledge with certainty and states that it is the duty of the jurist to seek the truth in his legal reasoning.⁸⁹ By al-bayān, which Shāfi'ī applies to Quranic communications, he means a clear declaration embodying a rule or a principle of law. The term is frequently used in the Risāla either in the sense of mere declaration, embodying a rule of law, or in clarifying the meaning of a certain rule of law.

The term 'adl is used either in the general sense of justice, which implies conformity with the law, or as the necessary qualification for a witness. Although no precise definition is given by Shāfi'ī, the term 'adāla, the quality of 'adl, is described by al-Māwardī, a Shāfi'ī jurist, as a state of moral and religious perfection.⁹⁰ Thus the term 'adl signifies probity or justness of character. This is the sense in which it is frequently used in the Risāla. The witness must be 'adl (just in character), and the minimum requirement is that he must display justness at the time when his testimony is given. It is possible, Shāfi'ī argues, that the witness may not be 'adl at another time. The testimony of one witness of just character must be supported by another witness of just character, and the justness of character of each witness must be confirmed by another person of just character.⁹¹

The second set of terms is made up of those which Shāfi'ī uses in his discussions of the Qur'ān. The terms "general" and "particular" as applied to rules, which are familiar to modern students of the law, were introduced to Islamic jurisprudence for the first time by Shāfi'ī.⁹² The precise meaning of these terms will be explained in the following section. He also introduced the terms "explicit" and "implicit," the first being equivalent to the literal meaning of the communication and the second to the meaning implied either in the text or in the context of the communication. Shāfi'ī also uses the term al-naskh or the abrogation of divine legislation, which is well known to contemporary jurists as the repeal of legislation. The term as well as the principle of abrogation are to be found in the Qur'ān (Q. XVI, 103), but Shāfi'ī argues that a Quranic communication can be abrogated only by another Quranic communication and that neither does the Qur'ān abrogate the sunna, nor the sunna the Qur'ān. It is true, he goes on to argue, that a sunna can be superseded by a Quranic communication, but not until the sunna is first abrogated by another sunna laid down by the Prophet.⁹³

In the third set of terms, there are certain words used in connection with Shāfi'ī's discussion of the sunna and ḥadīth (tradition). Although sunna and ḥadīth mean the same thing in practice, in pre-Islamic Arabia sunna meant usage or custom and it formed the common law observed by the Arabs. After the rise of Islam, the term sunna was applied to the sayings and decisions of the Prophet Muḥammad, and ḥadīth meant the communication of the sunna, or the Prophet's custom. In the words of Wensinck, "ḥadīth is the external, sunna the internal side of tradition; ḥadīth is the form, sunna the matter."⁹⁴ The sunna is reported in the form of a general statement—usually short—preceded by a chain of authorities or transmitters (isnād), cited to prove the authenticity of the report. The isnād begins with the latest authority and goes back to a Companion who relates the Prophet's custom (i. e., his saying or decision). This transmission must be uninterrupted and must be made on the authority of an eye or ear witness, and all the transmitters must be thoroughly reliable. Thus, the criticism of Muslim scholars was restricted to a thorough examination of the isnād (transmission), and the scholars were satisfied if the tradition passed such an external test.

The traditions were collected in the third century (ninth century of the Christian era) in a number of digests, and six digests became recognized as authoritative. These are the two Ṣaḥīḥs of al-Bukhārī (d. 256/869) and Muslim (d. 261/874), and the four sunans of Abū Dāwūd (d. 275/888), Tirmidhī (d. 279/892), Ibn Māja (d. 283/886), and al-Nasā'ī (d. 303/915). Other digests of traditions, well known to students of the sharī'a, are by Ibn Ḥanbal (d. 241/856), al-Dārimī (d. 255/869), al-Dāraquṭnī (d. 385/996), al-Bayhaqī (d. 458/1065), and others. Although Shāfi'ī is critical of narratives transmitted by unreliable authorities, and is unwilling to accept traditions from authorities unknown to him, he himself cites in the Risāla several traditions without isnād.⁹⁵ Such traditions are known to traditionists as mursal, or traditions lacking some or all the names of the transmitters. Shāfi'ī also accepts some traditions that were transmitted by a single authority. Such traditions are called al-khabar al-wāḥid, or the single-individual tradition.⁹⁶

In the fourth set of terms, words such as ijtihād, qiyās, ijmā', and istiḥsān are used in the exercise of legal reasoning. Literally, ijtihād means the exercise of effort. Originally it was used as the exercise of discretion and personal opinion, but in Shāfi'ī's time the term was narrowed down to mean the discretion of the scholar. Shāfi'ī limited ijtihād to the use of qiyās (analogy), prohibiting the exercise of personal opinion unless it were based on a precedent. Ijtiḥād, Shāfi'ī says, is the method of reasoning, based on certain indications, leading to the correct decision.⁹⁷ Qiyās is a variety of ijtihād of which Shāfi'ī approves, provided there is a relevant text in the Qur'ān or tradition on the strength of which analogy could be applied. It is generally defined as the method of legal reasoning by which a decision is made on the strength of a precedent in which a common reason, or an effective cause, is applicable.⁹⁸ Shāfi'ī's conception of analogy perhaps may be best seen in the following statement:

Analogy is of various kinds. . . . They differ from one another in the antecedence of the analogy of either one of the two, or its sources, or the source of both, or the circumstance that one is more clear than the other. The strongest kind [is the deduction] from an order of prohibition by God or the Apostle of the small quantity that the equally strong or stronger order of prohibition of the great quantity shall be applicable owing to the [compelling] reason in the greater quantity. Similarly the commendation of a small act of piety implies the presumably stronger commendation of a greater act of piety; and similarly the order of permission of a great quantity would render permissible that of a smaller quantity.⁹⁹

By ijmā' (consensus) Shāfi'ī does not mean merely the agreement of a few scholars of a certain town or locality, as the Ḥijāzī and 'Irāqī jurists seem to have held, but the majority of leading jurists in Muslim lands. He also universalized ijmā' on matters of fundamentals to include agreement of the Muslim community.¹⁰⁰ On matters of fundamentals arrived at by consensus, Shāfi'ī argues, there should be no disagreement (ikhtilāf), but on matters of detail for which there may be two answers, one answer might be chosen by istiḥsān (discretion or preference). The earlier jurists seem to have permitted a greater degree of discretion than Shāfi'ī was inclined to accept.¹⁰¹

Fundamental Ideas of the Risāla

A brief summary of the content of the Risāla hardly does justice to it, for only a complete translation of the text, such as is provided in the following pages, can present a full expression of the ideas and the method of reasoning of its author. However, a description of the Risāla, its fundamental ideas and problems, may serve the reader as a guide.

The Risāla opens with an introductory chapter on the religious basis of Islamic jurisprudence. After the usual homage and expressions of gratitude to God, Shāfi'ī points out that at the time Muḥammad was charged with his prophetic mission, mankind was divided into two classes. There were those who did not believe in God and who worshipped idols and stones and other natural objects, and there were the "People of the Book,"¹⁰² who believed in God and in the teachings of His earlier prophets, but who had changed God's commands and forged falsehood by their tongues, mixing it with the truth that God had revealed to them. Because of this state of misbelief, God decided to send forth the last of his prophets, Muḥammad, to repair and reconstruct the world into a God-fearing community. Thus Muḥammad's mission, embodied in the term "Islam," was to provide mankind with the final and definitive religion.

Shāfi'ī discusses briefly the place of the Qur'ān in the Islamic religion and the duty of the Muslims to obey the orders of Muḥammad, and concludes that it is the duty of all those who seek legal knowledge to gain it by constant appeal to God's Book as communicated to the Prophet. For "no misfortune will ever descend upon any of the followers of God's religion for which there is no guidance in the Book of God to indicate the right way."¹⁰³

The Qur'ān, Shāfi'ī points out, is the basis of legal knowledge. Its provisions constitute a "perspicuous declaration" (Q. III, 132) on all matters, spiritual and temporal, which men are under obligation to observe. The second chapter of the Risāla is therefore devoted to a discussion of the nature of the legal provisions of the Qur'ān under the title "al-bayān" (perspicuous declaration). "Al-bayān," Shāfi'ī says, "is a collective term" which includes general principles of law as well as detailed rules. The term al-bayān has been discussed by several leading jurists. Some say that it merely means a declaration, embodying certain legal provisions; others argue that it not only declares them, but also makes them clear.¹⁰⁴ Shāfi'ī, however, seems to emphasize the legal content of the provisions on the grounds that all Quranic communications are clear, "although some are more sharply clarified than others," and only to those who are ignorant of the Arab tongue do some communications seem less clear than others. He then divides al-bayān into five categories. The first consists of a specific legal provision in the text of the Qur'ān, such as the basic duties that are owed to God (credal witness, prayer, payment of alms, fasting, and pilgrimage). The second includes certain provisions, whose modes of observance are specified by an order of the Prophet Muḥammad (such as the number of prayers each day and the amount of alms to be paid). The third consists of broad legal provisions which Muḥammad particularized. The fourth includes all the legal provisions laid down by Muḥammad in the absence of a specific Quranic text. The fifth and final category is comprised of rules which are sought by the exercise of ijtihād (personal reasoning) by means of qiyās (analogy).

Although in his chapter on al-bayān Shāfi'ī discusses certain characteristics of the Qur'ān, that chapter is, apparently, intended to be only an introduction to a fuller treatment of the Qur'ān, from a juridical viewpoint, in subsequent chapters. At the end of chapter II, on al-bayān, he discusses the Arabic eloquence of the Qur'ān—one of its distinguishing features—which, to the Muslims, is the chief evidence of the miracle (i'jāz) of this Book.¹⁰⁵

Shāfi'ī's critical study of the Qur'ān from a juridical viewpoint led him to the keen observation that the Quranic rules and principles fall into various categories. To begin with, he divides them into general and particular rules. Some of the general rules, he observes, are intended to be general, in which the particular rules are included. There are general rules in which both the general and particular rules are included, and there are general rules which are intended to be particular rules.

Then Shāfi'ī divides the Quranic legislation into a different set of categories. There are, he observes, general rules the meaning of which may be clarified by the context, and there are those only the wording of which indicates the implicit meaning. There are general rules, he adds, which only the sunna can specify as general or particular.

Shāfi'ī's classification of the Quranic legislation into the foregoing categories was not only novel but was hailed as a great contribution to the understanding of the Qur'ān as a source of law. His distinction between the general, which embodies general rules and principles of law, and the particular, which means specific rules, clarified for his contemporaries the way toward a deeper understanding of the sources and principles of Islamic law. Shāfi'ī's contribution elicited high praise. To cite but one example, al-Karābīsī told Aḥmad b. Ḥanbal—founder of another school of law—that he had understood the precise meaning of the Qur'ān only after he had read the Risāla.¹⁰⁶

Shāfi'ī's specific reference to the sunna, the Prophet's sayings and decisions, to clarify the meaning of a particular piece of Quranic legislation or an ambiguous text, brings the sunna into the field of Islamic legislation and indicates its specific role as a source of law. It is in his discussions of the sunna and traditions that we find one of Shāfi'ī's greatest contributions to Islamic jurisprudence. For although the school of tradition laid sufficient emphasis on the sunna, in opposition to the school of opinion, in which Shāfi'ī himself took an active part in his early career, it was Shāfi'ī who made it clear that only an authentic tradition from the Prophet is binding and constitutes an authoritative source of legislation. Both the Hijāzī and the Irāqī jurists often accepted traditions that were based on local custom or embodied a personal opinion as valid for legislation. Shāfi'ī made a distinction between an authentic tradition from the Prophet and a narrative which embodies the opinion of a Companion or a leading jurist; the latter may be useful in clarifying the meaning of a text, but it should not be as binding as a tradition from the Prophet.

Shāfi'ī goes on, in the following chapters, to discuss the principle of abrogation, by virtue of which a Quranic communication was repealed by a later one. Here he indicates again the role of the sunna in its relation to the Qur'ān, pointing out that the sunna merely states which of the Quranic communications are the abrogating ones and which are the abrogated, but he rejects the Hanafī doctrine which states that the sunna can abrogate the Qur'ān. The Qur'ān does not abrogate the sunna directly nor does the sunna abrogate the Qur'ān; the Prophet, says Shāfi'ī, always provided a new sunna, in conformity with Quranic legislation, when the Quranic legislation contradicted an earlier sunna. Thus although he stresses the significance of the sunna, he gives it a precise definition as a second authoritative source of law in its relation to the Qur'ān.

The sunna includes Muḥammad's sayings and decisions. It is, therefore, not on the same level as the infallible Quranic communications. However, Shāfi'ī argues, God had imposed on men the duty of obedience to His Prophet as well as to Him, and he goes on to give evidence that God regards disobedience to the Prophet as disobedience to Him. Accordingly, in practice the sunna of the Prophet is a source of legislation as valid as the Qur'ān.

But since Shāfi'ī emphasizes the rule that only an authentic sunna, transmitted by reliable authorities, constitutes a valid source of law, he devotes a large portion of the Risāla to a study of what constitutes an authentic tradition, who are the reliable transmitters, and why certain authentic traditions are contradictory to one another. This latter category, to which he pays attention, is as novel as his distinction in the Quranic legislation between the general and particular.

To Shāfi'ī there are no contradictory traditions. They appear contradictory only to those who do not know the circumstances in which they were laid down and who do not realize that certain traditions merely qualify others. Shāfi'ī's contribution to this field of legal reasoning, although it may raise certain doubts as to the historical evidence of his interpretation, resolved a serious problem for the jurists who were faced with a great mass of contradictory traditions. Shāfi'ī's method of reconciliation, called al-ta'wīl (interpretation),¹⁰⁷ encouraged the acceptance of many a tradition which otherwise would have been in danger of being rejected. Thus his solution supplied further material for legal development, but for the critical historian it rendered more difficult the problem of separating the historical elements from the mass of traditions which Muslim publicists accepted without question.

The latter part of the Risāla deals briefly with ijmā' (consensus), qiyās (analogy), ijtihād (personal reasoning), istihsān (juristic preference), and ikhtilāf (disagreement). Although these are important jurisprudential subjects, Shāfi'ī devotes much less space to them than to the Qur'ān and sunna.

Shāfi'ī's doctrine of consensus, as Schacht rightly points out, develops continuously in his writings.¹⁰⁸ It begins as the consensus of a few scholars in a certain locality, following Mālik's method,¹⁰⁹ and becomes a concept that includes the entire Muslim community. If the view that the new Risāla was written or revised as the last of Shāfi'ī's writings is correct, his doctrine of consensus as defined in this work should represent his final formulation. In various parts of the Risāla, Shāfi'ī refers to the consensus of the scholars as a method of expounding the law acceptable to contemporary jurists, but in his references to the consensus of the community at large, specially in the chapter on consensus,¹¹⁰ he undoubtedly tends to invest it with higher authority. Shāfi'i ends his chapter on consensus by asserting: "He who holds what the Muslim community holds shall be regarded as following the community, and he who holds differently shall be regarded as opposing the community he was ordered to follow. So the error comes from separation. . . ."

The concept vox populi, vox Dei, embodied in a tradition which states "My people will never agree on an error," is not cited by Shāfi'i in this form, a fact which perhaps indicates that it was circulated after his time. But the concept does appear in the Risāla, which may well be the source of the final formulation of the principle embodied in the tradition ascribed to the Prophet Muḥammad.¹¹¹ Shāfi'i's doctrine of the community at large was opposed by other scholars, including his own followers, although Ghazzālī (d. 1111) tried to confine the agreement to fundamental principles, leaving matters of detail to the consensus of the scholars.¹¹² The fundamental weakness in the doctrine of the consensus of the community was procedural—the lack of an adequate method which would provide means for the community to arrive at an agreement.¹¹³

Shāfi'i discusses ijtihād (personal reasoning) and qiyās (analogy) at greater length than consensus, because he tried to limit the use of personal reasoning, in the wide and unrestricted sense, to the use of analogy. He often uses the terms

¹¹³ The lack of a method by which to arrive at an agreement remained the perennial weakness of the doctrine of consensus, and no adequate solution was provided by jurists who came after Shāfi'i. See remarks on this point in my War and Peace in the Law of Islam, pp. 33-34.

qiyās and ijtihād interchangeably, but obviously he permits personal reasoning only through analogy. "Analogy is of two kinds," says Shāfi'ī, "the first, if the case in question is similar to the original meaning [of the precedent]. . . . The second, if the case in question is similar to several precedents, analogy must be applied to the precedent nearest in resemblance and most appropriate."¹¹⁴ He tried, however, to limit the use of analogy to matters of detail; it cannot supersede an authoritative text. Neither should it be based on a special or an exceptional precedent; analogy must conform to the spirit and the general rules and principles of the law. In taking such a position Shāfi'ī established a balance between those who used analogy extensively as a source of law and those who rejected it altogether. As to istiḥsān, which the 'Irāqī jurists used as a method for rejecting one precedent in favor of another, it is declared unacceptable by Shāfi'ī because it permits virtually unlimited use of discretion and personal reasoning. Only one form of personal reasoning is acceptable to Shāfi'ī—analogy. Even this method is regarded as a weak instrument. In summing up the sources of the law at the end of the Risāla, Shāfi'ī says: "Although I have made decisions [on the basis of consensus and analogy] just as I have made decisions on the basis of the Book and the sunna, [in the case of consensus and analogy] the principle on which I made my decision varies."¹¹⁵

Finally, the Risāla ends with a discussion of ikhtilāf (disagreement). Although the jurists before Shāfi'ī seem to have tolerated a greater freedom in the use of disagreement, the trend toward the systematic use of the sources as defined by Shāfi'ī set in motion the movement to limit disagreement. Shāfi'ī states that there are two kinds of disagreement. The one is prohibited and the other permitted. He goes on to say:

On all matters concerning which God provided clear textual evidence in His Book or [a sunna] uttered by the Prophet's tongue, disagreement among those to whom these [texts] are known is unlawful. As to matters that are liable to different interpretations or derived from analogy, so that he who interprets or applies analogy arrives at a decision different from that arrived at by another, I do not hold that [disagreement] of this kind constitutes such strictness as that arising from textual [evidence].¹¹⁶

Thus Shāfi'ī restricts disagreement only on matters on which the scholars may exercise personal reasoning (ijtihād) and on which each may take a decision which is right in his own way. A case in point is the search for the qibla, the direction of the Sacred Mosque. Everyone will have to determine his own qibla, by ijtihād, and although each may take a slightly different position from another, everyone is right in his own way.

SIGNIFICANCE OF THE RISĀLA

Shāfi'ī as the Founder of the Science of Islamic Jurisprudence

THE RISĀLA, a novel work in the literature of Islamic law, gave Shāfi'ī a name as the founder of the science of uṣūl al-fiqh (roots or sources of the law). The uṣūl had been the subject of study by other jurists as attested by the fact that Abū Yūsuf (d. 182/798) discusses certain aspects of it in his Kitāb al-Kharāj,¹¹⁷ and Shaybānī, one of Shāfi'ī's early friends in 'Irāq, is reputed to have written a book on uṣūl. But this term had not yet acquired the technical meaning of a science dealing specifically with the sources of the law which Shāfi'ī had attached to it. No other jurist seems to have discussed the subject in so coherent and systematic a manner, and the

Risāla appears to be the first complete and well-organized survey of the uṣūl, their interrelationship, and how the detailed rules and decisions were derived from the authoritative sources. It proved to be so excellent a guide of the shari'a that it was always referred to as the leading work on the subject.¹¹⁸ Some of the subjects of this book, such as istiḥsān (juristic preference) and 'ilm (legal knowledge), are dealt with more fully in the Kitāb al-Umm,¹¹⁹ and a separate work is devoted to the study of the Qur'ān;¹²⁰ but the Risāla is the only comprehensive treatise dealing with the subject of uṣūl which Shāfi'i had written.

The Risāla, however, is not a complete work on jurisprudence dealing with the nature and principles of law, although the reader may well form an idea about Shāfi'i's conception of the nature of law since several sections are devoted to an exposition of the broad principles and rules of the shari'a. The Risāla is in the main a treatise on the nature and use of the sources of the shari'a. It was written originally as an apologia for the supremacy of traditions, but after its fundamental ideas and arguments had been reformulated in Egypt, it represented a systematic and critical study of all the sources of the law.

The significance of the Risāla, therefore, lies not so much in the detailed matters it discusses, although these have had their influences on Muslim jurists, as in the comprehensive view of the whole subject of uṣūl and in the logical and systematic method Shāfi'i provided for legal reasoning. The originality of the book lies in its new departure in the study of jurisprudence.

From Shāfi'i's time onward, the Risāla became a textbook for students of Muslim jurisprudence. It has been carefully studied by Shāfi'i's followers as well as by the followers of other schools of law. Al-Muzanī, one of Shāfi'i's disciples, said that he had read the Risāla five hundred times; from each reading he had derived a fresh thought.¹²¹ Ibn Ḥanbal often suggested the Risāla to his followers and ranked it in his mind among the best of Shāfi'i's writings. It became a model for both jurists and theologians who wrote on the subject. Al-Ghazzālī, perhaps the greatest Muslim theologian, wrote a work on jurisprudence in which he elaborated the theme of the Risāla and set forth a study of the sources of law in a highly logical and systematic manner in accordance with the Shāfi'i school of law.¹²²

The Risāla became a favorite subject for commentaries written by later jurists. Although none of the commentaries has been found, we are told by some authorities that at least five were composed. One of them was by Abū Bakr al-Ṣayrafī (d. 330/932), who was hailed by al-Subkī, a Shāfi'i follower, as the greatest writer on jurisprudence since Shāfi'i himself. Other commentators were al-Naysābūrī (d. 349/960), al-Shāshī (d. 365/976), al-Jawzaqī (d. 378/989), and al-Juwaynī (d. 438/1046). These commentators were all learned in the law and theology, and their books were highly regarded in Islamic lands.¹²³

The Islamization and Idealization of Law

By providing a precise method of legal reasoning, Shāfi'i achieved two important results. First, he rationalized on an Islamic basis all the law that earlier generations had handed down. Not only did he reject the use of sources that were not Islamic, such as custom and personal opinion, but he also defined the method by which legal reasoning was restricted within the framework of the authoritative sources. Although historically the law was derived from both Islamic and non-Islamic sources, the process of Islamizing the law was perhaps an unconscious movement set in motion from the very beginning of Islam. It was Shāfi'ī, however, who consciously laid down a method of jurisprudence that was intended to confine legal reasoning within the framework of Islamic sources. To achieve the purpose he inevitably narrowed the free use of legal reasoning, and the tendency toward taqlid (literally, imitation, i. e., to follow the doctrine of a recognized authority) may be said to have begun at that time. In the following century, taqlid became the dominating rule.

Furthermore, Shāfi'ī's logical method led him to assume that the decisions and actions of the Prophet had always been consistent and rational. In making use of the Prophet's sunna as a source of law, he always assumed that there was no contradictory sunna; if one was ever found, either it must be lacking in authenticity or, Shāfi'ī argued, the circumstances in which the contradictory sunna had been provided were not the same. In following this line of reasoning, Shāfi'ī subordinated positive rules to the sunna and rejected old legal doctrines, even though based on sound legal reasoning, whenever they contradicted the authority of the sunna.

Shāfi'ī's method of jurisprudence was concerned less with developing the law that existed in his age than with systematizing a body of law that had already reached a high degree of growth. Thus in the Risāla Shāfi'ī paid less attention to the problem of developing new principles of law than to the problem of how to demonstrate that all the principles and rules that existed in his time were derived from recognized Islamic sources.

Closely associated with the Islamization of law, perhaps the inevitable result of it, was the tendency to idealize the shari'a as the perfect legal order. It is true that Quranic legislation was regarded as divine from the very beginning, but pre-

Islamic law, customary or otherwise, that was not repealed by divine legislation was incorporated into Islam after a long process of synthesis. All the early Muslim jurists unconsciously contributed to the harmonizing of the law with the spirit of divine legislation by making decisions in the form of answers to practical questions. Thus the idea of regarding as divine not only Quranic legislation, but all Islamic law, may be said to have begun in early Islamic history. The philosophical elaboration of this idea, however, had not yet been fully achieved until Shāfi'ī's time. One of Shāfi'ī's main preoccupations, it will be recalled, was his constant disputations with fellow jurists against the use of sources which might infuse into the law elements of human legislation. The development of the shari'a after Shāfi'ī's time tended to become gradually divorced from the practical needs of the individual and oriented toward the common interests of Islam, embodying its ethical and religious ideals.

Not unlike the idea of natural law in medieval Christendom, Islamic law was regarded as transcendental and perfect. In contrast with positive law, Islamic law was revealed in a supernatural way and for a supermundane purpose. The jus divinum was regarded as the ideal, eternal and just, designed for all time and characterized by its universal application to all men.¹²⁴ The ideal life was the life led in strictest conformity with this law.

In theory the divine law preceded the state and was independent of man's own existence. The state was created to enforce the law, but if it fails to do so—and in such a case the state forfeits its raison d'être—the individual still remains under an obligation to observe the law even in the absence of anyone to enforce it. The sanction of the law, which is distinct from the validity of that law, need not exist. For the object of the law is to provide for the individual the right path (shari'a), or the ideal life, regardless of the existence of the proper authority to enforce it.¹²⁵

¹²⁵ al-Shāfi'ī, Vol. II, pp. 8 ff.

The need for a rational justification of such a system is so great that man often seeks to justify it by mere self-conviction.¹²⁶ Shāfi'i's legal reasoning supplied a rationale for the Islamic legal order. Deriving his system from the Qur'ān, the very word of God, and from the model conduct set forth by God's Prophet, Shāfi'i demonstrated how every rule of law can conform in letter or in spirit to the norms provided by the authoritative sources. In the final formulation of the classical system of Islamic law Shāfi'i's impress remained permanent.

Shāfi'i's Influence

It is not difficult to understand the reason for Shāfi'i's pre-eminence. His vast capacity for work, his extraordinary knowledge of the law as well as his broad knowledge of Islamic studies, his powerful intellect and his eloquent and lucid exposition were devoted exclusively to the study of law. No less favorable for his great success were the circumstances in which he played his role as the founder of a new school of law. He appeared at a time when two rival schools of law were competing for supremacy. There is a saying related by a Muslim scholar that the reason Shāfi'i's life was relatively short was that there was still need for some differences of opinion, and had he lived longer, no differences would have survived.¹²⁷ Shāfi'i probably never intended to found a school of law after his name. His biographers often quote him as saying that he merely wished to teach the truth and had no desire to have his name cited as an authority.¹²⁸ Shāfi'i's precise legal methodology, however, inevitably limited the number of schools of law that were developing and led to the establishment of a separate school of law.

After Shāfi'ī's death, many legends surrounded the story of his life and his influence. A tradition from the Prophet has it that at the end of every century a great reformer from his house would appear. It has been held that 'Umar b. 'Abd al-'Aziz (d. 101/720), the eighth Umayyad caliph, was the religious reformer who appeared at the end of the first century of the Islamic era; at the end of the second, it was Shāfi'ī. Other traditions have been related to prove that Shāfi'ī's legal doctrine was anticipated and approved by the Prophet.¹²⁹ Later accounts of his life abound with similar stories which raised him to the highest saintly position. Although these stories lack historical foundation, they should not be dismissed as without value, because for centuries they influenced the minds of generations that followed.

Yet Shāfi'ī's role as the founder of a new school of law was not the product of a hero cult arising after his death, as in the case of Ibn Ḥanbal; nor was he, like Abū Ḥanīfa, the titular head of a group of distinguished jurists who all contributed to Ḥanafī law. His was the active career of a jurist who provided the foundation of a new school of law. Shāfi'ī's influence as the founder of a school of law began after he settled in Egypt, and it rose steadily. Among the leading disciples who were already active in spreading his earlier doctrines in 'Iraq were men such as Abū 'Ubayd al-Qāsim b. Sallām (d. 224/838),¹³⁰ al-Za'farānī (d. 260/873),¹³¹ Abū Thawr (d. 240/854),¹³² Aḥmad b. Ḥanbal (d. 241/856),¹³³ and al-Karābīsī (d. 245/860).¹³⁴ In Makka, he had been followed by Abū Bakr al-Ḥamīdī (d. 219/835),¹³⁵ Abū Ishāq al-Shāfi'ī (d. 237/852),¹³⁶ and others.¹³⁷ In Egypt his leading disciples were al-Buwayṭī (d. 231/845),¹³⁸ al-Muzanī (d. 264/877),¹³⁹ al-Rabī' b. Sulaymān al-Jizī (d. 256/869),¹⁴⁰ al-Rabī' b. Sulaymān al-Murādī (d. 270/833),¹⁴¹ and others.¹⁴² These jurists not only recorded Shāfi'ī's words and expounded his legal doctrines, but they also spread his teachings to other countries and bequeathed his collected writings to succeeding generations.

Cairo and Baghdād, and to a lesser degree Makka, were the chief centers from which Shāfi'ī's doctrines first radiated. Within a century after his death, the Shāfi'ī school gradually spread into Madīna, Syria, and Central Asia. Shrinking in Egypt under Fāṭimid rule (909/1171), it again became predominant under Ṣalāḥ al-Dīn (d. 564/1169). In the last centuries before the occupation of the central lands of Islam by the Ottoman sultans, the Shāfi'ī school had become the most widespread. Adopting the Ḥanafī school as official, the Ottoman government helped to establish this school in Constantinople and in many other Islamic centers. With the rise of the Ṣafawī dynasty at the opening of the sixteenth century, Persia gradually adopted the Shī'ī system. However, the Shāfi'ī school

THE TEXT OF THE RISĀLA

Manuscripts

THERE ARE two manuscripts of the Risāla at the Dār al-Kutub, the National Library in Cairo. No others have been discovered. The first, known as the manuscript of Ibn Jamā'a, consists of 124 folios. The other, known as the manuscript of al-Rabī', is the older and by far the more interesting. In its present form, it consists of 78 folios; 62 constitute the text, and the rest, of more recent vintage, presumably, consist of the certificates of readers—persons who had read or heard the reading of the original text. The size of the manuscript is $5\frac{1}{2} \times 10\frac{1}{4}$ inches. On the whole the writing is clear, although not as legible as the manuscript of Ibn Jamā'a. Rarely, however, is it obscure or impossible to read.

The manuscript of al-Rabī' is divided into three parts, each forming a juz' (tome). This artificial division should not be taken to mean that the Risāla was originally divided into three volumes, since a juz' is more likely to end abruptly in the middle of a paragraph rather than at the end of a chapter. Such a division was necessitated by the use of three sets of notebooks, each set called a juz' and consisting of some twenty folios. The copying of books in separate sets of notebooks seems to have been a practice common among Muslim writers. The artificiality of this division seems to make it advisable not to follow it in the present translation.

The so-called al-Rabī' manuscript, alleged to have been the text written by al-Rabī' himself rather than one copied from an older text of al-Rabī', has become a subject of controversy among several scholars. Moritz held that it was written in the middle of the fourth century (the latter part of the tenth century A. D.).¹⁴³ He gave no explanation as to how he arrived at this date of the manuscript, but Shaykh Aḥmad Shākir (d. 1958), an editor of the Risāla, with whom the present writer had the opportunity of discussing this problem shortly before his death in Cairo, pointed out that probably Moritz arrived at this conclusion on the basis of a statement in the margin of the Ibn Jamā'a manuscript in which it was stated that the latter was compared with an older one—the Rabī' manuscript—copied in the year 358 of the Hijra.¹⁴⁴ Shākir is of the opinion that the Rabī' manuscript must have been about a century earlier, at least shortly before the death of al-Rabī' in 270/883.

Although the difference between Moritz and Shākir in the dating of the Rabī' manuscript is less than a century, Shākir's opinion raises a number of problems. If the date were shortly before 270/883, the manuscript would probably have been written on papyrus rather than on paper, which had just been introduced into Egypt. Moreover, the style of writing, except the titles of each juz', which are in Kufic, is a cursive book hand. To these objections Shākir replied that paper had already been introduced into Egypt in the late second century of the Islamic era and the shift of style from Kufic to cursive had already begun. He quoted a statement from al-Qalqashandī maintaining that although it is commonly accepted that Ibn Muqla (d. 328/939) was the first to introduce the new style of writing, it had already been in vogue since the second century of the Islamic era.¹⁴⁵ Furthermore, he pointed out that there is at the Dār al-Kutub in Cairo a papyrus dated 195/810, which resembles the Rabī' manuscript in style. However, this apparent resemblance, which Shākir advanced in support of his argument, can be very misleading to nonexperts in paleography. Finally, he asserted that the certificates of readers often refer to this manuscript as belonging to al-Rabī', which, in Shākir's view, was evidence of its being al-Rabī's own copy.

For a critical evaluation of the commonly accepted fact that Ibn Muqla was the first to introduce the new Arabic style, see Nabia Abbott, "The Contribution of Ibn Muqlah to the North Arabic Script," American Journal of Semitic Languages and Literatures, Vol. LVI (1939), pp. 70-83; and The Rise of the North Arabic Script (Chicago, 1939), pp. 33 ff.

There seems to be no conclusive argument in favor of the viewpoints of either Shākir or Moritz on the strength of internal evidence alone. The manuscript would probably have been on papyrus were it written in al-Rabī's time, although this argument cannot be regarded as conclusive evidence against its having been one of the first books written on paper in Egypt.¹⁴⁶ The style of the manuscript, which became the common style only a century after the time of al-Rabī', tends to support the viewpoint of Moritz. Professor Nabia Abbott, an expert in Arabic paleography (with whom the writer discussed the problem of style on the basis of photographic copies of samples of the manuscript), is inclined to accept a fourth-century dating.

As internal evidence fails to support either viewpoint, we must call upon external evidence for a more conclusive argument. The present writer has examined the manuscript and the condition of its paper in particular. The paper, though undoubtedly ancient, can give us no final answer on the basis of its present condition. A revealing external examination may be conducted on the strength of a chemical analysis of the paper and ink, an examination which the authorities of the Dār al-Kutub seem unprepared to undertake at the present moment. Until that is done, an expert opinion on whether ¹⁴⁶ There are books written on paper in the third century of the Islamic era, but not from Egypt. Professor Abbott states that "while one might expect a few paper documents to come out of the third-century Egypt, no one would ever expect the Egypt of the early third century to produce a paper book on any subject whatsoever" (Nabia Abbott, "A Ninth-Century Fragment of the 'Thousand Nights'," Journal of Near Eastern Studies, Vol. VIII (1949), p. 144.

the manuscript was written in the third or the fourth century of the Islamic era cannot be formed.

Editions

Of the four known editions of the Risāla, only two deserve serious consideration, the Būlāq and the Shākir editions. The other two are inferior in quality and at any rate are based on no other known manuscript.

The Būlāq edition is based on the Ibn Jamā'a manuscript and constitutes some eighty-two pages of the first volume of the Kitāb al-Umm, published by the Būlāq Government Press in Cairo in 1321/1904. The editor did an extremely competent piece of work in examining the manuscript, but he confined himself, unfortunately, to one manuscript only. With all its merits, this remains an uncritical edition of the Risāla, lacking, among other things, any comparison with the Rabī' manuscript.

The Shākir edition, published in Cairo by the Ḥalabī Press in 1358/1940, is a more elaborate work running to some 670 pages and including an introduction, notes, and eight appendices. The erudition and competence of the late learned Shaykh, universally recognized by scholars, have rendered possible not only the publication of the Risāla in a separate volume, but also the editing and the publication of several other works.

Shākir's edition is based on the so-called al-Rabī' manuscript. Shākir confines himself to that text rather than seeking to reproduce a reconstruction of the two manuscripts. He indicates in the footnotes, however, the verbal differences between the Būlāq edition and the al-Rabī' manuscript. His edition is enriched by a number of linguistic and historical comments with virtually full references to the Quranic communications. His references to ḥadīth digests are less full and often incomplete. He seldom explains Shāfi'ī's terms and legal concepts. Nor is the bibliography (pp. 609-610) satisfactory; indeed some of the references in the footnotes are more helpful than the bibliography. In comparing the original manuscript with the Shākir edition, it is evident that Shākir has usually avoided the incorporation of corrections and comments on the original text, and that when he did incorporate them in certain instances in the belief that they would improve the text, he has indicated them by parentheses. But Shākir's edition is far from being critical; and the need for a more complete and scholarly edition continues to exist.

The Translation

To the present writer's best knowledge, a complete translation of the Risāla has not been made into any foreign language. A brief summary of it is available in Dutch,¹⁴⁷ but this lays no claim to completeness of translation.

Written in broad and often abstract terms, the Risāla presents a number of difficulties to the translator. A translation of the meaning only serves to deprive the reader of the spirit and significance of the original text; a closely literal translation may render the broad abstract concept in the English language more specific than the author intended. Shāfi'ī is often fond of expressing his ideas in terse or incomplete sentences which would probably become meaningless in another language. The present writer has, therefore, provided the equivalent in English in as close and literal a translation as possible, with occasional words or sentences added in parentheses to complete the meaning of a sentence or to clarify an abstract concept. No attempt was made to recast the original in a completely modern style. The definitions of basic terms and concepts and the supplementary material in the notes may help to explain the meaning of the text in translation. The notes are also intended to indicate the principal sources available for the material dealt with in the Risāla.

Although the original text of the Risāla has undergone several revisions and the rewriting of certain portions, some of Shāfi'i's ideas have been repeated over and over again, though in different forms, and no attempt has been made in this translation to omit repetitions. Two chapters of the Risāla do not appear to fit into the logical order of the book. These are the chapters "On the Nature of God's Orders of Prohibition and the Prophet's Orders of Prohibition" and "On Legal Knowledge." In the original text they follow the chapter "On Traditions," which may have been inserted to answer certain points raised by an interlocutor. As the chapter on legal knowledge consists of a discussion of a general jurisprudential nature, it was deemed necessary to transfer it so that it follows the chapter "On al-Bayān"; and the chapter on the nature of God's orders of prohibition and the Prophet's orders of prohibition was transposed to the position preceding the discussion on traditions. The latter portion of the chapter on al-Bayān, dealing with the Arabic character of the Qur'ān, has been shifted to form the first section of the chapter "On the Book of God." In order to preserve the character and the general scheme of the book which the author laid down, no other attempts have been made to change or completely recast the structure of the work.

Neither the original Arabic texts nor the Būlāq edition were divided into subdivisions in addition to the basic divisions into chapters. The Shākir edition, however, is subdivided into numbered paragraphs. Shākir's system, artificially divides the book into so many paragraphs that it has been abandoned here. The present writer, accordingly, has followed a different method in subdividing the chapters into paragraphs.

POSTSCRIPT

COMPARED with the Ibn Jamā'a manuscript, the al-Rabī manuscript is relatively free from the frequent citations of blessings which may be found in abundance in later classical writings. Although most of the blessings in the text of al-Rabī have been rendered into the nearest English equivalents, it did not seem essential to retain all of them.

References to such works as the Encyclopaedia of Islam, Brockelmann's Geschichte der Arabischen Literatur, and leading dictionaries, which are well-known to students of Islam, have been considered unnecessary.

The abbreviations most frequently used are the following:

The letter b., if inserted between two names, stands for ibn or bin, which means "the son of."

Q is the abbreviation for Qur'ān.

1/632 cites the date according to the Hijra and the Gregorian calendars.

B and S stand for the Būlāq and Shākir editions. They appear in the margin of the translation to indicate the end of the corresponding pages of the Būlāq and Shākir editions.

[INTRODUCTION]

IN THE NAME OF GOD, the Merciful, the Compassionate.

Abū 'Alī al-Ḥasan b. Ḥabīb b. 'Abd al-Malik, on the authority of al-Rabī' b. Sulaymān al-Murādī, from al-Imām Muḥammad b. Idrīs . . . al-Shāfi'ī, said: ١—

1. Praise be to God (Allāh) who created the heavens and the earth, and made the darkness and the light; yet the unbelievers attribute equals to their Lord.² Praise be to God to whom gratitude for one of His favors cannot be paid save through another favor from Him, which necessitates for the giver of thanks for His past favors to repay it by a new favor which [in turn] makes obligatory upon him gratitude for it. Those who describe Him cannot attain to the utmost of His greatness, which is as He has described Himself [in the Qur'ān] and above what His creatures can attribute to Him. I praise Him with such praise as is obligatory on account of His kindness and the might of His majesty. I ask help of Him: The help of one save in whom there is no power or might at all. I ask Him for His guidance: The guidance whereby no one who takes refuge in it will ever be led astray. I ask Him for His forgiveness for whatever [offence] I have already committed and for what I have deferred—with the pleading of one who confesses himself in a state of servitude³ and who knows that none but He can forgive his offence and save him from it. I bear witness that there is no god but God alone, who has no associate whatever, and that Muḥammad is His servant and Apostle.⁴

2. He [God] sent him [to mankind] at a time when men were divided into two groups.

One of them being the People of the Book,⁵ who had changed some of its rules, and misbelieved in God, since they forged falsehood fashioned by their tongues and mixed it with the Truth that God had revealed to them. For God, Blessed and Most High, mentioned to His Prophet⁶ some of their misbelief, saying:

Among them there is a party that twist their tongues with the Book, in order that you may reckon it to be a part of the Book, and they say: 'It is from God,' although it is not from God; and they speak falsehood against God knowingly [Q. III, 72].

³ I. e., in the service of the Lord.

⁴ The recital of this formula, called the profession of faith, constitutes the first of the Five Pillars of Islam (al-arkān al-khamsa), and it is the duty of every Muslim to recite it whenever it is deemed necessary or commendable. Any individual who desires to become a Muslim must first recite it. The other four pillars are: prayer, payment of alms, fasting of the month of Ramadān, and pilgrimage. See Shāfi'i's Risāla, Chap. VI. For a detailed discussion of this subject, see Shāfi'i, Kitāb al-Umm, Vols. 1-2.

⁶ Although Shāfi'i uses the terms "Apostle" (rasūl) and "Prophet" (nabī), no distinction is made between the two, and they seem to him to be synonymous. Muslim publicists, however, have distinguished between the two terms: A Prophet is a man who receives divine revelations; an Apostle is a man who not only receives divine revelations but also communicates them to men. Thus every Apostle is a Prophet, but not every Prophet is an Apostle. See Nasafi's Creed (with a commentary by al-Taftazānī), ed. E. E. Elder (New York, 1950), p. 21; Ṣadr al-Dīn b. 'Alī b. Abī al-'Izz, Sharh al-Taḥāwīya, ed. Aḥmad Muḥammad Shākir (Cairo, 1373/1954), pp. 95-96; A. J. Wensinck, The Muslim Creed (Cambridge, 1932), pp. 203-204. For a broad philosophical treatment, see F. Rahman, Prophecy in Islam (London, 1958).

And He said:

So woe to those who write the Book with their hands and then say: 'This is from God,' that they may sell it for a little price. Woe to them for what their hands have written, and woe to them for their earnings [Q. II, 73].

And He, Blessed and Most High, said:

The Jews say: 'Uzayr⁷ is the son of God,' and the Christians say: 'The Messiah is the son of God'; that is the utterance of their mouths, conforming to what was formerly said by those who had previously disbelieved—God oppose them! How they are perverted! They have taken their rabbis and their monks as lords rather than God, although the Messiah is the son of Mary, and they were commanded to worship only one God. There is no God at all but Him. Exalted is He above what they associate [with him] [Q. IX, 30-31].

And He, Blessed and Most High, said:

Didst thou not see those who have received a portion of the Book believing in the idol and the vain thing and saying to those who misbelieved: 'These are better guided than those who have believed [in the revelation of the Qur'ān]'? Those are they whom God cursed, whomsoever God curses shall never find for himself any defender [Q. IV, 54-55].

The other [group] was that of those who misbelieved in God and created [something] that God did not permit. They set up with their hands stones and wood and images that they found pleasing and gave them names that they forged and called them gods and worshipped them. When they were pleased with [something] other than what they worshiped, they cast [the latter] away and set up with their hands that other [thing] and worshiped it—those were the Arabs.⁸

⁸ Shāfi'ī refers to the religious practices of the Arabs before the rise of Islam.

3. A group of the Persians followed their path in this respect and in the worship of whatever they pleased, whether fish or beast or star or fire or something else.

Wherefore God mentioned to His Prophet one of the answers of some of this sort [of men] who worshiped other than Him, quoting from them:

We, indeed, found our fathers forming a community, so we follow in their footsteps [Q. XLIII, 21].

And He, Blessed and Most High, quoted their saying:

Do not abandon your gods; do not abandon Wadd or Suwā', or Yaghūth and Ya'ūq, or Nasr.⁹ Thus they led many astray [Q. LXXI, 22-23]. § 10

And the Most High said:

And mention Abraham in the Book; surely he was a trusty man, a prophet, when he said to his father: 'Father, why worshipest thou that which neither hears nor sees, nor avails thee anything?' [Q. XIX, 42-43].

And He said:

And recite to them the story of Abraham. When he said to his father and his people: 'What do you serve?' They said: 'We serve idols, and to them we continue cleaving.' He said: 'Do they hear you when you pray, or profit you or harm?' [Q. XXVI, 69-73].

Concerning this group, reminding them of his favors, and warning them all of their erring, and His favor to those of them who believed, He said:

Remember the favor of God to you when you were enemies; for He brought your hearts together and by His favor you became brothers. You were on the brink of a pit of fire and He delivered you from it. Thus God makes His signs clear for you, perchance you will let yourselves be guided [Q. III, 98-99].

⁹ Wadd, Suwā', Yaghūth, Ya'ūq, and Nasr were idols worshipped by the Arabs before Islam. See Hishām b. al-Kalbī, Kitāb al-Aṣnām; English translation by Nabih Faris, Book of Idols (Princeton, 1952), pp. 8, 9, 10. These idols, according to Bayḍāwī, were originally the names of saintly persons whom the Arabs raised to the level of divinity. See Bayḍāwī's Tafsīr (Cairo, 1305/1887), p. 762.

4. [Shāfi'ī] said: Before His deliverance of them by Muḥammad, God's blessing and peace be upon him, they were misbelievers, individually and collectively, having in common the gravest of things: The disbelief in God and committing what He does not permit. God is High above what they profess. There is no God other than He, exalted be He with praise of him, Lord and Creator of all things. Whoever of them is alive is as [He] described his state: living, working, speaking under the anger of his Lord, increasing his disobedience. Whoever has died is as [He] described his word and his work: He has gone to his punishment.¹⁰

5. When [the revelation embodied in] the decree of the heavenly Book reached its appointed time and the Providential order became a reality through the manifestation of His religion, which He chose, after the predominance of disobedience to Him, which He disapproved—He opened the gates of His heavens by His mercy, just as His Providential order did not cease to be executed in His foreknowledge at the time of the revelation of His law in the past centuries. For He, Blessed and Most High, said:

The people were one nation; then God set forth the prophets as bringers of good tidings and warners [Q. II, 209].

The One whom He chose for His revelation, the Elect One for His message, the One favored above all His creatures through the gift of His mercy and the sealing of His prophecy and the most universal of whatever He sent any messenger with previously, was Muḥammad, His servant and His Apostle. Mention of him is upraised together with mention of Him in this life. He is the intercessor whose intercession is looked for in the next life. He is the purest of His creatures in soul; the One who combines most fully every character that is pleasing to Him in spiritual and temporal life. He is the best [in mankind] in ancestry and family.

And He acquainted us and all mankind with his [Muḥammad's] special graces and their universal benefit for religion and the life of this world.¹¹ For of him He said:

There has come to you an apostle from among yourselves; grievous unto him is the difficulty you have experienced,¹² who is watchful over you, and who is gentle and compassionate with the believers [Q. IX, 129].

And He said:

. . . That you might warn the Mother of Cities and those around it [Q. XLII, 5].

The Mother of Cities is Makka, the city of his [Muḥammad's] people.

And He said:

And warn thy clan, thy nearest kin, [Q. XXVI, 214].

And He said:

Surely it is a reminder to thee and to thy people, and assuredly you will be questioned [Q. XLIII, 43].

6. Shāfi'ī said: Concerning [God's] saying, "Surely it is a reminder to thee and to thy people," [Q. XLIII, 43] [Sufyān] b. 'Uyayna, on the authority of Ibn Abī Najīh from Mujāhid, told us: It has been asked: "To whom did the man [Muḥammad] belong?" "To the Arabs," was the reply; and it was asked: "To what [tribe] of the Arabs?" "To Quraysh," was the reply.

7. Shāfi'ī said: Mujāhid's comment on [God's saying] is so clear in the text [of the Qur'ān] that it needs no explanation.

God, praise be to Him, specified [Muḥammad's] people and his nearest of kin in [the message of] warning—and included all mankind in it after them—and raised the Apostle's renown through the Qur'ān; ¹³ furthermore, He distinguished his people in the message when He commissioned him to warn, in accordance with His saying [in the Qur'ān]: "Warn thy clan, thy nearest of kin" [Q. XXVI, 214]. 815

A few of those who are learned in the Qur'ān have asserted that the Apostle said:

Men of 'Abd-Manāf! ¹⁴ God has sent me to warn my nearest of kin, and you are those nearest of kin.

8. Shāfi'ī said: [Sufyān] b. 'Uyayna told us from Ibn Abī Najih from Mujāhid who [in giving the meaning of God's saying]: "And we have raised for thee thy reputation" [Q. XCIV, 4], said: "Whenever I [God] am mentioned, you [Muḥammad] are mentioned too" [e.g., in the word of witness]: "I profess that there is no god at all but God and that Muḥammad is the Apostle of God." ¹⁵

9. [Shāfi'ī said]: This means (but God knows best) the inclusion of [Muḥammad's] name in [pronouncing] the profession of the faith and in the calling of the believers to prayer. It may also mean mentioning his name in reading the Qur'ān, in acts of obedience and avoiding disobedience.

May God bless and give peace to our Prophet whenever his name is mentioned by those who may remember, or omitted by those who disregard him. May God bless him among the first and the last generation, with the most favorable, most abundant and most gracious blessing that He has bestowed upon any of His creatures. May He grant you and us virtue by His blessing upon Him more than he granted to any of his nation by His blessing and peace. May His peace and mercy and blessing be upon [Muḥammad]. May God reward him on our behalf with the most abundant reward bestowed on any messenger sent on behalf of those to whom he was sent. For God has delivered us from falsehood ¹⁶ through him and made us members of the best community established for men by following His religion with which he was well-pleased, He chose for us and by virtue of which [religion] He made pure His angels and those of His creatures He favored with it. No blessing—hidden or visible—has ever descended upon us, through which we obtained spiritual or temporal gain or by which spiritual or temporal hurt was dispelled, but Muḥammad was the cause of its dispatch, the leader to its benefit and guide to its right way; he is the defender against falsehood and [dissipator of] the sources of evil, which oppose righteousness, and warner against whatever causes falsehood, and he is ever ready with advice for guidance and warning [against evil]. May God's blessings be upon him and his family as His blessings were upon Abraham and his family. Thou [God] art praiseworthy and glorious! 816

10. God revealed to him His Book, of which He said:

And verily it is a Book sublime, falsehood comes not to it from before or from behind; a revelation from One who is All-wise and Praiseworthy [Q. XLI, 41-42].

[By virtue of this Book] He brought forth [Muḥammad's people] from misbelief and ignorance¹⁷ into the light and guidance. He made clear to them [in the Book] what He permitted—showing favor by permitting His creatures—and what He prohibited, as He knows best what pertains to their felicity by avoidance of it in this world and in the hereafter. He tested their obedience by placing them under obligation in word and deed, and by enjoining abstinence from forbidden things from which He has warded them off, and He rewarded them for their obedience by granting eternal life in Paradise and deliverance from His vengeance, whereby His bounty was made abundant. Praiseworthy is He. And He taught them what He made due [as punishment] for those who disobey Him, in contrast to what He made due [as reward] for those who obey Him. 817

And He admonished them by calling their attention [to the experiences] of former people who had more property and children and who lived longer and left [behind them] more memorable deeds. They enjoyed their fortune during their earthly life. When He made His judgement, death took them suddenly for their lapses and they received [God's] punishment at the end of their terms of life so that they take prior warning of future happening and understand [God's commands] as stated clearly [in the Qur'ān] in order to be awake before being taken by surprise, and perform [their deeds] before the end of the period when an offender is not reproved and a ransom is not taken "on the day when each soul will find brought before it the good and the evil that it has done, it will wish that there were a far distance between it and that day" [Q. III, 28].

All that [God]—glorified be His praise—has revealed in His Book is a mercy [from Him] and an evidence [for His existence]. Whoever knows [the Book], knows it; and whoever is ignorant of it, is ignorant of it. He who is ignorant of it, does not know it, and he who knows it, is not ignorant of it. For the public is divided into classes with regard to knowledge. Their status in learning is according to their rank in knowledge of it.

It is obligatory upon him who seeks knowledge to exert his utmost energy in increasing his knowledge, to be patient with every obstacle that may stand in his way, and to be sincere to God in understanding His knowledge—whether [to be found] in the text [of the Book] or [obtained] by deductive reasoning—and to appeal to God for help, for nothing good is obtainable save by God's help.

For he who has obtained knowledge of God's commands from His Book, whether as [provided] in the text or through istidlāl (inductive reasoning), and—had God's help in word and deed in whatever he learned of it—attains virtue in his spiritual and temporal [life], doubt leaves him, wisdom enlightens his heart and is entitled to the position of imāma: leadership in religious matters.

We pray to God—who offers His blessings ere we deserve them and who continues to do so in spite of our negligence to our obligatory gratefulness to Him, and who made us the best nation on earth—to provide us with an understanding of His Book, of the sunna of His Prophet, and word and deed which would fulfil for us our obligation to Him, and makes obligatory upon us supererogatory [service]. § 19

11. Shāfi'ī said: No misfortune will ever descend upon any of the followers of God's religion for which there is no guidance in the Book of God to indicate the right way. For God, Blessed and Most High, said:

A Book we have sent down to thee that thou mayest bring forth mankind from darkness to light, by the permission of their Lord, to the path of the Almighty, the Praiseworthy [Q. XIV, 1].

And He said:

And we sent down to them the reminder, that thou mayest make clear to mankind what was sent down to them; and so haply they may reflect [Q. XVI, 46].

And He said:

And we have sent down to thee the Book as a clarification for everything and as a guidance and a mercy and good tidings to the Muslims [Q. XVI, 91].

And He said:

And we have revealed to thee a spirit of our bidding. Thou didst not know what the Book was, nor the faith; but We made it a light by which We guide whomsoever We will of our servants. And, verily, thou shalt be a guide unto a right¹⁸ path. [Q. XLII, 52]. B 4

Chapter II

[ON AL-BAYĀN (PERSPICUOUS DECLARATION)]¹

What is al-Bayān?

12. Shāfi'ī said: Al-Bayān is a collective term for a variety of meanings² which have common roots but differing ramifications. The least [common denominator] of these linked but diverging meanings is that they are [all] a perspicuous declaration for those to whom they are addressed, and in whose tongue the Qur'ān was revealed;³ they are of almost equal value for these persons, although some declarations were made emphatically clearer than others, though they differed [in clarity] to persons ignorant of the Arab tongue.

13. Shāfi'ī said: The sum-total of what God has declared to His creatures in His Book, by which He invited them to worship Him in accordance with His prior decision, includes various categories.

² Ma'ānī (singular: Ma'na) may signify either an intention or an expression of meaning or reason. The English equivalent of meanings, in the sense of ideas, is used here.

³ I. e., the Arabs.

One of these is what He has declared to His creatures by texts [in the Qur'ān], such as the aggregate of duties owing to Him: That they shall perform the prayer, pay the zakāt (alms tax), perform the pilgrimage, and observe the fast. And that He has forbidden disgraceful acts⁴—both visible and hidden—and in the textual [prohibition of] adultery, [the drinking of] wine, eating [the flesh of] dead things and of blood and pork; and He has made clear to them how to perform the duty of [the major] ablution as well as other matters stated precisely in the text [of the Qur'ān].

A second category consists of [those duties] the obligation of which He established in His Book, but the modes of which He made clear by the tongue of His Prophet. The number of prayers [each day] and the [amount of] zakāt and their time [of fulfilment] are cases in point; but there are other [similar] duties which He has revealed in His Book.

A third category consists of that which the Apostle of God established by example or exhortation, but in regard to which there is no precisely defined rule from God [in the Qur'ān]. For God has laid down in His Book the obligation of obedience to His Apostle and recourse to his decision. So he who accepts [a duty] on the authority of the Apostle of God accepts it by the obligation imposed by God.

A fourth category consists of what God commanded His creatures to seek through ijtihād (personal reasoning)⁵ and by it put their obedience to the test exactly as He tried their obedience by other duties which He had ordered them [to fulfil], for the Blessed and Most High said:

And We shall put you to the trial in order to know those of you who strive and endure, and We will test your accounts [Q. XLVII, 33].

⁵ Ijtihād literally means personal effort to understand the meaning implied in a certain rule of law in order to form an opinion. It implies personal legal reasoning which should be exercised by applying analogy (qiyās) to an authoritative text such as the Qur'ān or tradition. For a discussion on the use of ijtihād, see Chap. XIII, below; and J. Schacht, Origins of Muhammadan Jurisprudence, pp. 105 f., 127 f., 132.

And He said:

And that God might try what was in your breasts and sift out what was in your hearts [Q. III, 148].

And He said:

Perchance your Lord will destroy your enemy, and will make you successors in the land, that He may see how you will act [Q. VII, 126].

14. Shāfi'ī said: [God ordered the performance of prayer] in the direction⁶ of the Sacred Mosque⁷ and said to His Prophet:

Sometimes We see thee turning thy face about toward the heaven. So We will turn thee to a direction that will satisfy thee. Turn thy face in the direction of the Sacred Mosque, and wherever you are, turn your faces in its direction [Q. II, 139].

And He said:

And from whatever place thou hast gone forth, turn thy face in the direction of the Sacred Mosque; and wherever you may be, turn your faces in its direction [Q. II, 145].

Thus [God], glorified be His praise, guided [men]—should they be at a distance from the Sacred Mosque—by using the reasoning powers which he has implanted in men and which discriminate between things and their opposites and the landmarks which [He] set up for them when the Sacred Mosque, towards which He commanded them to turn their faces, is out of sight. For God said:

For it is He who has made for you the stars, that you might be guided by them in the darkness of land and sea [Q. VI, 97].

And He said:

And by landmarks and by the stars they are guided [Q. XVI, 16].

⁶The qibla, i.e., the facing of Makka while performing the prayer ritual.

⁷The Sacred Mosque is at Makka. In the center of the Mosque is al-Ka'ba, the sacred shrine of Islam.

15. Shāfi'ī said: * Such landmarks may be the mountains, the nights and the days, which have winds of known names though they blow from different directions, and the sun and the moon and the stars whose risings and settings and whose places in the sky are known.

Thus [God] prescribed to men the use of personal reasoning in turning in the direction of the Sacred Mosque by means of guidance to them, which I have described, and so long as men use their personal reasoning they will not deviate from His command, glorious be His praise; but He did not permit them to pray in any direction they wished if the Sacred Mosque were out of sight. And He also instructed them about His will and providence and said: "Does man think that he will be left roaming at will?" [Q. LXXV, 36]. "Left roaming at will" means one who is neither commanded nor prohibited.

16. [Shāfi'ī said]: This [communication] indicates that no one—other than the Prophet—is allowed to make a decision except by istidlāl in the way that I have described concerning these matters and concerning justice and penalties in hunting; nor should any man make use of istiḥsān * (juristic preference), for to decide by istiḥsān means initiating something himself without basing his decision upon a parallel example.

God commanded men that they should call as witnesses two men of just character.¹⁰ Just character means acting in obedience to God. Thus was the path showing the knowledge of justice or injustice. This [subject] has been dealt with in its proper place,¹¹ and I have cited examples which I hope have indicated [the meaning] of others not dealt with in parallel situations. § 25

* Būlāq ed., p. 5.

* Istiḥsān is the method of legal reasoning through which the jurist seeks an opinion for which there is either no authority in the tradition or for which there are two authorities, one of them being preferred. For Shāfi'ī's arguments against istiḥsān, see Chap. XIV, below; and Kitāb al-Umm, Vol. VII, pp. 267 ff.

¹⁰ Two men of just character ('adl') constitute the minimum number of witnesses required in testimony (shahāda). The witness must be 'adl'—equitable, just, well-known for telling the truth—therefore it means the possession of a character which renders his testimony valid. The nearest equivalent therefore is the combination "just character." See Ibn Farḥūn, Tabṣirat al-Hukkām (Cairo, 1302/1884), Vol. I, pp. 173, 204; and E. Tyan, Histoire de l'organisation judiciaire en pays d'Islam (Paris, 1938), Vol. I, pp. 349-72.

al-Bayān I

17. Shāfi'ī said: ¹² With respect to visitation [of the Ka'ba],¹³ God, Blessed and Most High, said:

Whoever makes use of the minor pilgrimage in order to perform the [great] Pilgrimage, shall bring as an offering what he can easily afford; but if he finds none, then a fast of three days in the course of Pilgrimage, and seven upon your return, that is ten altogether; that applies to those whose families are not present at the Sacred Mosque [Q. II, 192]. B 5

Thus it was clearly understood by those to whom this communication was addressed that the three-day fasting during Pilgrimage and the seven-day [fasting] after the return [from Pilgrimage] make ten days altogether. For God said: "These are ten altogether" [Q. II, 192]. This communication was either intended to state precisely [the meaning] or to instruct men that if three are added to seven the total is ten. And He said: § 26

We had an appointment with Moses for thirty nights, and We completed them with ten [more] so that the full period of his Lord's appointment was forty nights [Q. VII, 138].

¹² Būlāq ed., p. 5.

¹³ There are two kinds of pilgrimages: the major and the minor; the first (al-ḥajj) is the fifth of the five pillars (arkān) of Islam (see Chap. I, note 4; and paragraph 155, below), which must be performed at the tenth of the month of Dhū-al-Hijja, during the 'Id al-adḥa; the second ('Umra) is the minor or lesser pilgrimage which might be performed at any other time. The major pilgrimage is a duty to be performed by those who are able, at least once in a lifetime; the other is supererogatory. See paragraph 156, below.

So it was clearly understood by those to whom this communication was addressed that thirty and ten nights make forty.

Shāfi'ī said: ¹⁴ God's saying: "Forty nights" may either mean the same as the foregoing communication, namely, that if thirty are added to ten the total is forty, or it may have been intended to specify more clearly the meaning.

18. Shāfi'ī said: ¹⁵ God said:

Fasting is prescribed for you as it was for those before you; perhaps you will show piety. A certain number of days [of fasting], but if any of you be sick or on a journey, then a number of other days [Q. II, 179-180].

And He said:

The month of Ramaḍān in which the Qur'ān was sent down as guidance for the people and as clear signs of the guidance and the salvation ¹⁶ (furqān)—so let those of you who witness [the arrival of] the month fast it; but if anyone is sick or on a journey [let him fast] a number of other days [Q. II, 181].

Thus [God] laid down the duty [for men] to fast, specifying that it shall be for a month; and the month, according to [the Arabs] is the period between two [successive] crescents, which may be either thirty or twenty-nine [days]. The guidance implied in this legislation, as well as in the two foregoing ones, is to state more clearly the total number.

The most likely interpretation [of this communication] is that it specifies the total number of seven and three, and thirty and ten, that is, to state more precisely the meaning, since men surely must have known these two numbers and their totals just as they have known the month of Ramaḍān.

¹⁶ The meaning of this word in the various communications of the Qur'ān cannot always be precisely determined. It may mean salvation, separation, proof, or simply a communication. See Jurjāni, p. 111; Nöldeke and Schwally, Geschichte des Qurans (Leipzig, 1919), Vol. I, p. 34; and Richard Bell, Introduction to the Qur'ān (Edinburgh, 1953), pp. 136-38.

19. Shāfi'ī said: ¹⁷ God, Blessed and Most High, said:

When you stand up for the Prayer, wash your faces and your hands up to the elbows, and wipe your heads, and your feet up to the ankles; and if you are polluted, purify yourselves [Q. V, 8-9].

And He said:

Nor [when you are] polluted, then purify yourselves, unless you be travellers on the road.¹⁸ § 28

Thus God's Book has provided a precise definition of [the duty of] ablution; which must be distinguished from cleansing with stones (istinjā'), and purifying from pollution.¹⁹

It has been laid down that [the duty of] washing the face and the limbs must be performed by a minimum of one [washing] for each, and it may mean more than once. The Prophet has specified that [the duty of] ablution shall be performed once, but he himself performed it three times. It follows that the minimum requirement in performing [ablution] is to wash the limb once. The minimum requirement for [complete] washing is likewise once. Since only once is [the legal] requirement, the three [washings] are optional.

The sunna laid down that three stones are required to perform cleansing (istinjā'), and the Prophet indicated what constitutes ablution and complete washing. He also indicated that the ankles and the elbows should be included in the washing, for the text [in the Qur'ān] may mean washing [the body], either excluding the two limits (the ankles and elbows) or including them. Since the Apostle of God said: "Woe to the [unwashed] heels from the fire of hell," he obviously specified washing rather than wiping.

¹⁷ Būlāq ed., p. 6.

¹⁸ Q. IV, 46. The latter part of this communication is not given by Shāfi'ī.

¹⁹ For the meaning of ablution, see Chap. VII, section 2, below. Cleansing with stones after defecation is istinjā', and cleaning from janāba (pollution) is prerequisite for purification. See Shāfi'ī's Kitāb al-Umm, Vol. I, pp. 18, 38.

20. Shāfi'ī said:²⁰ God said:

His parents receive, each of them, a sixth of what he has left, if he has children; but if he has no children and his heirs are his parents, then his mother receives a third; if, however, he has brothers, his mother receives a sixth [Q. IV, 12].

And He said:

A half of what your wives leave belongs to you if they have no children; but if they have children, a fourth of what they leave belongs to you, after any bequests they may have made or debts [have been paid]. . . . If a man—or a woman—whose property is inherited has no direct heirs, but has a brother or a sister, each of the two receives a sixth; if they be more than that, they share in a third, after any bequests he may have made or debts [have been paid], without prejudice one to the other—a charge from God; verily God is All-knowing, All-gracious [Q. IV, 13, 15-16].

These textual legislations [in the Qur'ān] have rendered other narrative unnecessary. God, however, made a condition that [an estate should not be distributed] until bequests are executed and debts are paid. Thus the narrative indicates that a bequest should not exceed one third [of the estate].²¹

§ 30

And He said:

Observe the Prayer and pay the alms tax (al-zakāt) [Q. II, 40; and other similar communications].

And He said:

And perform the major (hajj) and minor ('umra) pilgrimages to God [Q. II, 192].

Then He specified clearly by the tongue of His Apostle the required number of prayers, their times and the modes of their performance; the amount of zakāt and the times of its payment; the performance of the major (hajj) and minor ('umra) pilgrimages and when these duties are required or not required and when [the Prophet's] sunnas are in agreement or contradictory with each other. Other parallels may be found in the Qur'ān and the sunna.

al-Bayān IV

22. Shāfi'ī said: [Al-Bayān] includes all that the Apostle has provided in the sunna concerning which there is no [legislation in the] Book. There is in this book,²³—concerning God's favoring mankind [with the ability] to understand the Book and Wisdom—a proof that Wisdom is the sunna of the Apostle of God.²⁴

Included in what I have stated concerning God's command to His creatures ordering obedience to the Apostle and speci-

²³ See paragraph 87, below.

²⁴ In a broad sense al-ḥikma is synonymous with the Truth and it includes, legally speaking, all the orders of prohibition and permission. See Jurjānī, pp. 96-97; and al-Muṭarrazī, Kitāb al-Mughrib (Hyderabad, 1328/1911), Vol. I, p. 133. Shāfi'ī, however, uses the term specifically for legal orders derived from the sunna, distinguishing it from legal orders based on divine communication. His opinion is based on the following Quranic communications; Q. II, 123, 231, 146; IV, 113; XXXIII, 34; and LXII, 2, in which wisdom follows the Qur'ān and is interpreted to mean the sunna. See paragraphs 160-62, 192-95; and Ṭabarī, Tafsīr, Vol. III, pp. 86-88.

fying the place it has in religion,²⁵ is a proof of the precise definition of the duties stated in the Qur'ān, which consists of the following categories:

The first category is what the Book has laid down with such clarity that nothing further—in addition to revelation (tanzil) — was needed.

The second category consists in what is clearly stated in the obligation imposed [by God] ordering obedience to the Prophet. The Apostle in his turn precisely stated on the authority of God what the duties are,²⁶ upon whom they are binding, and in what circumstances²⁷ some of them are re-

The third category consists in what [God] has specified only in the sunna of His Prophet, in the absence of a textual [legislation in the] Book.

23. Shāfi'ī said: ²⁸ Everything [in the sunna of the Prophet] is a clear explanation for the [divine communication in the] Book of God.

So he who accepts the duties to God [laid down] in His Book should accept the sunna of the Apostle by God's command ordering His creatures to obey the Apostle and to have recourse to his decision. For he who accepts [a duty] on the authority of the Apostle accepts it from God, since God has imposed the obligation to obey [the Prophet].²⁹

The acceptance of [all the duties] laid down in both the Book of God and the sunna of the Apostle means the acceptance of each one as imposed by God, despite the differing reasons for the acceptance of what He permitted or prohibited, commanded, or punished in various ways as He pleased, glorified be His praise. For He said "He will not be questioned about what He does, but they will be questioned" [Q. XXI, 23].

24. Shāfi'ī said: ³⁰ God, Blessed and Most High, said:

And from whatever place thou hast gone forth, turn thy face in the direction of the Sacred Mosque; and wherever you may be, turn your faces in its direction [Q. II, 145].

Thus [God] laid down the duty that wherever men may be they must turn their faces in the direction [of the Sacred Mosque].³¹

The [use of the] term "direction" means that if the object [the Sacred Mosque] is seen, then [the prayer] in that direction is determined [by sight]; but if [the Mosque] is out of sight, the direction is determined by ijtihād (personal reasoning) — that is all that one is required to do.

God said:

It is He who has appointed for you the stars, that by them you may be guided through the darkness of land and sea [Q. VI, 97].

And He said:

And by landmarks and by the stars they might be guided [Q. XVI, 16].

Thus [God] has set landmarks [for men to be guided by] and erected the Sacred Mosque in whose direction they were ordered to turn their faces [in prayer]. Their turning in that direction [is determined either] by the landmarks set up by Him or by the reasoning powers which He implanted in them to recognize the landmarks. All this is a clear declaration and a favor from Him, glorious be His praise.

25. And He said:

And call in as witnesses two persons of just character from among yourselves [Q. LXV, 2].

³⁰ Būlāq ed., p. 7.

³¹ Part of paragraph 105 to the end of paragraph 110 [Shākir's ed.] are omitted because they merely explain the literal meaning of the words shatr, and jiha, equivalent to "toward" or "direction" (i.e., of the Sacred Mosque in Makka).

And He said:

Such witnesses as you approve of [Q. II, 282].

[God] specified that [the person] of just character is he who acts in accordance with [the command to obey God]. Thus any one who seemed to be acting in accordance with [the command to obey God] was regarded as of just character, and any one who acted contrary [to the command to obey God] was regarded as lacking in just character.

26. [God], glorified be His praise, said:

Do not kill game when you are in pilgrim sanctity; whoever of you kill it intentionally, there shall be compensation equal to what he has killed from [his] flocks, as two persons of just character among you shall decide—an offering to be delivered at the Ka'ba [Q. V, 96].

Equal compensation in kind literally means the nearest in size to the body [of the game killed]. The viewpoints of the Companions of the Apostle who expressed an opinion on game are at one that compensation should be the nearest in size to the body of the game. We should therefore examine the game killed, and whatever of the livestock is found to resemble it in size should be paid in compensation.

Equal compensation in kind for the livestock does not mean compensation in price save in a far-fetched interpretation. Of the two meanings, the literal is the more appropriate. This [literal meaning] is sought by ijtihad, which any man who makes a decision should apply in [determining] equal compensation.

27. This kind of [legal] knowledge is an example of what I have already discussed, [namely], that no one at all should [give an opinion] on a specific matter by merely saying: It is permitted or prohibited, unless he is certain of [legal] knowledge, and this knowledge must be based on the Qur'an and the sunna, or [derived] from ijma' (consensus) and qiyas (analogy). The subject dealt with in this chapter belongs to analogy, on the strength of which the right direction in prayer, just character, and equal compensation are to be determined. 839

Analogy is [the method of reasoning] through which indications are sought from parallel precedents in the Qur'ān or the sunna—since these are the authoritative sources of the truth—in determining what I have already stated such as the direction in prayer, just character, and equal compensation. [Analogy's] conformity [to precedent] should be based on two conditions:

The first is that God or His Apostle have either prohibited a certain act³² by an [explicit] text [in the Qur'ān and the sunna] or permitted it by an [implied] reason. If such a reason is found in the absence of a specific text in the Book or the sunna, the act should be prohibited or permitted in conformity with the [implied] reason of permission or prohibition.

[The second] is that we may find a certain act analogous to only one aspect of a certain precedent and analogous to another aspect of another precedent, but neither the latter nor the former provides a close analogy. In such a case, analogy should be applied to the closest one as I have stated [in] the example of the killing of game.

28. Shāfi'ī said: There are two [categories of] viewpoints concerning [legal] knowledge: one of them is ijmā' (agreement) and the other is ikhtilāf (disagreement). These will be dealt with elsewhere [in this book].³³ A case in point of our knowledge of the Book of God is that the entire Book of God has been revealed in the Arab tongue. And [our] knowledge of the abrogating and abrogated [communications] of the Book of God,³⁴ the duties imposed [by God] through His revelations, the ethics [of the Book], guidance and permissibility [as provided in the Book]. And knowledge of the position in which God has placed His Prophet as it is precisely defined in the commands of His Book and in the utterances of His Prophet; and of what He meant by the sum 840

³² Shāfi'ī uses the broad term shay' which means, literally, a thing.

total of the duties imposed by Him and upon whom [they are binding], whether upon all His creatures or only upon some of them, rather than others; and [the obligation] laid down by God ordering obedience to His Prophet and recourse to his decision; and knowledge of the parables demonstrating obedience to God and indicating how to avoid disobedience to Him as well as how to avoid missing one's own fortune and how to increase supererogatory favor [are all provided in the Book of God].

It is the duty of those who have [legal] knowledge never to express an opinion unless it is based on certainty. There are cases where men have discussed matters relating to [legal] knowledge when, if only they had abstained from so doing, abstention would have been more appropriate and safer, I trust.

Chapter III

[ON LEGAL KNOWLEDGE]¹

29. Someone asked me: ² What is [legal] knowledge and how much should men know of it?

30. Shāfi'ī replied: Legal knowledge is of two kinds: one is for the general public, and no sober and mature person should be ignorant of it.

31. He asked: For example?

32. [Shāfi'ī] replied: For example, that the daily prayers are five,³ that men owe it to God to fast the month of Ramaḍān, to make the pilgrimage to the [Sacred] House whenever they are able, and to [pay] the legal alms in their estate; that He [God] has prohibited usury,⁴ adultery, homicide, theft, [the drinking of] wine, and [everything] of that sort which He has obligated men to comprehend, to perform, to pay in their property, and to abstain from [because] He has forbidden it to them.

This kind of knowledge may be found textually in the Book of God, or may be found generally among the people of Islam. The public relates it from the preceding public and ascribes it to the Apostle of God, nobody ever questioning its ascription or its binding force upon them. It is the kind of knowledge which admits of error neither in its narrative nor in its interpretation; it is not permissible to question it.

33. He asked: What is the second kind?

34. Shāfi'ī replied: It consists of the detailed duties and rules obligatory on men, concerning which there exists neither a text in the Book of God, nor regarding most of them, a sunna. Whenever a sunna exists [in this case], it is of the kind related by few authorities, not by the public, and is subject to different interpretations arrived at by analogy.

35. He asked: Is [legal knowledge of] this kind as obligatory as the other, or is it not obligatory so that he who acquires such knowledge performs a supererogatory act, and he who neglects it falls not into error? Or, is there a third kind, derived from a narrative (khabar) or analogy?

36. [Shāfi'ī] replied: There is a third kind [of knowledge].

37. He asked: Will you explain it, give its source, and state what [portion] of it is obligatory, and on whom it is binding and on whom it is not binding?

38. [Shāfi'ī] replied: The public is incapable of knowing this kind of knowledge, nor can all specialists obtain it. But those who do obtain it should not all neglect it. If some can obtain it, the others are relieved of the duty [of obtaining it]; but those who do obtain it will be rewarded.

39. He asked: Will you cite a narrative or any other relevant information as a basis for [using] analogy?

40. [Shāfi'ī] replied: God has imposed the [duty of] jihād as laid down in His Book and uttered by His Prophet's tongue. He stressed the calling [of men to fulfil] the jihād [duty]⁶ as follows:

God has bought from the believers their selves and their possessions against [the gift of] Paradise. They fight in the way of God; they kill, and are killed; that is a promise binding upon God in the Torah and Gospel and the Qur'ān; and who fulfils his covenant better than God? So rejoice in the bargain you have made with Him. That is the mighty triumph [Q. IX, 112].

⁶ For the legal meaning of jihād, see M. Khadduri, War and Peace in the Law of Islam, Chap. 5.

And He said:

Fight the polytheists totally as they fight you totally; * and know that God is with the godfearing [Q. IX, 36].

And He said:

Slay the polytheists wherever you find them, and take them, and confine them, and lie in ambush for them everywhere. But if they repent and perform the prayer and pay the zakāt, then set them free. God is All-forgiving, All-compassionate [Q. IX, 5].

And He said:

Fight those who do not believe in God nor in the Last Day, who do not forbid what God and His Apostle have made forbidden, and who do not practice the religion of truth, of those who have been given the Book, until they pay the jizya out of hand and have been humbled [Q. IX, 29].

41. 'Abd al-'Azīz b. Muḥammad al-Darāwardī⁷ told us from Muḥammad b. 'Amr b. 'Alqama from Abū Salama [b. 'Abd al-Raḥmān] from Abū Hurayra, who said that the Apostle of God said:

I shall continue to fight the unbelievers until they say: 'There is no god but God,' if they make this pronouncement they shall be secured their blood and property, unless taken for its price, and their reward shall be given by God.⁸

And God, glorified be His praise, said:

O believers, what is the matter with you, that when it is said to

* Bell's substitution of the word "continuously" is fitting in this communication, but it alters the literal meaning of the text. See Richard Bell, The Qur'ān, Vol. I, p. 178.

⁸ See Abū Dāwūd, Sunan (Cairo, 1935), Vol. III, p. 44.

you: 'Go forth in the way of God,' you sink down to the ground? Are you so content with this present life as to neglect the Hereafter? The enjoyment of this life is little in comparison with the Hereafter. If you do not go forth, He will inflict upon you a painful punishment, and instead of you He will substitute another people; and you will not hurt Him at all, for God is powerful over everything [Q. IX, 38-39].

And He said:

Go forth, light and heavy! Struggle in God's way with your possessions and yourselves! That is better for you, did you but know [Q. IX, 41].

42. [Shāfi'i] said: These communications mean that the jihād, and rising up in arms in particular, is obligatory for all able-bodied [believers], exempting no one, just as prayer, pilgrimage and [payment of] alms are performed, and no person is permitted to perform the duty for another, since performance by one will not fulfil the duty for another.

They may also mean that the duty of [jihād] is a collective (kifāya) duty different from that of prayer: Those who perform it in the war against the polytheists will fulfil the duty and receive the supererogatory merit, thereby preventing those who have stayed behind from falling into error.

But God has not put the two [categories of men] on an equal footing, for He said:

Such believers who sit at home—unless they have an injury—are not the equals of those who fight in the path of God with their possessions and their selves. God has given precedence to those who fight with their possessions and their selves over those who sit at home. God has promised the best of things to both, and He has preferred those who fight over those who sit at home by [granting them] a mighty reward [Q. IV, 97].

The literal meaning of this communication is that the duty is obligatory on all men.⁹

⁹ Cf. Būlāq ed., p. 51, which incorporates this statement with the question of the interlocutor. See Shākir's comment in the Risāla, p. 364, n. 2.

43. He asked: Where is the proof for your opinion that if some people perform the duty, the others would be relieved of punishment?

44. [Shāfi'ī] said: It is in the communication [that I have just cited].

45. He asked: In what part of it?

46. [Shāfi'ī] replied: God said: "Yet to each God has promised the best of things."

Thus God has promised "the best of things" for those who stayed behind and could not go to the jihād, although he clearly specified his preference for those who went to the jihād over those who stayed at home. If those who stayed at home were in error, while others were fighting, they would be committing a sin, unless God forgives them, rather than receiving "the best of things."

47. He asked: Is there any other [proof]?

48. [Shāfi'ī] replied: Yes, God said:

It is not for the believers to go forth all together, but why should not a party of every section of them go forth, to become learned in religion, and to warn their people when they return to them, perhaps they will beware [Q. IX, 123].

[When] the Apostle went to battle he was accompanied by some of his companions while others stayed at home; for 'Alī b. Abī Ṭālib stayed at home during the battle of Tabūk. Nor did God ordain that all Muslims were under obligation to go to battle, for He said: "Why should not a party of every section of them go forth?" So He made it known that going into battle was obligatory on some, not on all, [just] as knowledge of the law is not obligatory on all but on some, save the fundamental duties which should be known to all men. But God knows best.

they are performed by some Muslims collectively, those who do not perform them will not fall in error.

If all men failed to perform the duty so that no able-bodied man went forth to battle, all, I am afraid, would fall into error (although I am certain that this would never happen) in accordance with [God's] saying:

If you do not go forth, He will inflict upon you a painful punishment. [Q. IX, 39].

50. He asked: What is the meaning [of this communication]? § 36

51. [Shāfi'i] replied: It means¹² that it is not permissible that all men should fail to "go forth"; but that if some go forth, so that a sufficient number fulfils [the collective duty], the others do not fall into error, because the going forth by some would fulfil the [duty of] 'going forth.'

52. He asked: Are there examples other than the jihād?

53. [Shāfi'i] replied: [Yes, such as] the funeral and burial prayers, the performance of which should not be neglected; but men are not all under the obligation to attend to their performance, for those who perform them will relieve those who do not from falling into error. § 36

In the same [category falls the duty to] reply to a salutation. For God said:

When you are greeted with a greeting, respond with a better one, or return it. Verily God keeps account of everything [Q. IV, 88].

The Apostle of God said:

He who is standing shall greet him who is sitting. If [only] one replies to a greeting, he would fulfil [the duty] on behalf of the others.¹³

These are merely intended to mean that a reply must be made. So the response of the few fulfils the duty for all who are obligated to reply, for the [collective] response is sufficient.

¹² Literally: "The indication in it."

¹³ Mālik, al-Muwatta', ed. M. F. 'Abd al-Bāqī (Cairo, 1951), Vol. II, p. 959; Abū Dāwūd, Vol. IV, p. 351.

So far as I have been informed, the Muslims have continued to act as I have stated, from the time of the Prophet to the present. Only a few men must know the law, attend the funeral service, perform the jihād and respond to greeting, while others are exempt. So those who know the law, perform the jihād, attend the funeral service, and respond to a greeting will be rewarded, while others do not fall into error since a sufficient number fulfil the [collective] duty.

Chapter IV

[ON THE BOOK OF GOD]

[Arabic Character of the Qur'ān]¹

54. One of them said: There are in the Qur'ān Arabic and foreign [words].

55. Shāfi'ī replied: ² The Qur'ān indicates that there is no portion in the Book of God that is not in the Arab tongue. He who expressed such an opinion [concerning foreign words in the Qur'ān] may have found some [men] who accepted it by [sheer] submission (taqlid) ³ to his authority, leaving the matter of proof up to him and to those who have disagreed with him. However, by mere submission they have neglected [their duty]; God forgiveth them and us.⁴ But, perhaps, he who expressed the opinion that there are in the Qur'ān [words] which are not of the Arab tongue—and his opinion was accepted by others—meant that there are certain particular [words] which are not understood by some Arabs.

Of all tongues, that of the Arabs is the richest and the most extensive in vocabulary. Do we know any man except a prophet who apprehended all of it? However, no portion of it escapes everyone, so that there is always someone who knows it. Knowledge [of this tongue] to the Arabs is like the knowledge of the sunna to the jurists (fuqahā'): We know of no one who possesses a knowledge of all the sunna without missing a portion of it. So if the knowledge of all the scholars is gathered together, the entire sunna would be known. [However], if the knowledge of each scholar is taken separately, each might be found lacking in some portion of it, yet what each may lack can be found among the others.

³ Literally: "imitation." This word is used as the opposite of ijtihād or the exercise of personal reasoning.

They [the scholars] may be divided into various classes: Those who possess the greater portion [of the sunna], although they may have lacked some of it, and others who know less than the others. The little of the sunna which may not be known to [the scholar] who possesses the greater part of it is not evidence that knowledge of it should be sought from [scholars of] another class, but that what is lacking should rather be sought from among his colleagues [of the same class] until the entire sunna of the beloved Prophet⁶ is gathered by each scholar separately. They [the scholars] vary as to the degree of their comprehension [of the sunna].

In like manner is the [knowledge concerning the] tongue of the Arabs by the scholars⁶ and the public: No part of it will be missed by them all, nor should it be sought from other [people]; for no one can learn [this tongue] save he who has learned it from [the Arabs], nor can anyone be as fluent [in this tongue] as they unless he has followed them in the way they learned it. He who has learned it from them should be regarded as one of the people of that tongue.

Those who have adopted [tongues] other [than the Arabic], have done so because they have neglected [this tongue]; if they return to it, they will belong to its people.

Knowledge of the [Arabic] tongue is more widely spread among the majority of Arabs than knowledge of the sunna among the scholars.⁷

⁶ Literally: "Whom I love more than my father and mother."

⁶ al-Khāṣṣa literally means the few, i. e. the scholars.

⁷ Būlāq ed., "Among the majority of the scholars," p. 8.

56. If someone says: May we not find some foreigners who [are capable of] uttering some [words] in the Arab tongue?

This may be explained, as I have said, by the possibility of learning them from [the Arabs]; otherwise * none could [possibly] utter more than a few [words]. And he who has uttered a few [words] will be [regarded as] belonging to the Arabs.

But we do not deny that [there may exist] in foreign tongues certain words, whether acquired or transmitted, which may be similar to those of the Arab tongue, just as some words in one foreign tongue may be similar to those in others, although these [tongues are spoken in] separate countries and are different and unrelated to one another despite the similarity in some of the words. 84

57. Someone may ask: What is the proof that the Book of God was [communicated] in a pure Arab tongue, unmixed with others?

58. [Shāfi'i replied]: The proof is [to be found] in the Book of God [itself], for God said:

We never sent any messenger save with the tongue of his people [Q. XIV, 4]. 85

59. But if someone says: [Each of] the messengers before Muḥammad was sent to his own people, while Muḥammad was sent to all mankind. This may either mean that [Muḥammad] was sent with the tongue of his people and that all others must learn his tongue—or whatever they can learn of it—or that Muḥammad was sent with the tongues of all [mankind]. Is there any evidence that he was sent with the tongue of his own people rather than with foreign tongues? 85

60. Shāfi'i replied: * Since tongues vary so much that different [people] cannot understand one another, some must adopt the language of the others. And preference must be given to the tongue which others adopt.

The people who are fit to receive such a preference are those

* Literally: "For if he were not of those who learned it from them."

* Būlāq ed., p. 9; Shāfi'i's reply begins with the statement: "The evidence for it is to be found in the Book of God."

whose tongue is their Prophet's tongue. It is not permissible—but God knows best—for the people of [the Prophet's] tongue to become the followers of peoples whose tongues are other than that [of the Prophet] even in a single letter; but rather all other tongues should follow his tongue, and all the peoples of earlier religions should follow his religion. For God has declared this in more than one communication of His Book. He said:

Verily it is the revelation of the Lord of the worlds, brought down by the Faithful Spirit, upon thy heart, that thou mayest be of those who warn, in a clear Arabic tongue [Q. XXVI, 192-195].

And He said:

Thus have We sent it down as an Arabic Law [Q. XIII, 37].

And He said:

And so We have revealed to thee an Arabic Qur'ān in order that thou mayest warn the Mother of the Towns and the people of its vicinity [Q. XLII, 5].

§ 46

And He said:

Hā' Mīm ¹⁰

By the clear Book

Behold, We have made it an Arabic Qur'ān, perchance ye will understand [Q. XLIII, 1-2].

And He said:

An Arabic Qur'ān with no crookedness in it, perchance they will be Godfearing [Q. XXXIX, 29].

61. Shāfi'ī said: Thus [God] has given evidence in each of the [foregoing] communications that His Book is Arabic, and He confirmed this by His disavowal—glorified be His praise—of any other tongue than the Arab tongue in two [further] communications of His Book.

[God], the Blessed and Most High, said:

¹⁰ These are some of the obscure letters that are found at the beginning of certain Quranic chapters.

We know well that they say: 'It is only a human being who teaches him'; the tongue of him they hint at is foreign, but this is a clear Arabic tongue [Q. XVI, 105].

And He said:

If We had made it a foreign Qur'ān, they would have said: Why are not its communications made distinct? What, foreign and Arabic [Q. XLI, 44]?

62. Shāfi'ī said: He [God] has made us cognizant of the significance of His favors¹¹ by virtue of the [Prophet's] place with which He has favored us. For He said:

There has come to you a messenger from among yourselves, grievous to him is your suffering, watchful he is over you, and with the believers, he is gentle and compassionate [Q. IX, 129]. § 47

And He said:

It is He who has raised up among the untutored people a messenger from among them to recite to them His signs, and to purify them, and to teach them the Book and the Wisdom, though they were hitherto in manifest error [Q. LXII, 2].

Among those favors which [God] made His Prophet cognizant of, is what He said [to him]:

It is assuredly a reminder to thee and thy people [Q. XLIII, 43].

Thus [God] has favored the [Prophet's] people by associating their name with his name in His Book.

And He said:

And warn thy clan, thy nearest kin [Q. XXVI, 214].

And He said:

In order that thou mayest warn the Mother of the Towns and those around it [Q. XLII, 5].

The Mother of the Towns is Makka,¹² the city [of the ¹¹ Būlāq ed., p. 9.

¹² All Muslim commentators are agreed that the Mother of Towns is Makka. Richard Bell, however, suggests that it is probably Madīna. See Richard Bell, The Qur'ān, Vol. II, p. 484, n. 3.

Prophet] and of His people. Thus [God] mentioned them in His Book as a special [people] and included them among those who were warned as a whole, and decreed that they were to be warned in their Arabic tongue—the tongue of the [Prophet's] people in particular.

It is obligatory upon every Muslim to learn the Arab tongue to the utmost of his power in order [to be able] to profess through it that "there is no God at all but God and Muḥammad is His servant and Apostle," and to recite in it [i. e., the Arabic tongue] the Book of God, and to utter in mentioning what is incumbent upon him, the takbīr,¹³ and what is commanded, the tasbīḥ,¹⁴ the tashahhud¹⁵ and others.

Whatever is additional of the language which God made to be the language of him [Muḥammad] by whom He sealed His prophethood and by whom He revealed the last of His Books—is for his [man's] welfare, just as it is his [duty] to learn [how] to pray and recite the dhikr¹⁶ in it, to visit the [Sacred] House¹⁷ and perform its duties, to turn [in prayer] in the direction to which he should turn,¹⁸ and to be a follower [in the performance] of the duties imposed upon him or recommended to him, [rather] than to be followed.

63. Shāfi'ī said: ¹⁹ [The reason] I began to explain why the Qur'ān was communicated in the Arab tongue rather than in another, is that no one who understands clearly the total meanings of the [legal] knowledge of the Book of God would be ignorant of the extensiveness of that tongue and of the various meanings [of its words] to be found [just as] there are various words for a certain meaning. to one who is ignorant of [the Arab tongue] will disappear from him who knows it.

Calling the attention of the public to the fact that the Qur'ān was communicated in the Arab tongue in particular is [a sincere piece of] advice to [all] Muslims. This advice is a duty imposed upon them which must not be put aside and is the attainment of a supererogatory act of goodness which no one will neglect except him who makes himself foolish and who abandons the field of good fortune. Included in faithfulness is that the truth²⁰ shall be explained to them. Both the fulfilment of what is right and faithfulness to the Muslims are [embodied in our obligation of] obedience to God. And obedience to God embraces all good.

64. Shāfi'ī said: ²¹ Sufyān b. 'Uyayna told us from Ziyād b. 'Ilāqa, who said: I have heard Jarīr b. 'Abd-Allāh saying: "I have paid homage to the Prophet that [I will be] faithful to every Muslim."²²

Ibn 'Uyayna [also] told us from Suhayl b. Abī Šālih from 'Aṭā' b. Yazīd [al-Laythī] from Tamīm al-Dārī, that the Prophet said: "Religion is faithfulness," repeated three times. "To whom?" the Prophet was asked.²³ "To God, to His Book, to His Prophet and to all the Muslims, their leaders and their public," he replied.²⁴

65. Shāfi'ī said: God has addressed His Book to the Arabs in their tongue in accordance with the meanings known to them. Included [in the words] "in accordance with the meanings they know" was the extensiveness of their tongue.

It is [God's] divine disposition to express something, part of which is literally general which is intended to be obviously general with the first part [of the phrase] not needing the second. [Something] "literally general" means that [the concept of] the particular is included in the general; that is indicated by some [of the words] expressed. Also "literally general" means [only] what is particular, with the word literally recognized in its context to mean what is not literally so. Knowledge of all of this is to be found either in the beginning of what is said or in the middle or at the end.

[The Arabs] may begin the subject of a speech whose first word makes the last clear; and they may begin a speech whose last word makes the first clear. And they may speak about [a certain] subject, in which they indicate the meaning—just as gestures indicate—without clarifying it with words. To them this [kind of speech] is of the highest order which only their learned understand, not those who are unlearned. They [also] call [a certain] object by several names, and one word may have several meanings.

All these [categories of] meanings which I have discussed are known to the scholars, although the things they know may vary: [some] having knowledge of some quite well, while others are ignorant of that part of the [Arab] tongue—in which the Book of God was communicated and the sunna uttered—are unfamiliar with them. Whoever undertakes, therefore, to speak in the language they [the Arabs] know, undertakes something part of which he does not know. And whoever was in error without excuse whenever he spoke about something of which his knowledge did not embrace the difference between what was wrong and right.²⁵

²⁵ Since the Qur'ān contains quite a few foreign words, the question has often been raised whether these do not qualify the Arabic character which the Qur'ān stresses. There are two schools of thought concerning this question. The early school, whose best exponents were Ibn 'Abbās (d. 68/687), leading authority in Makka, and Shāfi'ī, argued that although the Arabic language was rich in its vocabulary, it was bound to have certain words in common with other languages. A later school of thought maintained that foreign words had been adopted by the Arabs in an early age, before the Qur'ān was communicated, and had become an integral part of the Arabic language. Thus when the Qur'ān was revealed in "the Arabic language," those words had already been Arabicized.

General Declaration of the Book Intended to be General in Which the Particular Is Included

66. Shāfi'ī said: ²⁶ God, Blessed and Most High, said:

God is the creator of everything, and He of everything is a guardian [Q. XXXIX, 63].

It is God who hath created the heavens and the earth [Q. XIV, 37].

And He said:

There is not a living creature ²⁷ in the earth but God is responsible for its sustenance [Q. XI, 8].

These are examples of general declarations in which no particular is included.

67. Shāfi'ī said: Everything, including the heaven and the earth, things having living spirit, trees and the like—God has created them all. And God is responsible for the sustenance of every living creature and He knows its lodging place and its repository.²⁸

And God said:

It is not for the people of Madina or for the Beduin round about them to tarry behind the Apostle of God or to prefer their own lives to his [Q. IX, 121].

Al-Shātibī (d. 790/1388) argues that there is no question that the Qur'ān contains foreign words but that, generally speaking, the Book was communicated in the Arabic language and that it cannot be understood save in the way the Arabic language is understood. See al-Shātibī, Vol. I, pp. 64-66; al-Ghazzālī, Vol. I, p. 68; al-Suyūṭī, al-Itqān Fī Ulūm al-Qur'ān (Cairo, 1370/1951), Vol. I, pp. 135-40; and Arthur Jeffery, Foreign Vocabulary of the Qur'ān (Baroda, 1938).

²⁸ A citation from Q. XI, 8.

The meaning implied in this communication is like the previous one; it specifies those men who [take part] in the jihād, whether they are able to fulfil the jihād [duty] or not, and that none should put himself before the Prophet. There is in this communication a general as well as a particular [declaration].

And [God] said:

And the oppressed—men, women and children—who say: Our Lord, take us out of this city of wrong-doing people [Q. IV, 77].

S 54

In the same [category] falls God's saying:

So . . . until when the two of them came to the people of a city, they asked the people for food, but they refused to receive them hospitably [Q. XVIII, 76].

There is an indication in this communication that not all the people of the town were asked for food. So this communication has the same meaning [as the preceding one].

Moreover, there is in it as well as in [the communication concerning] the "city of wrong-doing people," a particular [declaration], since not all the people of the town were wrong-doing; there lived among them Muslims [too], but they were a few among many others.

There are [several] other examples in the Qur'ān, but these are sufficient, I trust; and there are examples in the sunna cited in their proper places [of this book].

The Explicit General Declaration of the Book In Which the General and the Particular Are Included

68. Shāfi'ī said: ²⁰ God, Blessed and Most High, said:

O ye people, We have created you male and female and made you peoples and tribes, that you may know one another. Verily, ²⁰ Bulāq ed., p. 10.

the noblest among you in the sight of God is the most godfearing of you [Q. XLIX, 13].

And [God], Blessed and Most High, said:

O ye who have believed, fasting is prescribed for you as it was for those before you; perhaps you will be godfearing. A certain number of days; but if any of you be sick or on a journey, then a number of other days [Q. II, 179-80].

And He said:

Verily the Prayer has become for the believers a thing prescribed for stated times [Q. IV, 104].

69. [Shāfiʿī] said: It is evident from the Book of God that general and particular [declarations] are included in the two [foregoing] communications.

As to the general, it is in God's saying:

S 56

We have created you male and female and made you peoples and tribes, that you may know one another [Q. XLIX, 13].

For all souls addressed by this communication, whether in the time of the Prophet or before or after him, were created male or female, and [made] peoples and tribes.

The particular may be found in God's saying:

The noblest among you in the sight of God is the most God-fearing [Q. XLIX, 13].

For fear of God is obligatory on [the person] who can comprehend it and who belongs to those who are mature of the descendants of Adam, excluding the beasts, the lunatics and children who have not yet come of age, including those who can comprehend what fear of God means.

No one should be regarded as god-fearing—or not god-fearing—unless he is capable of comprehending [its meaning] and belongs to [the class of] God-fearing people; if he acts contrary to it, he belongs to another class. The Book as well as the sunna bear witness to what I have discussed. For the Prophet said:

No obligation is imposed on three: the one asleep, until he awakes; the child, until he comes of age; and the lunatic, until he recovers.³⁰ 37

Divine legislation concerning fasting and prayer belongs to the same [category]: They are obligatory upon the mature and the sane—excluding those who are not mature or who are mature but insane—and menstruant women during the period of menstruation.

The Explicit General Declaration of the Book Intended To Be All Particular

70. Shāfi'ī said: ³¹ God, Blessed and Most High, said:

Those to whom the people said: 'The people [i. e., the enemy] have gathered against you, so be afraid of them.' But it increased them in faith, and they said: 'It is on God that we count, and a good guardian is He' [Q. III, 167].

71. Shāfi'ī said: Since there were with the Apostle people other than those who gathered against them [i. e., his people], and those who informed [his people] were people other than those who gathered or were with him—these [also] were certain people—the evidence of the Qur'ān ³² is, therefore, clear from what I have stated that [the Prophet] has gathered for them certain people, excluding others.

[Legal] knowledge conveys certainty that the whole people did not gather against them, nor inform them, nor were they [i. e., the informed] the whole of the people.

Since the term "people" may either be applied to [a minimum of] three persons or to all the people or to any number between three and all, it is correct in the Arab tongue to say

³⁰ This tradition was transmitted on the authority of 'Ā'isha and 'Alī. For the transmission from 'Ā'isha, see Abū Dāwūd, Vol. IV, pp. 140-41; and for the transmission from 'Alī, see Ibn Hanbal, Vol. II, pp. 188, 197, 279, 335, 348-49.

³¹ Būlāq ed., p. 11.

that "those to whom the people said" may constitute [only] four persons, and that "the people who have gathered against you," are those who have departed, from [the battle of] Uhud.⁸²

Yet these are not too many people [despite the fact that] those who gathered are different from those who gathered against, and those who informed are different from both. But the greater number of the people are those [who remained] in their towns who are other than those people who gathered, those who gathered against and those who informed.

72. [Shāfi'ī] said: And He [God] said:

O ye people, a parable is coined, so listen to it: Verily those to whom you pray, apart from God, will not create a fly, even if they were to join together to do it; and if a fly were to snatch anything from them, they would never rescue it from him. Feeble indeed are the beseecher and the besought [Q. XXII, 72].

The ⁸⁴ meaning commonly implied by this word [i. e., people] is general, applying to all people. But it is clear to those learned in the Arab tongue that the meaning implied [here] is some of the people, excluding others. For no other [people] were addressed by this communication except those who worship other gods than God—exalted be He over what they say—since there are among them believers who are lunatics and minors who do not worship [other] gods than Him.

73. [Shāfi'ī] said: The meaning implied in this text falls in the same category as the foregoing one, according to those who are learned in the Arab tongue; but the former seems to be clearer to persons who are not among the learned, owing to several [clear] indications in it.

74. Shāfi'ī said: God, Blessed and Most High, said:

Then pour forth from where the people have poured forth [Q. II, 195].

⁸² The people who gathered against the Prophet were the Makkans, who fought Muhammad at the battle of Uhud in 3/625. See Tabari's Tafsir, Vol. VII, pp. 404-405. For the battle of Uhud see Ibn Hishām, Vol. II, pp. 555-56; trans. Guillaume, pp. 370 ff.; W. Montgomery Ward, Muhammad at Medina (Oxford, 1956), pp. 21-29.

It is certain that not all the people had been present at 'Arafa ⁸⁶ in the time of the Apostle, and that it was [only] the Apostle and those who had been with him were those to whom this communication was addressed. But it is correct in the Arab tongue to say: "Pour forth from where the people have poured forth," meaning [only] some of the people.

75. Shāfi'ī said: ⁸⁶ The meaning of this communication falls in the same category as the two foregoing ones, and is so regarded by the Arabs. The first communication is clearer than the second to those who are ignorant of the Arab tongue, and the second is clearer to them than the third; but to the Arabs there is no difference in clarity among the three, since the one possessing the least clarity is as adequate [for comprehension] as the one that is clearest to them. For the one who listens wants only to comprehend the [meaning of the] saying of one who speaks: the least [meaning] that makes him comprehend would be sufficient. 861

76. [Shāfi'ī said]: God, glorious be His praise, said:

People and stones ⁸⁷ are its fuel [Q. II, 22].

The Book of God indicates that [only] some of the people would be the fuel, in accordance with God's saying:

Verily those to whom the best [reward] has already [been decreed] by us—they from it will be far removed [Q. XXI, 101].

⁸⁶ Būlāq ed., p. 11.

⁸⁷ Probably brimstone (see Richard Bell, The Qur'ān, Vol. I, p. 5, n. 3).

Category [of Declaration] the Meaning of Which Is Clarified by the Context

77. Shāfi'ī said: ⁸⁸ God, Blessed and Most High, said:

And ask them about the town which was bordering the sea, when its inhabitants transgressed the sabbath. Their fish came to them on the day of their sabbath, right to the shore, but on the day when they did not keep sabbath, they did not come to them. Thus were we trying them for their ungodliness [Q. VII, 163].

[God], glorious be His praise, has at first mentioned the subject concerning the town that was bordering the sea; but when He stated "they transgressed the sabbath," He obviously meant the people of the town, since the town [itself] can neither transgress nor deviate from the sabbath or other [matters]. Thus by transgression [God] meant the people of the town whom He tried for their violation [of the Sabbath]. 862

And He said:

How many a town which was doing wrong have We broken up, and set up after it another people. When they sensed Our power, there they were from it running [Q. XXI, 11-12]:

The meaning implied in this communication falls in the same category as the previous one. [God] mentioned the town which was broken up, but when He said it was doing wrong, it is evident that those who were doing wrong were only the people [of the town], not the houses, which [obviously] have nothing to do with wrongdoing. And when [God] mentioned the people who were established after its destruction and their sense of power of Our [i. e., God's] attack, it is [quite] certain that he who can sense [Our] power can only be a human being who knows what power is. 863

⁸⁸ Būlāq ed., p. 11.

Category [of Declaration] the Wording of Which Indicates the Implicit, not the Explicit [Meaning]

78. God, Blessed and Most High, citing the saying of Joseph's brothers to their father, said:

We testify only to what we know, and against the unseen we could not guard. Ask the town in which we have been, and the caravan with which we have come; verily we speak the truth [Q. XII, 81-82].

[The meaning of] this communication [falls in the same category] as the previous one, on which those learned in the [Arab] tongue do not disagree, that [Joseph's brothers] spoke to their father about a matter which touches the people of the town and those of the caravan, since the town and the caravan [by themselves] cannot tell what the truth was.

General [Declaration] Which the Sunna Specifically Indicates Is Meant To Be Particular

79. God, glorious be His praise, said:

And his parents each receive a sixth of what he has left, if he has children; but if he has no children and his heirs are his parents, then his mother receives a third; if, however, he has brothers, his mother receives a sixth [Q. IV, 12].

And He said:

And half of what your wives leave belongs to you if they have no children; but if they have children, a fourth of what they have belongs to you, after any bequests may have been made or debts [have been paid]. . . . To them belongs a fourth of what you leave, if you have no children; if you have children, an eighth of what you leave belongs to them, after any bequests you may have made or debts [have been paid]. If a man—or a woman—whose property is inherited has no direct heirs, but has a brother or a sister, each of the two receives a sixth; if they be more than that, they share in a third, after any bequests you may have made or debts [have been paid], without prejudice one to the other; a charge from God; verily God is knowing, gracious [Q. IV, 13, 15-16].

Thus, [God] made it plain that fathers and wives are among those He named in various circumstances, the terms being general; but the sunna of the Prophet indicated that this is intended to mean only some fathers and wives, excluding others, provided that the religion of the fathers, children and wives is the same [i. e. Islam] and that each heir is neither a killer nor a slave.³⁹

80. And He said:

After any bequests he may have made or debts [have been paid] [Q. IV, 15].

The Prophet made it clear that bequests must not exceed one third [of the deceased's estate], and the heirs receive the two-thirds; and he [also] made it clear that debts take precedence over bequests and inheritance and that neither the bequest nor the inheritance [should be distributed] until the creditors are [first] paid.⁴⁰ 86

Thus if it were not for the evidence of the sunna and the consensus of the people, there would be no inheritance until after the bequest [was paid] and the bequest would not fail to take precedence over the debt, or be on equal footing with the debt.

81. And God said:

When you stand up for Prayer, wash your faces and your hands up to the elbows, and wipe your heads, and your feet up to the ankles [Q. V, 8].

[God], glorious be His praise, meant that the feet are intended to be washed [in the same manner] as the face and the hands. The literal meaning of this communication is that the

⁴⁰ Ibid., pp. 64-68.

[duty of the washing of the] feet cannot be fulfilled save by what fulfils [the duty of washing] the face or wiping the head. However, what was meant by the washing or the wiping of the feet, was not all—but [only] some—of those who perform the [duty of] ablution.⁴¹

Since the Apostle [himself] wiped his shoes and ordered those who wore their shoes in a state of purification to do so, the sunna of the Apostle indicated that [the duty of] the washing or the wiping of the feet meant that [it was obligatory on] some of those who [perform] the duty of ablution, not others.

82. God, Blessed and Most High, said:

As for the thief; male and female, cut off their hands as a retribution for that with which they have charged themselves—a chastisement from God [Q. V, 42].

The Apostle decreed that "Hands should [neither be] cut off [for the stealing] of fruits nor the spadix of a palm tree, and that the hand [of the thief] should not be cut off unless the price of the [thing] stolen is a quarter of a dinār⁴² or more."⁴³

83. And God said:

The fornicatress and the fornicator—scourge each of them with a hundred stripes [Q. XXIV, 2].

And He [God], concerning slave-women, said:

If they, having been taken under iḥṣān,⁴⁴ commit an indecency, they shall be subject to half the punishment to which those under iḥṣān are subject [Q. IV, 30].

Thus the Qur'ān indicated that scourging with a hundred ⁴¹ Ibid., Vol. X, pp. 7-81.

⁴² From the Greek denarion, the gold unit of currency. A dinār was the equivalent of ten, later more, silver dirhams.

⁴³ See Mālik, Vol. II, p. 839; Abū Dāwūd, Vol. IV, pp. 136-37; Cf. Shāfi'ī, Kitāb al-Umm, Vol. VI, p. 118.

stripes is intended [only] for the free, not the slave-women. And when the Apostle stoned rather than scourged the thayyib⁴⁶ adulterer, the sunna of the Prophet specified that the hundred stripes are [the penalty] for the free fornicatress and fornicator; and that the cutting off of the hand of the thief was intended to be [the penalty] for one who steals [a thing] from a secure place⁴⁷ and that the price [of the theft] should be [at least] a quarter of a dinār, excluding other things covered under the terms "theft" and "adultery."

84. God said:

And know that if you have taken anything as a spoil, one-fifth belongs to God and to the Apostle, and to the near of kin, and to orphans, and to the poor and to the wayfarer [Q. VIII, 42]. 87

Since the Apostle [is reported to] have given the Banū Hāshim and the Banū al-Muṭṭalib the portion of the share belonging to "the near of kin,"⁴⁷ the sunna of the Apostle gave evidence that the "near of kin"—whom God made partakers of the one-fifth share—were the Banū Hāshim and the Banū al-Muṭṭalib, not others. 811

Indeed the whole [tribe] of Quraysh is related [to the Prophet]. The [clan of the] Banū 'Abd Shams is related [to the Prophet] equally with the [clan of the] Banū al-Muṭṭalib, for they were all the descendants of the same father and mother, although some members of the Banū al-Muṭṭalib were distinguished by having been descendants from the Banū Hāshim [too], in distinction from others.⁴⁸

Since the portion of the share [belonging to the near of kin]

⁴⁶ The thayyib is a woman who is not a virgin, or a woman whom a man has gone into, or a woman who has become separated from her husband in any manner (by death or divorce).

⁴⁷ I. e., the thing which is well protected, not liable to be picked up by people. See a tradition to this effect in Abū Dāwūd, Vol. IV, p. 138.

⁴⁹ For a study of the Prophet's family relationship with other clans, see Ibn Muṣ'ab al-Zubayrī, Kitāb Nasab Quraysh, ed. E. Lévy-Provençal (Cairo, 1953).

was not given to all who belonged to the Banū al-Muṭṭalib, excluding those whose descent from the Banū Hāshim did not give them a portion of the share, this indicated that they [the Banū Hāshim] obtained a special portion which others did not, only because of their relationship to the stock of [the Prophet], although they supported the Prophet—as they always did—when they entered into his pass (shī'b).⁴⁹ Yet, God, glorious be His praise, did not specify [anything] special for them.

Most certainly [the clan of] the Banū Hāshim belonged to the [tribe of] Quraysh, but none of them was given a share from the one-fifth on account of their descent. The Banū Nawfal [enjoyed] the same [blood] relationship, although they were distinguished on the grounds of their descent from a different mother.

369

85. [Shāfi'ī said]: God said:

And know that if you take anything as spoil, one-fifth belongs to God and to the Apostle [Q. VIII, 42].

Since the Apostle decreed that the booty belongs to the slayer in an attack, the sunna of the Prophet indicated that the spoil, which is subject to the [deduction of the] one-fifth share provided in the Qur'ān, is different from booty, provided that the booty was taken in a battle of attack, in distinction from booty taken otherwise. But the booty taken in [fighting] other than an attack is subject to the one-fifth share in accordance with the sunna, in the same manner as other spoils.⁵⁰

Had it not been for the evidence of the sunna and our decision on the [basis of the] literal [meaning of the Qur'ān], we should have been in favor of punishing everyone to whom the term stealing applies by the cutting off [of the hand]; and

872

of scourging every free thayyib adulterer with a hundred stripes; and of giving the share of the near of kin to everyone related to the Prophet—which might have been extended to many sections of the Arabs, owing to the [Prophet's] blood relationship with them—and of regarding the booty subject to the one-fifth [rule] in the same manner as a spoil, by treating it like other spoils.

[ON THE OBLIGATION OF MAN TO ACCEPT THE AUTHORITY OF THE PROPHET]

*A Declaration Concerning the Duty Imposed by God, as Laid Down in His Book, [Ordering Men] To Follow
the Prophet's Sunna*

86. Shāfi'ī said: God has placed His Apostle—[in relation to] His religion, His commands and His Book—in the position made clear by Him as a distinguishing standard of His religion by imposing the duty of obedience to Him as well as prohibiting disobedience to Him. He has made His merits evident by associating belief in His Apostle with the belief in Him. For God, Blessed and Most High, said:

So believe in God and His Apostles, and do not say: "Three." Refrain; [it will be] better for you. God is only one God. Glory be to Him. His having a son is something alien to him [Q. IV, 169]. S 73

And He said:

The believers are only those who have believed in God and His Apostle, and who when they are with him on some common affair do not go away until they ask his permission [Q. XXIV, 62].

Thus [God] prescribed that the perfect beginning of the faith, to which all other things are subordinate, shall be the belief in Him and then in His Apostle. For if a person believes only in Him, not in His Apostle, the name of the perfect faith¹ will never apply to him until he believes in His Apostle together with Him.²

So the Apostle laid down the sunna [of reciting the Prophet's name together with that of God] for testing the faith of every man [as the following tradition indicates]:

Mālik b. Anas told us from Hilāl b. Usāma from 'Aṭā' b. Yasār from 'Umar b. al-Ḥakam, who said:

I went to the Apostle of God with a slave-girl and I asked him: 'I have taken an oath [to free a slave]; may I free her?' 'Where is God?' the Apostle asked her. 'In heaven,' she answered. 'And who am I?' asked he. 'You are the Apostle of God,' she answered. 'You may free her,' [the Prophet] said.³ §75

[The transmitter's name, 'Umar b. al-Ḥakām]—Shāfi'ī says—should read Mu'āwiya b. al-Ḥakam, for Mālik, I believe, has not correctly reported the name, as others did.

87. Shāfi'ī said: God has imposed the duty on men to obey His divine communications as well as the sunna of His Apostle. For He said in His Book:

O our Lord, raise up amongst them an Apostle, one of themselves, to recite to them Thy signs and to teach them the Book and Wisdom and to purify them. Verily Thou art All-mighty, All-wise [Q. II, 123]. §76

And He, glorious be His praise, said:

And also we have sent among you an Apostle, one of yourselves, to recite to you our signs, and purify you, to teach you the Book and the Wisdom, and to teach you what you did not know [Q. II, 146].

³ Mālik, Vol. II, pp. 776-77.

And He said:

God bestowed a favor upon the believers when He raised up amongst them an Apostle, one of themselves, to recite His signs to them, to purify them and to teach them the Book, although they had formerly been in manifest error [Q. III, 158].

And He, glorious be His praise, said:

It is He who has raised up an Apostle among the untutored people, one of their number to recite to them His signs, to purify them, and to teach them the Book and the Wisdom, though formerly they had been in manifest error [Q. LXII, 2].

And He said:

But remember the goodness which God has shown you and how much of the Book and the Wisdom He has sent down to you to admonish you thereby [Q. II, 231].

And He said:

God has sent down to thee the Book and the Wisdom, and has taught thee what thou did not know before; the bounty of God towards thee is ever great [Q. IV, 113].

And He said:

And call to mind the signs of God and the Wisdom which are recited in your houses; verily God is gentle, well-informed [Q. XXXIII, 34].

S 77

So God mentioned His Book—which is the Qur'ān—and Wisdom, and I have heard that those who are learned in the Qur'ān—whom I approve—hold that Wisdom is the sunna of the Apostle of God. This is like what [God Himself] said; but God knows best! For the Qur'ān is mentioned [first], followed by Wisdom; [then] God mentioned His favor to mankind by teaching them the Qur'ān and Wisdom. So it is not permissible for Wisdom to be called here [anything] save the sunna of the Apostle of God. For [Wisdom] is closely linked to the Book of God, and God has imposed the duty of obedience to His Apostle, and imposed on men the obligation to obey his orders.⁴ So it is not permissible to regard anything as a duty save that set forth in the Qur'ān and the sunna of His Apostle. For [God], as we have [just] stated, prescribed that the belief in His Apostle shall be associated with the belief in Him.

§ 78

The sunna of the Apostle makes evident what God meant [in the text of His Book], indicating His general and particular [commands]. He associated the Wisdom [embodied] in the sunna with his Book, but made it subordinate [to the Book]. Never has God done this for any of His creatures save His Apostle.

God's Command Ordering Obedience to the Apostle Is Both Associated with Obedience to Him and Ordered Independently

88. [Shāfi'ī said]: God said:

When God and His Apostle have decreed a matter, it is not for a believing man or a woman to exercise a choice in a matter affecting him; whoever opposes God and His Apostle has deviated into manifest error [Q. XXXIII, 36].

And He said:

O you who believe, obey God and obey the Apostle and those in authority among you. If you should quarrel about anything, refer it to God and the Apostle, if you believe in God and the Last Day. That is better and fairer in the issue [Q. IV, 62].

Some scholars have held that "those in authority" [means] the commanders of the Apostle's army. That is what more than one commentator has told us. But God knows best.⁵

This is in accord with what [God] said, for the Arabs who had been around Makka knew nothing about command, and [the idea of] some submitting to the command of others was repugnant to them.

When, however, they submitted to [the authority of] the Apostle, they did not think that [such an authority] was fit to reside in any hands other than the Apostle's.

So they were commanded to obey "those in authority"—the ones whom the Apostle appointed, with conditional but not absolute obedience, concerning their rights and duties. However, [God] said: "If you should quarrel about anything, refer it to God," that is, in the event of disagreement.

89. Shāfi'ī said: ⁶ This [i. e., the meaning implied in the latter command] is, if God will, as He said about "those in authority," namely, that "If you should quarrel" (but God knows best), they [the people] and the commander whom they were ordered to obey—should "refer it to God and the Apostle" for a settlement on the basis of what God and His Apostle said, if they know it. If you do not know what God's commands are, you should ask the Apostle, if you are able to reach him,⁷ or any one of you who is able to do so. For this is an obligation concerning which there should be no disagreement, in accordance with God's saying:

When God and His Apostle have decreed a certain matter, it is not for a believing man or a woman to have a choice in a matter affecting him [Q. XXXIII, 36].⁸

As to the disputes that happened after the Apostle's [death], the matter was decided in accordance with God's judgment [as laid down in the Qur'ān] and then that of His Apostle [as laid down in the sunna]. But if a text were not applicable, the matter was decided by analogy on the strength of a precedent sought [either in the Qur'ān or the sunna] in the same manner as I have [already] explained concerning the qibla,

⁶ Būlāq ed., p. 14.

[witnesses of] just character, equal compensation, and whatever God has prescribed in parallel cases. For He said:

Those who obey God and the Apostle are with the prophets and the veracious and the martyrs and the upright upon whom God has bestowed favor. Good company are these [Q. IV, 71]. S 81

And He said:

O you who have believed, obey God and His Apostle [Q. VIII, 20].

God's Command Ordering Obedience to His Apostle

90. [Shāfi'ī said]: God, glorious be His praise, said:

Verily, those who swear allegiance to thee swear allegiance really to God; the hand of God is above their hands. So whoever breaks his oath, breaks it only to his own hurt, and to him who fulfils what he has pledged to God, He will grant a great reward [Q. XLVIII, 10].

And He said:

Whoever obeys the Apostle has obeyed God [Q. IV, 82].

So God instructed [men] that their homage to the Apostle is homage to Him, and their obedience [to him] is obedience to Him.

And He said:

But not by thy Lord, they will not become believers until they make thee judge in their disputes and do not afterwards find difficulty in Thy decisions, but surrender in full submission [Q. IV, 68]. S 82

This verse, we have been told, was revealed in connection with a land dispute between al-Zubayr and another man in which the Prophet gave a decision in favor of al-Zubayr. This decision is a sunna laid down by the Apostle, not a command in the text of the Qur'ān.⁹

The Qur'ān indicates what I have just stated; for if this decision were a Quranic decision, it should have been prescribed in the text of the Book of God.

But if men fail to accept a decision based on a clear text of the Book of God, they undoubtedly cease to be believers, for they are rejecting a decision based on divine legislation. For God, Blessed and Most High, said:

Do not put the Apostle's calling on you for aid on the same footing amongst you as your calling on each other. God knows those of you who slip away secretly, so let those who go against His command beware lest a trial befall them, or a painful punishment [Q. XXIV, 63].

S 83

And He said:

When they are called to God and to His Apostle that he may judge between them, lo, a party of them avert themselves. But if they are in the right, they will come to him in submission.

Is there sickness in their hearts, or are they in doubt, or do they fear that God and His Apostle may act unjustly towards them. Nay, but they are the evildoers.

All that the believers said when they were called to God and His Apostle that he might judge between them was: 'We hear and obey.' These are the ones who prosper.

Whoever obeys God and His Apostle, and fears God and shows piety—these are the ones who attain felicity [Q. XXIV, 47-51].

⁹ Yahya b. Adam, in Kitāb al-Kharāj, reports the case as follows: "One of the Helpers from among the Banū Umayya had a dispute with al-Zubayr concerning a creek (sharj) in the ḥarra, and the Prophet said: Irrigate, O Zubayr, and then leave the water alone. Said the man of the Banū Umayya: Justice, O Prophet, even though he is the son of your aunt! And the face of the Prophet changed so that the man knew that what he had said had hurt the prophet. Then the Prophet said: O Zubayr Shut off the water till it reaches the height of two ankles—or he said: —[till it] reaches the fence—and then let the water flow. It was revealed [then]—or he said: recited—: "No, by thy Lord, they do not believe until they make thee judge in the tangles . . ." [Q. IV, 68]. Yahya b. Adam, Kitāb al-Kharāj, ed. A. M. Shākir (Cairo, 1347/1929), pp. 106-107; English translation by A. Ben Shemesh, entitled Taxation In Islam (Leiden, 1958), p. 74. See also Ṭabarī, Tafsir, Vol. VIII, pp. 519-23.

Through this communication, God instructed men that their recourse to the Apostle to judge among them is a recourse to God's judgment, for the Apostle is the judge among them, and when they accept his judgment they do so only because of an obligation imposed by God.

And He instructed them that the [Prophet's] judgment is His judgment, for his judgment is imposed by Him and by His established knowledge—rendering him a man of destiny and assisting him by preserving him from error and [worldly] success—and by testifying that He guides him and causes him to obey His order. §4

So God imposed the obligation upon His creatures to obey His Apostle, and He instructed them that [obedience] to him is obedience to Him.

The sum-total of what He instructed them is the duty to obey Him and His Apostle, and that obedience to the Apostle is obedience to Him. He [also] instructed them that He imposed the duty on His Apostle to obey His order, Glorious be His praise.

The Obligation Made Clear by God to His Creatures That He Imposed upon His Apostle to Follow What He Revealed to Him, and What He Testified to of His Obeying His Commands, His Guidance, and That He Is the Guide of Any Who Follow Him

91. Shāfi'ī said: God, Glorious be His praise, said to His Prophet:

O Prophet, fear God, and obey not the unbelievers and the hypocrites. Verily God is All-knowing, All-wise. But follow what is revealed to thee ~~from~~ thy Lord. Verily God is aware of the things you do [Q. XXXIII, 1-2].

And He said:

Follow what has been revealed unto thee from thy Lord—there is no god but Him—and turn thou away from the polytheists [Q. VI, 106]. 985

And He said:

Then we set thee upon an open way of the Law; therefore follow it, and follow not the whims of those who do not know [Q. XLV, 17].

So God instructed His Apostle that He has favored him with His established knowledge and that he will preserve him from mankind, for He said:

O thou Apostle, proclaim what is sent down to thee from thy Lord—if thou do it not thou hast not delivered His message—and God will defend thee from the people [Q. V, 71].¹⁰

92. Shāfi'ī said: ¹¹ And [He], glorious be His praise, certified [the Prophet's] firm belief in what He commanded him, and in Guidance to himself and to whoever follows him. For He said:

Thus We have revealed to thee a spirit belonging to Our affair. Thou didst not know what either the Book or the Faith were. But We have made it a light by which We guide whoever We please of Our servants, and verily thou shalt guide unto a straight path [Q. XLII, 52].

And He said:

Had it not been for the bounty and mercy of God toward thee, a party of them would have proposed to lead thee astray; but they lead only themselves astray; they do not hurt thee at all. God has sent down to thee the Book and the Wisdom, and He has taught thee what thou didst not know; God's bounty to thee is ever great [Q. IV, 113]. 986

¹⁰ See Ṭabarī, Tafsīr, Vol. X, pp. 467-72. Previously the Prophet was safeguarded by a few of his followers.

¹¹ Būlāq ed., p. 15.

Thus God declared that He commanded His Prophet to obey His order, and certified what he proclaimed on His behalf as well as what he certified for himself.¹² We [also] certify for him in order to draw near to God by our belief in Him, and we make entreaties to Him by belief in His words. [For] 'Abd al-'Azīz [b. Muḥammad al-Darāwardī] told us from 'Amr b. Abī 'Amr—the freed slave of al-Muṭṭalib—from al-Muṭṭalib b. Ḥanṭab that the Apostle of God said:

I have left nothing concerning which God has given you an order without giving you that order; nor have I neglected anything concerning which He has given you a prohibition without giving you that prohibition.¹³

93. Shāfi'ī said: What God has informed us of in His established knowledge and in His final and irrevocable judgment—a favor and a blessing from Him—is that He prevented those who attempted to lead [the Prophet] astray, and informed him that they could not hurt him at all.

In certifying that [the Prophet] guides mankind along a straight-forward path—the path of God—and that he delivers His message and obeys His commands—as we have stated before—and in ordering obedience to him and in emphasizing all [of this] in the [divine] communications just cited—God has given evidence to mankind that they should accept the judgment of the Apostle and obey his orders.

94. Shāfi'ī said: Whatever the Apostle has decreed that is ¹² Ṭabarī, Tafsīr, Vol. IX, pp. 199-201; Baydāwī, pp. 126-27.

¹³ This is the first part of a tradition, the second part of which Shāfi'ī cites in paragraph 97. In his Kitāb al-Umm (Vol. VI, p. 209, margin) the two parts are cited as one tradition. Transmitters have related the tradition in a variety of wordings, but all agree on the substance. See al-Suyūṭī, al-Jāmi' al-Ṣaḡhīr (Cairo, 1352/1933), Vol. I, p. 305. For a discussion on the transmission of this tradition and on al-Muṭṭalib b. Ḥanṭab, Companion of the Prophet, see Shākir's edition of the Risāla, pp. 93-102, note 8. This Companion should be distinguished from a Successor by the same name who transmitted traditions on the authority of 'Ā'isha, Abū Hurayra, and Anas b. Mālik (See Ibn Ḥajar, al-Iṣāba [Cairo, 1358/1939], Vol. III, p. 404). See also J. Schacht, The Origins of Muhammadan Jurisprudence, pp. 53-54.

not based on any [textual] command from God, he has done so by God's command. So God instructed us in His saying:

And verily thou wilt guide [mankind] to a straight path, the path of God [Q. XLII, 52-53].

For the Apostle has laid down a sunna [on matters] for which there is a text in the Book of God as well as for others concerning which there is no [specific] text. But whatever he laid down in the sunna God has ordered us to obey, and He regards [our] obedience to him as obedience to Him, and [our] refusal to obey him as disobedience to Him for which no man will be forgiven; nor is an excuse for failure to obey the Apostle's sunna possible owing to what I have already stated and to what the Apostle [himself] has said:

Sufyan [b. 'Uyayna] told us from Sālim Abū al-Naḍr—a freed slave of 'Umar b. 'Ubayd-Allāh—who heard 'Ubayd-Allāh b. Abī Rāfi' relate from his father that the Apostle had said:

Let me find no one of you reclining on his couch,¹⁴ and when confronted with an order of permission or prohibition from me, say: 'I do not know [whether this is obligatory or not]; we will follow only what we find in the Book of God.'¹⁵

95. Shāfi'ī said:¹⁶ The sunnas of the Apostle together with the [communications of the] Book of God fall in two categories: First, for every textual [communication] in the Book

¹⁴ In both the Būlāq and Shākir editions there is a statement following this tradition to the effect that Shāfi'ī explained the word arika (a couch) to mean a bedstead (sarīr); but this statement is perhaps spurious, as Shākir himself suspected, since it is written on the margin of the MS, possibly by one of the readers.

the Apostle laid down [a similar sunna] in conformity with divine communication. Second, for any [ambiguous] command the Apostle laid down on God's behalf [a sunna] clarifying the meaning implied by God and specifying what [kind of] duty God imposed, whether general or particular, and how man should carry it out. In both categories [the Prophet] followed the Book of God.

96. [Shāfi'ī] said: I know of no scholar who does not agree that the sunna of the Prophet falls in three categories, two of which were agreed upon unanimously. These two categories agree [on certain matters] and differ [on others].

First, for whatever acts there is textual [legislation] provided by God in the Book, the Apostle [merely] specified clearly what is in the text of the Book. Second, as to any [ambiguous] communication in the Book laid down by God, [the Prophet] specified the meaning implied by Him. These are the two categories on which scholars do not disagree.

The third category consists of what the Apostle has laid down in the sunna and concerning which there is no text in the Book.

97. Some [scholars] have said: God empowered [the Prophet], by virtue of the duty He imposed [on mankind] to obey Him and his success in obtaining [God's] approval in accordance with His established knowledge, to provide sunnas [for matters] on which there is no text in the Book. Others said: No sunna was ever laid down [by the Prophet] unless there was a basis¹⁷ for it in the Book, such as the sunna which specified the number of prayers [each day] and [the modes of] their performance, based on the general duty of prayer. In like manner, [the Prophet] laid down sunnas dealing with sale [of property], as well as others. For God said:

Do not consume your property among you uselessly [Q. IV, 33].

And He said:

God has permitted sale and forbidden usury [Q.-II, 277].

¹⁷ Literally: "Foundation," i. e., a fundamental principle or a precedent.

Whatever God has provided by [way of] permission or prohibition, he has specified on God's behalf as he did in [the case of the duty of] prayer.

Others said: [The Prophet] received a message from God confirming the sunna by a command from Him. § 92

Still others said: [The Prophet] was inspired with all that he had laid down. The sunna is [divine] Wisdom inspired by God, and so whatever He inspired him with [constitutes] sunna. [For] 'Abd al-'Azīz [b. Muḥammad al-Darāwardī] told us from 'Amr b. Abī 'Amr from al-Muṭṭalib, who related that the Prophet said:

The trustworthy spirit [Gabriel] has inspired me [with the thought] that no soul will ever die until it will receive its full provision. Be, therefore, moderate in your request.¹⁸ § 93

98. Shāfi'ī said:¹⁹ Among the things with which [the Prophet] was inspired is his sunna. This [sunna] is the Wisdom which God mentioned [in His Book], and whatever He sent down to him is a Book—the Book of God—all of these have been given to him as favors from God and by His will. These favors are either embodied in one Favor²⁰ or take different forms. We pray God for protection from error and success. § 94-101

In whatever form it may take, God made it clear that He imposed the duty of obedience to His Apostle, and has given none of mankind an excuse to reject any order he knows to be the order of the Apostle of God. God has rather made men have need for him in [all matters of] religion and He has given the proof for it by providing that the sunna of the Apostle make clear the meanings of the duties laid down in His Book, so that it might be known that the sunna—whether in the form specifying the meaning of God's commands as provided in the text of the Book which they can read or in the form of legislation in the absence of such a text—in either form represents God's command and is in [full] agreement § 104 with that of His Apostle; both are [equally] binding in all circumstances. This has been confirmed by the Apostle in the tradition of Abū Rāfi' which has already been cited.²¹

99. Shāfi'ī said: ²² I shall explain what I have already said about the sunna, [whether] it specifies the Book of God or provides [additional legislation] for matters on which there is no text in the Book, such examples as may clarify the meaning of the subject that was discussed.

The first one I take up will be [a discussion] on the sunna based on the Book of God. I shall discuss by means of istidlāl (deductive reasoning) the sunna relating to the subject of the nāsikh (abrogating) and the mansūkh (abrogated) passages in the Book of God. Next, [I shall] state the duties provided in the text [of the Book] and the sunna which the Apostle has laid down on the basis of the Book; the general duties which the Apostle specified for its modes and its times of fulfillment; next, the general [commands] which were intended to be general and the general [commands] which were intended to be particular; and [finally] the sunna [of the Prophet] for which there is no text in the Book. § 105

Chapter VI

[ON THE ABROGATION OF DIVINE LEGISLATION]

The Abrogating and Abrogated [Communications]

100. Shāfi'ī said: God indeed created mankind for whatever His established knowledge desired in creating it and for whatever [its destiny] should be. There is no reversal at all of His judgment, He being swift of reckoning.¹ And he revealed to them the Book that explains everything, as a guide and a mercy.² In it He laid down some duties which He confirmed, and others which He abrogated, as a mercy to His people so as to lighten their burden and to comfort them in addition to the favors which He had begun to bestow upon them. For the fulfilment [of the duties] He confirmed, He rewarded them with Paradise and with salvation from His punishment. His mercy has included all of them in what He confirmed and what He abrogated. Praise be to Him for His favors.

101. Shāfi'ī said: ³ God has declared that He abrogated [communications] of the Book only by means of other communications in it; that the sunna cannot abrogate [a text in] the Book but that it should only follow what is laid down in the Book, and that the sunna is intended to explain the meaning of communications of general [nature] set forth [in the Book]. For God said:

When Our signs are recited to them as Evidences, those who do not look forward to meeting us, say: Bring a Scripture other than this or change it. [You O Muḥammad] say: It is not for me to change it of my own accord; I only follow what is revealed to me; verily I fear, if I go against my Lord, the punishment of a mighty day [Q. X, 16-17].

Thus God informed [men] that He had commanded His Prophet to obey what was communicated to him, but that He did not empower him to alter [the Book] of his own accord. For there is in His saying: "It is not for me to alter it of my own accord" [Q. X, 16], an evidence for what I stated, that nothing can abrogate the Book of God save His Book. Since [God] is the originator of His [own] commands, He [alone] can repeal or confirm whatever of it He wills—glorious be His praise—but no one of His creatures may do so. For He also said: "God repeals what He wills, or confirms; with Him is the Mother of the Book" [Q. XIII, 39].⁴

Some scholars have maintained (but God knows best) that there is in this communication an evidence that God has empowered His Apostle to set forth rules by [God-given] aid [for matters] on which He provided no communications in the Book. But God knows best.⁵

It is held that [God's] saying: "God will repeal what He wills," means that He repeals and confirms the duties which He wills. This resembles [the meaning in] the foregoing [statement]; but God knows best. However, the evidence against it is in the Book of God, in which He said:

⁴ The Mother of the Book is the original copy of the Qur'ān which exists or co-exists with God in Heaven (See Baydāwī, p. 334). "The original of the Qur'ān," says Bell, "is thought of as a book preserved in (the seventh) heaven in the presence of God. This is assumed to be what is meant by the preserved tablet, lawḥ mahfūz, spoken of in Q. LXXXV, 22. Sometimes it is thought of as having been sent down to the nearest heaven on the night of power, lailat al-qadr, described in Q. XCVII, so as to be available for revelation to the Prophet by the angel Gabriel" (Richard Bell, Introduction to the Qur'ān [Edinburgh, 1953], p. 37). See also 'Abd al-Qāhir al-Baghdādī, Kitāb Uṣūl al-Dīn (Istanbul, 1928), Vol. I, pp. 106, 108; and Abū al-Ḥasan al-Ash'arī, al-Ibāna 'An Uṣūl al-Diyāna (Hyderabad, 2nd ed., 1367/1947), pp. 19-35.

For whatever We abrogate or cast into oblivion to forget, We bring a better or the like of it. Knowest thou not that God is powerful over everything? [Q. II. 100].

Thus God has informed men that the abrogation or the deferment of any communication cannot be made valid save by another [Quranic] communication. For He said:

When we substitute one communication for another—God knoweth best what He sendeth down—they say: 'Thou [Muḥammad] art only a forger' [Q. XVI, 103].⁶

In like manner the sunna of the Apostle of God states: Nothing can abrogate it except [another] sunna of the Apostle. If God were to address to His Apostle [a communication] on a matter on which he [Muḥammad] had provided a sunna different from what God had addressed to him, he [Muḥammad] would provide a sunna in conformity with whatever God had communicated to him, so that he would make clear to men that he had provided a sunna that abrogated one earlier or contrary to it. This is [well] stated in the sunna [of the Prophet], God's blessing and peace be upon him.⁷

102. Someone may ask: The evidence that a Quranic [communication] can abrogate another [of equal status], may be found in the Qur'ān itself, because there is nothing at all to match the Qur'ān; however, can you find such [an evidence] in the sunna [concerning its abrogation by another sunna]?

103. Shāfi'ī replied: The evidence lies in my [earlier] statement concerning God's commands ordering men to obey the order of the Apostle that the sunna was accepted [as emanating] from God and that he who obeys it does so by [an order in] the Book of God.⁸ For there is no other textual order which God has made obligatory upon mankind save that which is in His Book and in the sunna of His Prophet. If the sunna is taken as such, that nothing else by a human being is equal to it, nothing can [therefore] abrogate it save another of equal status. Nothing is equal [to the sunna] save the sunna of the Apostle, since God has never given to any other human being [the power] He gave [to the Prophet]. He commanded men to obey him and made his orders binding upon them. Thus all men are his followers: He who follows shall never disobey what he was ordered to obey, and he who is under obligation to obey the sunna of the Apostle shall not refuse to obey it, for he is not empowered to abrogate any part of it.

104. Someone may ask: Is it possible to assume that there was a transmitted sunna which was abrogated while the abrogating sunna was not transmitted?

105. [Shāfi'ī replied]: That is impossible. For how could the transmitted sunna be possibly abrogated while the one which is binding was abandoned? Were this permissible the whole sunna might be abandoned by men, for they would [then] say: "Perhaps it was abrogated." No duty has ever been abrogated unless it was replaced by another. The abrogation of the qibla [i. e., prayer in the direction] of Jerusalem by another [in the direction] of the Ka'ba is a case in point. For whatever has been abrogated in the Book or in the sunna must have been [replaced by] something else.

106. Someone may ask: Can the sunna be abrogated by the Qur'ān?

107. [Shāfi'ī] replied: If a sunna were abrogated by the Qur'ān, another sunna must have been laid down by the Prophet making clear that his earlier sunna was abrogated so as to demonstrate to men that an act can be abrogated only by something of equal status.

108. He may ask: Where does the evidence lie for your opinion?

109. [Shāfi'ī replied]: [The evidence lies] in what I have discussed in this book in its [proper] place, where it was made clear that the duties imposed by God—[both] the general and the particular—implied that [the Prophet] makes no pronouncement unless it is based on God's command. If God abrogates any of His commands, the Apostle would also have to abrogate his sunna by another [in conformity with God's new command].

Were it permissible to hold that what the Apostle has laid down in the sunna was abrogated by the Qur'ān and that he has transmitted no abrogating sunna, it would be permissible to hold a similar view concerning the [tradition relating to] the prohibition of all kinds of sale [of property], by holding that [the Prophet] had prohibited them before [God] had laid down [the rule] that "God has permitted sale and forbidden usury" [Q. II, 276]. The same might be held about [the tradition concerning] the stoning of adulterers, namely, that stoning may be regarded as abrogated in accordance with God's saying: "The fornicatress and the fornicator—scourge each one of them with a hundred stripes," [Q. XXIV, 2] and that [the tradition concerning] the wiping of the shoes may also be regarded as abrogated by the communication⁹ of ablution. It would also be possible to hold that the cutting off of the hand of the thief should not be dropped even if the stolen article were kept securely or if its value was less than a quarter of a dinār in view of God's saying: "The thief, male and female, cut off their hand" [Q. V, 42], for the term "theft" is binding upon whomever steals, regardless of the value of the stolen article or of its security. It would be possible to reject all the traditions of the Apostle by saying: "He did not say this [or that]," if they were found to be not in accordance with divine legislation. Thus it would be permissible to reject the sunna on one of two grounds: either if it were in conformity with the general principles of the Book, but its wording were different in certain respects from the wording [of the Book], or if its wording were phrased at greater length than that in the divine communication, although they might be different in some respects. The Book of God and the sunna of His Apostle, however, provide [ample] evidence in contradiction of this opinion and in support of the one I have stated earlier.

The Book of God [contains] perspicuous declarations by virtue of which blindness^a will be healed. In it also will be found evidence concerning the position of the Apostle in relation to the Book of God and His religion, [the Apostle's] submission to God, and his clarification [of God's word] on behalf of Him. § 112

The Abrogating and the Abrogated, of Which The Book [of God] Indicates Some and the Sunna Others

110. Shāfi'ī said: I have heard some scholars who related that God had imposed a certain duty for prayer before He laid down that for the five prayers. For He said:

O thou enwrapped in thy robes,
Stay up the night, except a little,
Half of it, or a little less
Or a little more,
And chant the Qur'ān distinctly [Q. LXXIII, 1-4]. § 113

God abrogated this [duty] by another, which may be found in the same chapter [of the Book], and it reads as follows:

Thy Lord knows that thou remainest up nearly two-thirds of the night, or half of it, or a third of it, and a party of those with thee likewise, and God determines the night and the day. He knoweth that ye will never count it up, so He has turned towards you with mercy. So recite what may be convenient [for you] of the Qur'ān; He knoweth that some of you will be sick and others journeying about in the land, seeking the bounty of God, and others fighting in the cause of God. So recite what is convenient of it, and observe the Prayer, and pay the alms [Q. LXXIII, 20].

For after God laid down His order "Stay up the night . . . half of it . . . or a little more," He added: "Nearly two-thirds of the night, or half of it, or a third of it, and a party of those with thee," He [merely] shortened it and said: "He knows that some of you will be sick . . . so recite what is convenient of it. . . ."

111. Shāfi'ī said: So it is evident from the Book of God that: "Thou remainest up nearly two-thirds of the night, etc. . . ." § 114 has been abrogated by: "So recite what is convenient of it."

God's saying: "So recite what is convenient of it" may mean:
First, it is a confirmed duty which superseded another.

Second, it is an abrogated duty superseded by another, just as it itself had superseded a previous one in accordance with God's saying:

And as for the night, keep vigil a part of it, as a work of supererogation for thee; it may be that thy Lord will raise thee up to a laudable position [Q. XVII, 81].

For His saying: "And as for the night, keep vigil a part of it, as a work of supererogation for thee" may mean that "to keep vigil" is a duty in addition to that "to recite what is convenient of it."

112. [Shāfi'ī] said: [In such a case] it is obligatory to seek the evidence of the sunna for [determining] which of the two meanings [is valid]. The sunna of the Apostle of God, however, has indicated that no duty other than that of the five prayers is obligatory. We therefore hold that only the [duty of] five [prayers] is obligatory and that any earlier prayers have been abrogated by that sunna in accordance with God's saying: § 115
". . . keep vigil a part of it, as a work of supererogation for thee," and that this has abrogated the one [stipulated in] the "rising up at night, half of it, or a third of it or recite what is convenient of the Book. . . ." This does not mean at all that we recommend abandoning the recital of what is convenient of the Book in the performance of prayer, for the more the recital is prolonged the more we like it. [For] Mālik [b. Anas] told us from his uncle Abū Suhayl b. Mālik from his father who heard Ṭalḥa b. 'Ubayd-Allāh say:

A tribesman from Najd, excited and crying, whose voice was hardly intelligible until he came near [the Prophet's company], was really inquiring about Islam. 'Islam [imposes the obligation of] five prayers [every] day and night,' the Prophet said. 'Am I under any other [obligation]?' he asked. 'No, not unless you volunteer,' replied [the Prophet] and he mentioned the fasting during the month of Ramaḍān. 'Am I under any other [obligation]?' asked the tribesman. 'No, not unless you volunteer,' replied the Prophet. The tribesman departed, while murmuring: 'By God I shall neither add to nor drop any of these [obligations].' So the Apostle said: 'If [this man] will fulfil his promise, he will be successful [as a Muslim in his life].'¹⁰

This [tradition] has also been related by 'Ubāda b. al-Ṣāmit from the Prophet as follows:

B 18

Five prayers have been made obligatory on mankind by God. He who fulfils them without neglecting or treating lightly any one of them, has a covenant with God that He will let him enter into Paradise.¹¹

The Duty of Prayer [the Performance of Which] the Book of God and the Sunna Indicate to Whom it Might Not Apply Owing to [a Valid] Excuse, and Against Him Whose Prayer Is Not Accredited Because of [Some Act of] Disobedience

113. God, Blessed and Most High, said:

They will ask thee about menstruation; say: It is harmful; so withdraw from women in menstruation, and come not near them until they are clean; but when they have purified themselves, come to them as God has commanded you. Verily, God loves those who turn continually in penitence, and loves those who keep themselves pure [Q. II, 222].

Shāfi'ī said: By means of ablution and washing away pollution, God imposed [the duty of] purity on him who prays, so no prayer will be lawful save for him who is purified. When God mentioned menstruation, He commanded withdrawal from women until they are purified; when they are purified, they become lawful [to men]. We conclude that purification by water shall be performed after the end of menstruation, and that purity cannot be attained by a menstruating woman [merely] by the use of water, since water is always available in towns. But God mentioned purification [by water] only after [women] have become purified, which can be attained only at the ending of menstruation, as stated in the Book of God and the sunna of His Apostle.

Mālik [b. Anas] told us from 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. al-Qāsim from his father from 'Ā'isha, who related that she was menstruant during her visitation [of the Sacred Mosque] with the Prophet. So [the Prophet] ordered her to perform the duty in the same manner as a pilgrim "but do not circumambulate [the Ka'ba] until you are purified."¹²

¹² Mālik, Vol. I, pp. 410-11; Bukhārī, Vol. I, pp. 393-94; Muslim, Vol. XIII, pp. 141-44. Cf. Shāfi'ī, Kitāb al-Umm, Vol. I, p. 51.

So we concluded that God meant that the performance of the duty of prayer is obligatory on those who have achieved purity by ablution and [complete] washing. Since menstruant women¹³ cannot become purified by either [ablution or washing]—as menstruation is a natural occurrence beyond their free will to constitute disobedience—they are excused from prayer during menstruation and they need not make up for what they neglected after the end of their menstruation.

114. Shāfi'ī said:¹⁴ By analogy with the menstruant women, we hold that he who is [either] unconscious or insane, whose mind has become sick by an order of God and not by his own fault, is excused from [the duty of] prayer; for he cannot comprehend it as long as his state makes him incapable of comprehension.

It is generally agreed among the scholars that the Prophet did not order menstruant [women] to perform the [duty of] prayer; but they are agreed that they should fast. We have therefore made a distinction between the two duties on the strength of the evidence I have just stated on the authority of the scholars and their agreement [on this matter]. § 125

Fasting must be distinguished from prayer in the case of the traveller, since he can postpone it until after the month of Ramaḍān, but to neglect the travel-prayer is not permitted for a single day. Fasting is obligatory but one month in twelve, and is not obligatory in the other eleven months, but no man who is capable of prayer is excused from it.

115. [Shāfi'ī said]: God said:

Draw not near to prayer when you are drunken until you know what you are saying, nor [when you are] polluted, unless you be travelling on the road, until you have washed yourselves [Q. IV, 46].

Some scholars have said: This communication was revealed before the one which prohibited the [drinking of] wine.¹⁵

¹³ Singular in the Arabic text.

¹⁴ Būlāq ed., p. 19.

¹⁵ See Ṭabarī, Tafsīr, Vol. VIII, pp. 375-79.

The Qur'ān gives evidence (but God knows best) that the duty of prayer should not be performed until the drunkard can comprehend the things he recites, because the prohibition of prayer [to the drunkard] is stated first and then the person who is in a state of impurity (junub). So the scholars are agreed that he who is in a state of impurity shall not pray at all until he is purified.¹⁶ 8 120

Since the [performance of] prayer by the drunkard was prohibited before [the drinking of] wine was prohibited, [the performance of prayer by] the drunkard would be more appropriately prohibited after wine was prohibited, for [the drunkard] would be doubly disobedient: First, because he prays in a state [of drunkenness] which was prohibited, and secondly because he drinks wine.¹⁷

Prayer [must be performed] by word and deed and by abstinence [from forbidden acts]. If [he who prays] cannot comprehend the words, the deed, and the abstinence, and cannot perform the prayer as ordered, [the duty] is not fulfilled and he must make up for it after he recovers.

He who is insane by God's order and who is in a state beyond the control of his free will must be distinguished from him who is a drunkard, since the latter has himself caused the drunkenness and must make up for it, while he who is insane did not inflict upon himself the disability which caused him to be disobedient.

116. [Shāfi'ī] said: ¹⁸ God has commanded the Apostle to turn in the direction of Jerusalem in prayer. Before this direction was abrogated it was not permitted to turn in any other direction. But it was abrogated and [the Apostle] was ordered to turn in the direction of the [Sacred] House: It became unlawful in accordance with a textual command to turn either in the direction of Jerusalem or to any other direction than that of the Sacred House. 8 121

¹⁸ Būlāq ed., p. 19.

117. [Shāfi'i] said: Each [direction] was valid in its time: The turning toward Jerusalem—when God ordered His Prophet to turn to it—was obligatory; but after it was abrogated it became obligatory to turn only toward the Sacred House, and no other direction is permitted by law, except in the event of fear [of danger] or in a supererogatory prayer in travel as indicated in the Book and the sunna. § 119

The same applies to whatever God has abrogated, for the [word] abrogate means to repeal His command, [the obedience to] which was right in its time, but its repeal rendered its abandonment right, [too]. He who was aware that [God's] command was abrogated must obey the [new] command and abandon the abrogated one, but he who is not aware of it should continue to obey the abrogated duty. For God said to His Prophet: § 122

We may see thee turning thy face about toward the heaven. So We shall put thee in possession of a qibla that will satisfy thee. Turn thy face in the direction of the Sacred Mosque, and wherever you may be, turn your faces in its direction [Q. II, 139].

118. Someone may ask: Where does the evidence lie [in this communication] that [men] have been ordered to change [the direction] from one qibla to another.

119. [Shāfi'i replied]: It is in God's saying:

The fools among the people will say: 'What has turned them from the qibla which they have been observing?' Say: To God belongs the East and the West; He guideth whom He willeth to a straight path [Q. II, 136].

Mālik [b. Anas] told us from 'Abd-Allāh b. Dīnār from 'Abd-Allāh b. 'Umar, who said: § 123

When men were [performing] the dawn prayer in [the Mosque of] Qubā',¹⁹ a messenger arrived and said: Quranic communication was revealed to the Prophet last night by virtue of which he was ordered to turn toward the qibla [the direction of the Ka'ba]. So while they were [praying] in the direction of al-Shām, they [immediately] turned their faces toward the Ka'ba.²⁰

¹⁹ Qubā', situated on the outskirts of Madīna, was the residence of the tribe of the Banū 'Amr b. 'Awf, among whom the Prophet passed a few days after he migrated to Madīna (1/622) before he moved into the town. A mosque known by the name of this place was erected later where the Prophet and his followers prayed. See Ibn Hishām, Vol. I, pp. 317, 333; Guillaume's translation, pp. 215, 226-27.

Mālik [b. Anas] told us from Yahya b. Sa'id from Sa'id b. al-Musayyib, who said: [After he migrated to Madīna], the Prophet prayed for sixteen months in the direction of Jerusalem ere the qibla was changed two months before [the battle of] Badr.²¹

120. [Shāfi'ī] said: The evidence of the Book concerning prayer in a state of fear may be found in God's saying:

If you fear [danger], pray either on foot or mounted [Q. II, 240].

So it is not permissible in accordance with the text [of the Book] to pray when mounted unless one is in fear [of danger]; but [in such a case] God did not mention the qibla.

Concerning prayer in [a state of] fear, [Abd-Allāh] Ibn 'Umar related from the Prophet a tradition in which he said:

In the event there is a serious fear [of danger] you may pray on foot or mounted, regardless of the direction of the qibla.²²

The Apostle prayed supererogatory prayers while riding his camel, facing the direction in which she was travelling. This

The change of the Qibla from Jerusalem to Makka, as the traditions indicate, was the result of the Prophet's quarrel with Jews. At first, it seems, he prayed toward Jerusalem because of the veneration in which he saw it was held by the Jews. It was also his desire to convert the Jews or reach an agreement with them. Failing to achieve either conversion or a lasting alliance, he decided to break with them. The change of the qibla, the first manifestation of this decision, meant that Muḥammad wanted to substitute Makka for Jerusalem as the center of his world. For the events leading up to the change of the qibla, see Ibn Sa'd, Ṭabaqāt, eds. [tradition] was transmitted by Jābir b. 'Abd-Allāh, Anas b. Mālik and others.²³ [The Prophet, however], never performed the required prayer while travelling except on the ground and in the direction of the qibla.

Ibn Abī Fudayk told us from Ibn Abī Dhī'b from 'Uthmān b. 'Abd-Allāh b. Surāqa from Jābir b. 'Abd-Allāh, who said:

During the campaign of the Banū Anmār²⁴ the Prophet, mounted on his camel, prayed in the direction of the east.²⁵

121. Shāfi'ī said: ²⁶ God said:

O thou prophet, stir up the believers to fight: If there be twenty of you who endure, they will overcome two hundred, and if there be a hundred of you, they will overcome a thousand of those who have disbelieved, because they are a people who do not understand [Q. VIII, 66].

He [God] then declared in His Book that He relieved them of the obligation calling for one believer to fight ten [unbelievers] and confirmed the one which imposed the obligation that one believer should fight two unbelievers in accordance with His saying:

Now God has made it lighter for you and knows that there is weakness in you. So if there be a hundred of you who endure, they will overcome two hundred, and if there be a thousand of you, they will overcome two thousand, by the permission of God. God is with those who endure [Q. VIII, 67].

Sufyān [b. 'Uyayna] told us from 'Amr b. Dīnār from Ibn 'Abbās, who said:

²³ Bukhārī, Vol. I, p. 279; Ibn Hajar, Bulūgh al-Marām, ed. R. M. Riḍwān (Cairo, 1954), p. 25; cf. Shawkānī, Nayl al-Awṭār, Vol. II, pp. 177-78.

²⁴ This was an abortive campaign (A. H. 4/A. C. 626), for when the news reached the Prophet that the Banū Anmār b. Baghīd and the Banū Sa'd b. Tha'laba b. Dhubyān b. Baghīd were preparing for war in Najd, an expedition, headed by the Prophet, proceeded to the east but found that the enemy had already left. It was during this campaign that the Prophet prayed, mounted on his camel, in the direction of the east. For an account of this campaign, see al-Maqrizī, Vol. I, pp. 188-89.

²⁶ Bulāq ed., p. 20.

When the divine communication: 'If there be twenty of you who endure, they will overcome two hundred' was revealed, it became obligatory upon the twenty [believers] never to retreat [in battle] before two hundred [unbelievers]; and when God revealed: 'Now God has made it lighter for you and knows that there is weakness in you—If there were twenty of you, etc.'—it became obligatory on a hundred [believers] never to retreat before two hundred [unbelievers].²⁷ 8 127

[Shāfi'ī] said: This is in conformity with the opinion of Ibn 'Abbās. But God made this so clear in [His] communications that it needs no explanation.²⁸

122. [Shāfi'ī said]: God said:

Those of your women who commit indecency—seek four witnesses against them, and if they testify, confine them to their houses until death takes them or God appoints for them a way out. And when two of you commit [indecency] punish them both; but if they repent and reform, then desist from them. Verily God always has been relenting, compassionate [Q. IV, 19-20]. 8 128

God, however, abrogated [the penalty of] confinement and the inflicting of harm [by another communication] in which He said:

The fornicatress and the fornicator—scourge each of them with a hundred stripes [Q. XXIV, 2].

Thus the sunna specified that the scourging of a hundred stripes should be [inflicted] on the unmarried fornicators.

'Abd al-Wahhāb [b. 'Abd al-Majīd al-Thaqafī] told us from Yūnus b. 'Ubayd from al-Hasan from 'Ubāda b. al-Ṣāmit that the Apostle said:

Take it from me [repeated twice], God has decided on a way [for their punishment]: For [the fornication of] the unmarried couple [the penalty] shall be scourging with a hundred stripes and banishment for a year; for [the adultery of] the married couple, scourging with a hundred stripes and stoning [to death].²⁹

²⁸ Shāfi'ī, Kitāb al-Umm, Vol. IV, p. 92.

²⁹ Abū Dāwūd, Vol. IV, p. 144; Abū Ja'far al-Nahhās, p. 97; Ibn Hajar,

We are told by the trusted authority³⁰ from Yūnus b. 'Ubayd from al-Ḥasan from Ḥiṭṭān al-Raqāshī from 'Ubāda b. al-Ṣāmit from the Prophet a similar [tradition].

123. [Shāfi'ī] said: The sunna of the Apostle specified that the penalty of scourging with a hundred stripes for [fornication on the part of the] free unmarried couple was confirmed, but that it was abrogated concerning the married; and that the penalty of stoning for [adultery on the part of the] free married couple was confirmed.³¹ For when the Apostle's ruling: ["Take it from me, etc."] was laid down, it abrogated the [penalty of] banishment and scourging for the adulterers.

Since the Prophet ordered the stoning of Mā'iz [b. Mālik al-Aslamī] rather than scourging him, and he ordered Unays [b. al-Ḍaḥḥāk al-Aslamī] to inquire from the wife of Aslamī and to stone her if she confessed adultery—this [precedent] indicated that the scourging of the free married adulterers was abrogated and that [the penalty of] stoning was confirmed, since this was a later decision [which superseded an earlier one].³²

But the Book of God and the sunna of the Prophet indicate that slave-adulterers are excluded from this [punishment].

Concerning slave-women, God, Blessed and Most High, said:

Bulūgh al-Marām, p. 153; Shāfi'ī, Kitāb al-Umm, Vol. VI, p. 119, and Vol. VII, p. 252 (margin).

³⁰ It is held, on the authority of al-Rabī' al-Murādi, that Shāfi'ī applied the term "trusted authority" to Yahya b. Ḥassān (see Bayhaqī, Manāqib, folio 278); but it is obvious that in this instance the trusted authority must be someone else, since Yūnus was born in 144/761 after Ḥassān had died in 139/756.

If, then, having been taken under iḥṣān,³³ they commit an indecency, they shall be subject to half the punishment to which those under iḥṣān are subject [Q. IV, 30].

It is evident that half [the punishment] cannot be executed except in scourging—which it is possible to divide—while stoning, which leads to death, cannot be halved, for he [who is subject] to stoning might die either by the first stone cast on him or by a thousand or more. So it is impossible [to determine] what half [of the punishment] is. The [limit of such] penalties is specified by the destruction of life, and the destruction of life is dependent on the number of strokes and the size of the stones. Obviously no half of such a limit can be determined.³⁴ § 133

124. Shāfi'ī said:³⁵ The Apostle of God said:

If it is proved that the slave-women of any one of you has committed adultery, she should be scourged.³⁶

But [The Prophet] did not say that she should be stoned. Nor did the Muslims differ on [the dictum that] slaves who commit adultery are not subject to stoning.

The taking of a slave-woman under iḥṣān is performed by accepting Islam. We hold this [opinion] on the strength of the evidence of the sunna and the agreement of the majority of the scholars.

Since the Apostle decreed: "If the slave-woman of any one of you, etc." without stipulating: "Whether she was taken under iḥṣān or not," we concluded that God's saying concerning slave-women [which runs as follows]: "If then, having been taken under iḥṣān, they commit an indecency, they shall be subject to half the punishment to which those under iḥṣān are subject," [Q. IV, 30], must mean: If they [the slave-women] have become Muslims, not that if they were taken as wives § 135

³³ For the meaning of this term, see paragraph 83, n. 44, above.

and the intercourse were performed in marriage, nor if they were freed although the intercourse was not performed [in marriage].⁸⁷

125. Someone may ask: Does it not appear that you give iḥṣān a variety of meanings?

126. [Shāfiʿī] replied: Yes, for the aggregate meaning of iḥṣān is that there should be a bar against forbidden acts. Islam may be one of them; ⁸⁸freedom [from slavery] is another; the taking [of the woman] as a wife and the performance of intercourse [through marriage] are still others; and finally detainment in the house. [As a rule] anything that may prevent [indecent] constitutes iḥṣān. For God said:

We taught him the making of garments for you to protect you from each other's violence [Q. XXI, 80].

And He said:

They will not fight against you all together, except in fortified towns [Q. LIX, 14].

[The term fortified] means protected [towns].

127. [Shāfiʿī] said: The first and the last part [of the communication] indicate that the meaning of iḥṣān—which is stated in general [terms] in [this] place, not in others—is Islam, not intercourse or freedom or confinement or chastity. These are the various [possible] meanings of iḥṣān.

⁸⁷ For the meaning of iḥṣān in this communication, see Ṭabarī, Tafsīr, Vol. VIII, pp. 195-202.

⁸⁸ I. e., a bar against one of the forbidden acts.

*The Abrogating and Abrogated [Communications]
Which Are Indicated by the Sunna and Consensus*

128. [Shāfi'ī said]: God, Blessed and Most High, said:

Prescribed for you, when death draws nigh to one of you, and he leaves behind some property, is the making of a testament in favor of his parents and relatives who are reputable—an obligation on the God-fearing [Q. II, 176].

And He said:

And those of you who die, leaving wives, let them make testament for their wives, provision for a year without expulsion; but if they go forth, there is no fault in you what they may do with themselves honorably. God is All-mighty; All-wise [Q. II, 241]. § 137

Thus God provided [legislation] for the inheritance of parents as well as for near relatives whether together with them or as successors, and for the inheritance of the husband from his wife and the wife from her husband.

The two [foregoing] communications may be interpreted either to confirm bequests for the parents and the near relatives, bequest for the wife, and inheritance together with bequests, so that inheritance and bequests are lawful; or that [the legislation concerning] inheritance abrogates [that concerning] bequests.²²

Since both interpretations are possible, as we pointed out, it is obligatory upon the learned to find an evidence in the Book of God [as to which of the two is valid]; if nothing is found in the text of the Book of God they should try the sunna of the Apostle. If such an evidence is found, it should be accepted from the Apostle, as [if] accepted from God by virtue of God's command to obey His [Apostle]. § 138

We have found that those learned in legal interpretation and the authorities in the campaigns [of the Prophet]—whether from [the tribe of] Quraysh or other [tribes]—are agreed that in the year of the capture [of Makka (8/630)] the Prophet said:

No bequest to a successor [is valid], nor shall a believer be slain for [the blood of] an unbeliever.⁴⁰

This tradition has been transmitted from those who have heard it from the authorities on the [Prophet's] campaigns. So this is a transmission by the public from the public and is therefore of greater authority than the transmission of one [individual] from another. Further, we have found that the scholars are agreed [on the acceptance of this tradition]. 821

129. [Shāfi'i] said: Some of the Syrian [transmitters] have related [this] tradition [with an isnād or authorities] which those who are learned in traditions do not confirm, because some of the transmitters are unknown.⁴¹ So we have related this tradition [directly] from the Prophet as an interrupted [tradition].⁴² 813

We have accepted this tradition, as I pointed out, on the authority of those learned in the [Prophet's] campaigns and the agreement of the public, just as we have already related it on the authority of all those who are learned in the campaigns and the agreement of the public. [For] Sufyān [b. 'Uyayna] told us from Sulaymān al-Aḥwal from Mujāhid that the Apostle said: "No bequest to a successor [is valid]." ⁴³ 810

We have concluded that the Prophet's ruling: "No bequest for a successor [is valid]," as I have stated, [means] that [the legislation on] inheritance has abrogated that on bequests for the parents and the wife, on the strength of the information related by those learned in matters concerning the [Prophet's]

⁴⁰ Abū Dāwūd, Vol. III, p. 113; Shawkānī, Nayl al-Awṭār, Vol. VI, p. 43; Shāfi'i, Kitāb al-Umm, Vol. IV, pp. 27, 36, 40.

⁴¹ I. e., this tradition, well-known to those learned in traditions in the Hijāz, was related without the names of the transmitters; but it was related by Syrian authorities with the names of the transmitters.

campaigns, interrupted traditions from the Prophet, and the agreement of the public.

A great number of the public also have held that the [legislation concerning] bequests for relatives was abrogated and is no longer obligatory; for whenever they are entitled to inherit, they are so by virtue of the [law of] inheritance; but when they are not entitled to inherit, it is not obligatory that they should inherit by a bequest.

Ṭāwūs [b. Kaysān] and a few other [authorities], however, held that the [legislation concerning] bequests for parents has been abrogated, though it was confirmed for relatives not entitled to inherit. So it is not permissible for him who bequeaths to do so [to persons] other than relatives.

Since it is possible to maintain with Ṭāwūs that [the legislation] affecting relatives is [still] valid—in as much as the tradition transmitted by the authorities on [the Prophet's] campaigns merely states that the Prophet said: "No bequest for a successor [is valid]," it is deemed obligatory upon scholars to seek an evidence either in support or against Ṭāwūs's opinion.

We have found that the Apostle made a decision [concerning] six slaves owned by a man who possessed no other property and who had set them free at the time of his death. The Prophet divided them into three groups, freeing two [slaves] and leaving four in slavery. This [tradition] had been related to us by 'Abd al-Wahhāb [al-Thaqafī] from Ayyūb al-Sakhtiyānī from Abī Qilāba from Abī al-Muhallab from 'Imrān b. Ḥuṣayn from the Prophet.⁴⁴

130. [Shāfi'ī] said: Thus the indication of the sunna, as provided in the tradition of 'Imrān b. Ḥuṣayn, is that the Prophet's decree to free [the slaves] at the time of death constitutes a bequest. Since the person who freed the slaves was an Arab—and the Arabs own foreign [slaves] with whom they had no blood relationship—the Prophet allowed a bequest to them to be valid. This [precedent] indicates that if a bequest in favor of persons other than relatives were void, it would be void concerning the freed slaves [too], as they were not blood relatives of [the man] who set them free.

⁴⁴ Abū Dāwūd, Vol. IV, p. 28; Shāfi'ī, Kitāb al-Umm, Vol. IV, pp. 24, 27; Vol. VII, pp. 370-71 (margin).

It also indicates that the bequest of the deceased cannot exceed one third of his estate; that what exceeds one third is illegal; that bequests in favor of freeing slaves [already] earning money for their freedom (istis'ā')⁴⁵ are void; and that [the choosing of two freed slaves out of six] by dividing them [into three groups] is confirmed [on the basis of] the casting of lots.⁴⁶

Bequests to parents are no longer valid, since their [right to] inheritance as successors is confirmed. A bequest made by a deceased [person] to anyone—if he is not a successor—is valid. It is commendable—in my opinion—if [the deceased] leaves a bequest to his relatives.

131. Shāfi'i said:⁴⁷ There are in the Qur'ān other [examples] concerning abrogating and abrogated [legislation], which may be found in their [proper] places, in the Kitāb Ahkām al-Qur'ān.⁴⁸ I have discussed only some of the general principles on the strength of which the meaning of other examples may be sought. I am satisfied that these examples suffice for others hitherto not dealt with. May I ask God [for His] protection [from error] and for success [in following the right]. I have dealt with the duties imposed by God, the general and the specified, together with the sunna of the Apostle, so that those who have knowledge of the Book will know the place in which God has placed His Prophet in relation to His Book, His religion, and the followers of His religion. They will also know that to obey his orders means to obey God, and that his sunna is in conformity with what God revealed in His Book and that it is not contradictory to it at all. And he who comprehends this book knows that [God's] declaration is of various forms—not just one—, the common feature of which is that to the learned it is either clear or vague; but to those lacking in [legal] knowledge, the declaration varies in vagueness [in accordance with their degree of comprehension].

Chapter VII

[ON DUTIES]

The Duties Laid Down in the Text [of the Qur'an]

132. God, Glorious be His Praise, said:

Those who accuse women under iḥṣān [of unchastity] and do not then bring forward four witnesses, scourge them with eighty stripes, and do not ever accept any testimony of theirs again; they are the ungodly [Q. XXIV, 4].

Shāfi'ī said: The women under iḥṣān in question are those who are freewomen and have come of age. This indicates that iḥṣān is a collective term covering a variety of meanings.¹ [God] said:

Those who accuse their wives and have no witnesses except themselves—let one of them testify by God four times, that he is of those who speak the truth. And a fifth time, that the curse of God shall be upon him, if he should be of the liars. It shall avert the punishment from her if she testify by God four times that he is of the liars. And a fifth time, that the wrath of God shall be upon her, if he should be of the truthful [Q. XXIV, 6-9].

Since God has distinguished between the ruling [relating to the accusation] of the husband and [the ruling relating to] any one who may accuse other [than the husband]—punishing the one other than the husband, unless he produces four witnesses in support of his accusation, and excluding the husband from punishment by virtue of the *li'ān*²—this indicates that those who accuse women under iḥṣān, who are subject to scourging [as a punishment], are those who accuse free and mature women, not wives.

This is [another] example of what I have already explained that the Qur'ān [was revealed] in Arabic and that some of its communications are explicitly general, intended to have particular [meaning], not that one of the two communications meant to abrogate the other but that each is valid in the manner indicated by God. So a distinction should be made between the two [communications] in the manner God made the distinction and the two be joined together in the manner He united them.

So, if li'ān were invoked, the husband would not be punished, just as a party [in a dispute] is acquitted by witnesses; if he refuses to invoke the li'ān, he shall be punished if his wife is a free woman and mature of age.

133. [Shāfi'ī] said: The communication concerning li'ān was revealed in connection with [the case of 'Uwaymir] al-'Ajlānī and his wife and the Prophet executed the procedure of the li'ān between them. This [precedent of] li'ān was related by Sahl b. Sa'd al Sā'idī and Ibn 'Abbās; but neither Ibn 'Umar, who witnessed its execution, nor the others related the [actual] words pronounced by the Prophet on the li'ān.

These [authorities] related [other] decisions taken by the Apostle, not to be found in the Qur'ān, such as the cancellation [of the marriage contract] between the two parties in the li'ān, voiding [the blood relationship of] the child [to the accusing father], and his pronouncement: "If [the mother] gives birth to the child and it possesses [the physiognomy] indicated [by the accusing father], it belongs to the accused person." So if the child proves to possess after birth similar resemblances [to the accused person], he [the Prophet] said: "the child's status is clear [that it belongs to him who is accused], for has not God laid down the rule [in the Qur'ān]," [that such a case must be decided by li'ān, i. e., the cancellation of the marriage contract and the voiding of the blood-relationship of the child].⁸ Ibn 'Abbās [also] related that the Prophet, [on hearing the oath of accusation repeated for the fifth time], said: "Stop him [the husband], for this means punishment [for the wife]."⁹

134. Shāfi'ī said:¹⁰ We conclude that [the authorities] do not relate certain needed portions of the tradition and relate others, for had they known the portion concerning how the Prophet executed the li'ān [between husband and wife] they would have related it. They only knew that whoever was versed in the Book of God knew that the Prophet executed the li'ān in accordance with God's communication. They [the authorities] were merely satisfied with what God provided for li'ān, such as the number of oaths and that both could bear witness [as stated in Q. XXIV, 6-9] without citing the Apostle's decision on how he executed the li'ān [between husband and wife].

135. Shāfi'ī said: There are in the Book of God fully adequate [communications] concerning li'ān and the number of oaths; but some [of the authorities] have related [traditions] from the Prophet concerning the cancellation [of the marriage contract between the two parties in the li'ān] as I have already said. Such traditions from the Apostle, which are in agreement with the Book of God, have already been discussed.¹¹

⁸ See Shāfi'ī, Kitāb al-Umm, Vol. V, p. 114; and Kitāb Ikhtilāf al-Ḥadīth (margin of the Kitāb al-Umm, Vol. VII, pp. 305-306).

⁹ Should the husband pronounce a fifth oath, beyond the number necessary for li'ān, his accusation of adultery, if not counter-acted by the wife, would entail punishment of the wife by stoning to death. If the husband's fifth oath were false, he would be punished by fire after death for a false oath. See Shāfi'ī, Kitāb al-Umm, Vol. V, p. 111.

136. God said:

Fasting is prescribed for you as it was for those before you; perhaps you will show piety. A certain number of days [Q. II, 179-180].

And He specified the month by saying:

The month of Ramaḍān, in which the Qur'ān was sent down as guidance for the people and as evidences of the guidance and Furqān; so whoever of you is present during the month let him fast in it; but if anyone is sick or on a journey [let him fast] a number of other days. God desires ease for you, and desires not hardship for you; and [it is] in order that you may complete the [full] number of [days], and that you may magnify God for the guidance He hath given you; perhaps you will be thankful [Q. II, 181].

Shāfi'ī said: I have known of no authority who related a tradition from the Prophet specifying that the month for fasting was the month of Ramaḍān—which falls between Sha'bān and Shawwāl—owing to certainty as to the place of Ramaḍān among the other months; for men have been satisfied that God imposed the duty.

They [men] have obligated themselves to observe fasting during travel, and when they may break it, and they knew how to make up for this duty as well as others on which there is no explicit text in the Book [of God]. Nor have I known anyone besides the scholars who needed [to know] which month was Ramaḍān or whether [fasting in this month] was obligatory. The same may be said about other prescribed duties: That [men] must perform the prayer, [pay] the alms and—for those who can manage it—perform the Pilgrimage; that adultery, homicide, and similar acts are forbidden.

137. [Shāfi'ī] said: Certain traditions have come from the Apostle on these matters for which there are no specific texts in the Qur'ān, but the Apostle has specified on God's behalf the meaning intended by Him, while the Muslims provided a number of derivative rules on which the Apostle laid down no specific sunna.

For instance, concerning the man who divorces his wife by pronouncing the third declaration [of divorce],⁷ God said:

If he divorces her, she shall not be lawful to him after that, until she marries another husband. If he divorces her, then it is no fault for them to return to each other [Q. II, 230].

God's saying: "Until she marries another husband" may mean either until she [formally] marries another husband—this was the meaning accepted by those to whom the communication was addressed and she was regarded as married once the marriage contract was concluded—or until she [actually] had intercourse with another husband, for the term nikāḥ may include both intercourse and the marriage contract.⁸ So when the Apostle once said to a divorced woman, whose divorce was pronounced three times by her husband and who was then married to another man: "You will not be lawful [to your first husband] until you have tasted the sweetness [of the second husband] and he has tasted yours,"⁹ he meant that she must have intercourse with another husband, and that nikāḥ [includes] intercourse. 519

138. Someone may ask: Will you cite a tradition from the Apostle in support of your statement?

139. [Shāfi'ī] replied: Sufyān [b. 'Uyayna] told us from Ibn Shihāb [al-Zuhri] from 'Urwa [b. al-Zubayr] from 'Ā'isha, who said: 523

The wife of Rifā'a [al-Qurazī] once came to the Prophet and said: 'Rifā'a has divorced me [complete divorce] and 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. al-Zabīr married me, but [the latter's organ] is as limp as cloth's nap.' 'Do you want to go back to Rifā'a?' asked the Apostle, [and he stipulated]: 'No, not until you taste his sweetness and he tastes yours.'¹⁰ 524

⁷ Būlāq ed., p. 23.

⁹ The figurative meaning of the word 'usayla' is used in the Arabic text. See Lane, Lexicon, p. 2046.

¹⁰ Bukhārī, Vol. III, p. 477; Abū Dāwūd, Sunan, Vol. II, p. 294. See also

140. Shāfi'ī said: So the Apostle made it clear that God made her lawful to the husband who pronounced her divorced thrice [only] after another marriage [was consummated] with nikāḥ, that is, if the nikāḥ was followed by intercourse with the other husband.

[Quranic] Duties for Which the Apostle Provided Sunna

141. God, Blessed and Most High, said:

When you stand up to pray, wash your faces, and your hands up to the elbows, and wipe your heads, and your feet up to the ankles. If you are polluted, purify yourselves [Q. V, 8-9].

S 161

And He said:

Do not perform the prayer . . . when you are polluted—unless you are travellers on the road—until you wash yourselves [Q. IV, 46].

So [God] made it clear that cleanliness from junub (pollution) must be performed by complete washing (ghusl), not by ablution.¹¹

142. Shāfi'ī said: ¹² The Apostle laid down sunna for ablution in conformity with God's communication: So he [the Prophet] washed his face, and his hands to the elbows; wiped his head; and washed his feet up to the ankles. [For] 'Abd al-'Azīz b. Muḥammad [al-Darāwardī] told us from Zayd b. Aslam from 'Aṭā' b. Yasār from Ibn 'Abbās from the Prophet that the latter performed the ablution [by washing] each limb once.¹³

Shāfi'ī, Kitāb al-Umm, Vol. V, p. 229; Vol. VII, p. 314 (margin); and Ṭabarī, Tafsīr, Vol. IV, pp. 590-96.

¹¹ See Ṭabarī, Tafsīr, Vol. VIII, pp. 379-84; Vol. X, p. 82.

¹³ Bukhārī, Vol. I, p. 47; Abū Dāwūd, Vol. I, p. 34; Tirmidhī, Sunan,

Mālik [b. Anas] told us from 'Amr b. Yāḥya [al-Māzinī] from his father who asked 'Abd-Allāh b. Zayd, the grandfather of 'Amr b. Yāḥya, "Are you able to show me how the Apostle performed ablution?" "Yes," replied 'Abd-Allāh b. Zayd, and he asked for water. He poured it over his hands and washed twice; he rinsed [his mouth] and sniffed [water into his nose] thrice; he washed his face thrice, and washed his hands up to the elbows twice [each time], and wiped his head with his hands moving them from the front and brought them back—he began with his forehead until he carried them to his neck, then he brought them back to the place from which he had started—and [finally] he washed his feet.¹⁴

The literal [meaning] of God's saying: "Wash your faces" is that the minimum requirement for washing is once [each time], but it may [also] mean more [than once]. So the Apostle decreed that ablution must be performed by washing once [each time], in conformity with the literal [meaning] of the Qur'ān. This is the minimum requirement for washing,¹⁵ but it may mean more than once since [the Prophet] performed it twice and three times.

Since [the Prophet] washed once [also], we have concluded that if once does not fulfil [the duty], he would not have performed it once before prayer. More than one ablution is [therefore] optional—not obligatory—and that less than that, [i. e., once] does not fulfil [the duty].

This is in conformity with what I have already said concerning other duties, namely that if the traditions were lacking, the Book would be satisfactory without them; but if traditions were found about them, they indicate that they should be in conformity with the Book of God.

143. [Shāfi'ī said]: It may be that the authorities have related traditions to indicate that although the Apostle ordinarily performed the ablution three times, they were intended to be optional, not obligatory, so that the performance of less than that number would not be regarded as failure to fulfil the duty. However, since certain traditions specify that "he who performs the ablution thrice before prayer—and performing a two-cycle prayer twice—without any distracting thought [mixed with the prayer], his [sins] would be forgiven," [men] desired to increase the [number of] ablutions, but such increase is supererogatory.

In the performance of ablution, the Apostle washed his [hands] including the elbows, and [the feet] including the ankles. The [Quranic] communication [concerning washing] may either mean washing including [the elbows and ankles] or washing without them. It was perhaps for clarifying the meanings of this [communication] that the [two] traditions were related. The one closest to the literal meaning of the divine communication specifies that [the elbows and ankles] should be [included] in the washing. For this [washing] is made clear in the sunna as well as in the Qur'ān. But though this as well as the other [declarations] in the Qur'ān are clear enough to the scholars, to others the clarity in both is not the same.

The Apostle laid down a sunna that washing to free one's self from pollution includes the washing of the genital organs, the ablution—like the ablution before prayer—and the complete washing (ghusl). We recommend that [his example] be followed.

I know of no scholar from whom I have learned who has disagreed that any washing should be satisfactory, provided that it is complete, although men prefer otherwise [i. e., ablution and complete washing]. For [the Qur'ān] prescribes washing [only] without any specifications as in the case of ablution.

The Apostle laid down sunnas regulating [the circumstances that call for] ablution, and the [kinds of] pollution which must be washed away, for such matters have not been dealt with in the Book [of God].

S 166

[Quranic] Duties Which the Sunna Specified are Intended To Be Particular

144. God, Blessed and Most High, said:

They will ask thee for a pronouncement. Say: God pronounces to you concerning the indirect heirs. If a man perishes and has no children, but he has a sister, she shall receive a half of what he leaves and he is her heir if she has no children [Q. IV, 175].

And He said:

To the men belongs a share of what parents and near relatives leave, and to the women belongs a share of what parents and near relatives leave, whether it be little or much, a share prescribed [Q. IV, 8]. B24

And He said:

And to his parents, to each one of the two belongs a sixth of what he leaves, if he has children; but if he has no children and his heirs are his parents, a third to his mother, or, if he has brothers, to his mother a sixth, after any bequests he may bequeath or any debts [have been paid]. As to your fathers or your sons you do not know which of them is the most advantageous to you. So God apportions; verily, God is All-knowing, All-wise. B16

A half of what your wives leave belongs to you, if they have no children; but if they have children, a fourth of what they leave belongs to you after any bequests they may bequeath or debts [have been paid] [Q. IV, 12-13].

And He said:

To them belongs a fourth of what you leave, if you have no children; but if you have children, an eighth of what you have belongs to them, after any bequest you may bequeath or debts [have been paid] [Q. IV, 14].

The sunna [merely] specified what God has provided for those who are eligible to inherit: Brothers, sisters, children, and the near relatives, parents, spouses, and all those who are eligible to inherit in accordance with [the text of] the Book, provided that the legator and the legatee [either] profess the same religion [i. e., Islam] and belong to the people of the lands of Muslims¹⁶ or are [non-Muslims] in treaty relations with Muslims [by virtue of which] their lives and property are secured.¹⁷ If they are polytheists, they are eligible to inherit in accordance with their [own law of]/polytheism. For Sufyān [b. 'Uyayna] told us from al-Zuhri from 'Alī b. Ḥusayn from 'Amr b. 'Uthmān from Usāma b. Zayd who related that the Apostle said: "The Muslim cannot inherit from a non-Muslim, nor the non-Muslim from the Muslim."¹⁸

Furthermore, the legator and the legatee must be freemen and Muslims. [For] Ibn 'Uyayna told us from Ibn Shihāb [al-Zuhri] from Sālim [b. 'Abd-Allāh] from his father that the Apostle said: "He who sells a slave possessing property, the property belongs to the seller unless the buyer stipulated otherwise."¹⁹

145. [Shāfi'ī] said: It is evident in the sunna of the Apostle that the slave cannot own property, that what he owns belongs to his master, and that ascribing to him title to property—which may be [found] in his hands—merely means that it is added to him [as an additional property], and not that he possesses it, for [the slave] cannot be an owner [so long as] he is incapable of possession, rather he himself is possessed; he may be sold, given in gift, or bequeathed [as a chattel]. For God [made lawful] the transfer of the property of the dead to the living who can own what the dead had owned. So if the slave were to inherit property whether as a father or in

¹⁶ Dār al-Muslimīn or Dār al-Islām is the territory of Islam. It may be defined, broadly speaking, as the territory whose inhabitants observe Islamic law, or, strictly speaking, the territory under Islamic rule. See M. Khadduri, War and Peace in the Law of Islam, pp. 155-57.

¹⁷ Non-Muslims who accepted Muslim rule by virtue of a treaty or a charter are called ahl al-dhimma or scriptuaries. See ibid., Chap. 17.

any other capacity his share of the inheritance would be owned by his master on his behalf, [even though] the master is neither the father of the deceased nor an heir entitled to a share in the inheritance. So if the slave were given the right of inheritance as a father, it means the master will have the right of inheritance and we would have given such a right [to a person] to whom God has not given it. For that reason, as I have pointed out, we do not favor giving [the right of] inheritance to the slave, nor to any one who is not in possession of freedom and [the faith of] Islam and who is not devoid of homicidal intent so that he is not regarded as a criminal. For Mālik [b. Anas] related from Yahya b. Sa'īd from 'Amr b. Shu'ayb that the Apostle said: "He who kills [another] cannot inherit [from him]." ²⁰

146. Shāfi'ī said: ²¹ So we hold that he who kills [another] will not inherit from him. For the minimum [penalty] for a killer with a criminal intent is to deprive him of [the right of] inheritance, since he is disobedient to God and incurs His displeasure. There is no disagreement among the learned whom I have known, whether in this country or in another, that the Muslim cannot inherit from another unless he is a freeman and clear of criminal intent. Their agreement—on what I have just stated—is a binding-evidence on them that they should never disagree on any of the sunna of the Apostle. For if the sunna on matters for which there are textual communications has the same place as these communications; and is as binding [on men] as the Qur'ān, it indicates that for whatever else the sunna provided—for which there are no divine communications—it should be as binding [as the Qur'ān]. The scholars should be the last to have doubts as to its binding force, and should know that God's commands and those of His Apostle are not contradictory, but follow the same pattern. [For] God, Blessed and Most High, said:

Do not consume your property among you in vanity, although there be trading by mutual consent on your part [Q. IV, 33].

²¹ Būlāq ed., p. 25.

147. [Shāfi'ī said]: ²² And He said:

That is for their having said: Sale is just the same as usury, though God hath permitted sale and forbidden usury [Q. II, 276].

Moreover, the Apostle prohibited certain [kinds of] sale, mutually agreed upon among partners—which become unlawful—such as [the exchange of] gold for gold except in equal quantities, and gold for silver, whether in cash or credit,²³ or whatever is implied in their meaning provided the exchange involves [neither] risk nor the concealment of anything [concerning the sale] from the buyer by the vendor.

So the sunna indicated that God made lawful sales [of every kind] which are not forbidden, except those which He has forbidden through His Prophet's tongue.

Moreover, the Apostle provided sunna for other [kinds of] sale, such as the following:

1. [If] a slave is sold with a defect concealed by the vendor [in order] to deceive the purchaser, the latter has the right to return [the slave] and keep any profits [arising from the slave's employment].²⁴

2. If a person sells a slave who possesses property, the property belongs to the vendor unless stipulated otherwise [in the contract of sale].²⁵

3. If a person sells a pollinated palm tree, the fruits belong to the vendor unless stipulated otherwise, [in the contract of sale].²⁶

These [traditions] are binding on men for God imposed the obligation that they should obey [the Prophet's] order.

General Duties:[Prayer]

148. God, Blessed and Most High, said:

Verily prayer has become for the believers a thing prescribed [to take place at] stipulated times [Q. IV, 104].

And He said:

Observe the prayer and pay the zakāt (legal alms) [Q. II, 40, 77, 104 etc.].

And He said to His Prophet:

Take of their wealth a ṣadaqa (free-will alms)²⁷ to cleanse and purify them thereby and pray for them [Q. IX, 104].

And He said:

Pilgrimage to the House is a duty to God from the people, whoever is able to make his way there [Q. III, 91].

God has laid down in the Qur'ān the duties of prayer, zakāt and pilgrimage and specified the modes [of their performances] through His Prophet's tongue. § 176

So the Apostle specified that prayers [each day] shall number five; that the number of cycles²⁸ in the noon, 'aṣr²⁹ and the evening prayers shall number four repeated twice in the towns; and that cycles at the sunset prayer shall number three, and at the dawn prayer two.

He decreed that in all [the prayers] there should be recitals

²⁷ Shāfi'ī seems to use zakāt and ṣadaqa interchangeably, although the two are not strictly speaking synonymous terms. Ṣadaqa, a free-will alms, may be called a poor-rate. Thus ṣadaqa is included in the zakāt, but the latter is imposed for broader purposes of state, including expenditure for military operations. See G.-H. Bousquet and J. Schacht, Selected Works of C. Snouck Hurgronje (Leiden, 1957), Chap. 3 on zakāt.

²⁹ 'Aṣr is the mid-afternoon.

from [the Qur'ān], audible in the sunset, evening, and dawn prayers, and silent recitals in the noon and 'aṣr prayers.

He specified that at the beginning of every prayer there shall be the takbīr [declaration that God is great] and at the ending the taslīm [salutations on the Prophet and his house] and that each [prayer] consists of the takbīr, the recital, the bowing, and two prostrations after each inclination, but beyond these nothing is obligatory.

He decreed that prayer while one is on a journey can be shorter—if the traveller so desires—in the three performances that have four cycles, but he made no change in the sunset and dawn prayers when the prayer is performed in town. However, all prayers must be [performed] in the direction of the qibla [facing Makka], whether one is in town or on a journey, except in the case of prayer of fear.³⁰

He decreed that supererogatory [prayers] must be performed in the same manner; They are unlawful without the purification or the recital or any other requirements for obligatory [prayers] such as the bowings, prostrations and the qibla whether performed in the towns or in the country or on the ground during travel. In a supererogatory prayer, however, the rider may pray in any direction that his animal may be moving. [For] Ibn Abī Fudayk told us from Ibn Abī Dhī'b from 'Uthmān b. 'Abd-Allāh b. Surāqa from Jābir b. 'Abd-Allāh that in the campaign against the Banū Anmār the Apostle was [seen] praying while riding his camel toward the east.³¹ A similar tradition was transmitted by Muslim [b. Khālid al-Zanjī] from Ibn Jurayj from Abū Zubayr from Jābir; but I do not know whether the name of the Banū Anmār was mentioned or whether the tradition [merely] stated that [the Prophet] prayed during travel.³²

The Apostle also decreed that in the feast- and rain-prayers the number of bowings and prostrations must be the same;

³⁰ Prayer of fear may be performed in case of a threat or an attack in war. See Shāfi'ī, Kitāb al-Umm, Vol. I, pp. 83-84.

but he added a cycle to the eclipse-prayer, raising the number [of bowings and prostrations] in each cycle to two. So we are told by Mālik [b. Anas] from Yahya b. Sa'id from 'Amara [daughter of 'Abd al-Raḥmān] from 'Ā'isha from the Prophet. The same [tradition] was related by Mālik [b. Anas] from Hishām from his father from 'Ā'isha from the Prophet; and from Mālik b. Anas from Zayd b. Aslam from 'Atā' b. Yasār from Ibn 'Abbās from the Prophet. The wording of the Prophet's prayer, related by 'Ā'isha and Ibn 'Abbās, may be somewhat different, but all are agreed that [he performed] the eclipse-prayer in two cycles, each one [repeated] twice.³³

Concerning prayer, God said:

Verily the prayer has become for the believers a thing prescribed for stated times [Q. IV, 104].

The Apostle specified on God's behalf the time [of each prayer]. He performed [each] prayer at its specified time, except that when he was besieged in the battle of al-Aḥzāb³⁴ he could not [perform each] prayer on time for that reason; so he delayed [the prayers] until [he was able to perform] the noon, the 'aṣr, the sunset, and the evening prayers at the same time.

Muḥammad b. Ismā'il b. Fudayk told us from Ibn Abī Dhī'b from al-Maqburī from 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. Abī Sa'id from his father who said:

We were withheld from performing prayer during [the battle of] the Trench for a long while, till [late at] night, but when we were relieved from fighting—as God said: 'God relieved the believers of fighting, for God is strong, and mighty' [Q. XXXIII,

³³ Mālik, Vol. I, pp. 186-88; Bukhārī, Vol. I, pp. 264-65; Shāfi'i, Kitāb al-Umm, Vol. I, pp. 214-15.

25]—the Apostle ordered Bilāl³⁵ [to call believers to prayer], and they performed the noon-prayer as fully as if it were at its time, and then performed the 'aṣr, the sunset and the evening prayers in like manner. This [incident] took place before the communication concerning the fear-prayer was revealed, which runs as follows: 'If you fear [danger] pray either on foot or mounted!' [Q. II, 240].³⁶

149. [Shāfi'ī] said: So Abū Sa'īd made it clear that [the practice of deferred prayers] preceded the communication to the Prophet concerning fear-prayer. The communication in which the fear-prayer is stated runs as follows:

When thou art journeying in the land, there is no fault in you if you shorten the prayer, if you fear the unbelievers may molest you. Verily the unbelievers are for you a manifest enemy. S 181

When thou art amongst them and hast set up the prayer for them, let a party of them stand with thee, and let them take their weapons, and when they prostrate themselves, let them be behind you; and then let another party who have not prayed come and pray with thee, taking their precautions and their weapons [Q. IV, 102-103]. B 26

Mālik [b. Anas] told us from Yazīd b. Rūmān, from Šāliḥ b. Khawwāt from those who prayed with the Apostle the fear-prayer during the campaign of Dhāt al-Riqā' said:

A company [of believers] stood in rank [for prayer] with [the Prophet] while another watched the enemy. He performed one cycle with those who stood with him and remained standing until the company completed [the prayer]. Having thus taken the position of those facing the enemy, another company stood [with the Prophet], who performed the other cycle and remained sitting while the company completed their prayer until he [uttered] the salutation with them.³⁷ S 182

³⁵ Bilāl was the son of an Abyssinian slave-woman, whom the Prophet called "the first fruit of Abbyssinia," and to this day he is known as the Prophet's mu'azzin, or the one who calls to prayer. See Ibn Hishām, Vol. I, p. 205; Vol. II, pp. 822, 917; Guillaume's translation, pp. 144, 554, 616.

³⁷ Mālik, Vol. I, pp. 183-84; Bukhārī, Vol. III, pp. 100-102; Ṭabari, Tafsīr, Vol. IX, pp. 141-62; Shāfi'ī, Kitāb al-Umm, Vol. I, p. 186.

The same tradition has been related by 'Abd-Allāh b. 'Umar b. Ḥaṣṣ from his brother 'Ubayd-Allāh b. 'Umar from al-Qāsim b. Muḥammad from Ṣāliḥ b. Khawwāt from his father Khawwāt b. Jubayr from the Prophet.⁸⁸

It is evident from these [traditions]—as I have already stated in this book—that whenever the Apostle laid down a sunna inspired by God in order to abandon or abrogate another, he laid it down as an evidence given to men that they should obey this sunna, not the earlier one. § 183

So God abrogated [the communication concerning] the deferment of prayer in the event of fear and [replaced it] by another—as both God and His Prophet have laid it down—directing that it should be [performed] at its [specified] time. The Apostle abrogated his sunna concerning the deferment of this prayer in accordance with God's command by another sunna, and the Apostle [himself] performed this prayer at its specified time, as I already have pointed out. [For] Mālik [b. Anas] told us from Nāfi' from Ibn 'Umar, who stated concerning fear-prayer that the Prophet said: § 184

If there is a serious fear [of danger], you may pray on foot or mounted regardless of the direction of the qibla.⁸⁹

A similar tradition was related by a certain man on the authority of Ibn Abī Dhi'b, from al-Zuhri from Sālim from his father from the Prophet. § 185

150. [Shāfi'i] said: So the sunna of the Apostle indicated, as I have already said, that [facing] the qibla is at all times obligatory except when it is impossible to perform the prayer in the specified direction, such as at the time of sword-play, flight [from battle], or equivalent situations in which it is impossible to pray in the direction [of the qibla].

Thus the sunna was confirmed that the prayer must not be deferred beyond its specified time, but that [it should be performed] in whatever direction the person is able to do it.

The Zakāt (Legal Alms)

151. God said:

Observe the prayer and pay the zakāt [Q. II, 40, 77, 104].

S 186

And He said:

And the observers of the prayer and the payers of the zakāt [Q. IV, 160].

And He said:

So woe to those who pray, who of their prayer are careless, who make a show, but withhold charity [Q. CVII, 4-7].

Some of the scholars said: [These communications refer to] the duty of zakāt.

God said:

Take of their goods a freewill offering to cleanse and purify them thereby, and pray for them; thy prayers are comfort for them. God is All-hearing, All-knowing [Q. IX, 104].

The reference of this communication is to goods in general, but it may [also refer] to certain goods to the exclusion of others. So the sunna specified that the zakāt should be paid on some goods, not on all.

Since goods are of various categories—such as the cattle—the Apostle ordered the payment [of alms] on camels and sheep, and indicated—as we are told—that it should be paid on cows in particular from among the cattle, and a certain percentage has been specified by God through His Prophet's tongue.⁴⁰ Since men possessed cattle consisting of horses, donkeys and mules and others which the Apostle exempted from payment—for he laid down the sunna that horses were exempt from alms—it is evident that alms must be paid only on what [the Prophet] specified, not on all.

⁴⁰ The Prophet ordered Mu'adh b. Jabal, governor of al-Yāman, that the zakāt should be paid on cows: a calf for every thirty cows and one cow for every forty. See Shāfi'ī, Kitāb al-Umm, Vol. II, pp. 7-8; Shawkānī, Nayl al-Awṭār, Vol. IV, pp. 141-42; Abū Dāwūd, Vol. II, pp. 101-102; Ibn Ḥanbal, Vol. VI, p. 4.

As to men who possess sown and planted products such as palm-dates and grapes, the Apostle ordered payment of alms on both on [the basis of] a rough estimate [of the value of each tree]. The rate of payment was one-tenth [of the total value] if [the land] were watered by rain or from a spring and half of the one-tenth if it were watered by wells.⁴¹

Some of the scholars held by analogy to palm-trees and grapes that [alms] on olive trees [should be one-tenth as well].

Since men possess crops of varied produce other than palm-dates, grapes and olives, such as walnuts, almonds, figs, and others, which the Apostle has exempted from payment, we concluded that God imposed the payment of alms on some crops, but not on all.

152. Shāfi'ī said: ⁴² Men have produced wheat, barley, millet and similar products, on which, we are told, the Apostle ordered the payment [of alms]. By analogy of wheat and barley, alms have been paid on grain, sult [kind of barley],⁴³ 'alas [kind of wheat],⁴⁴ rice, and all other products which men have produced and eaten, such as bread, 'aṣīda, sawīq, udm,⁴⁵ chick-peas and qaṭṭānī [general term for lentils, etc.] which may be made into flour or bread, etc., in the same way as the Prophet ordered the payment of the alms on similar products which men produced for food.⁴⁶

Men have produced other products on which neither the Apostle, nor those who succeeded him, ordered payment [of alms], for they do not fall in the category of products on which [the Prophet] imposed alms, such as thufā', asbiyūsh, kusbara [coriander], 'uṣfur⁴⁷ and others. So these are [all] exempt from alms. This indicates that alms are [obligatory] on some products, but not on all.

153. Shāfi'ī said: ⁴⁸ The Apostle ordered the payment of alms on silver, and the Muslims followed his precedent on gold, either [on the strength of] a narrative which was not transmitted to us⁴⁹ or on [the strength of] analogy that gold and silver are measures of price which men used to hoard or pay in exchange for goods in various countries before the rise of Islam and after it. S 192

Men possess other [kinds of] metal such as brass, iron, and lead on which neither the Apostle nor those who succeeded him imposed alms. They are exempt on [the strength of] precedent and they should not, by analogy with gold and silver, be subject to alms, for gold and silver are used as standards for prices in all countries, and all other metals may be purchased by them on the basis of a specific weight at a certain time. S 193

Although ruby and chrysolite are more precious than gold and silver, neither the Apostle nor those who succeeded him have imposed alms on them as far as we know. Since they are possessed by a special [class] and are not used as a medium of exchange—because they are not measures of price—they are exempt [from alms].⁵⁰ S 194

154. Shāfi'ī said: ⁵¹ According to what the public have related from the Apostle concerning the alms on the cattle and measures of price [i. e., gold and silver], he ordered its payment once a year. For God said:

Give the due portion of it on the day of its harvesting [Q. VI, 142].

So the Prophet decreed the payment of alms on the produce of sowing and planting, in conformity with God's communication, at the time of the harvest, not at other times. And he specified that [the alms] on rikāz [natural and hidden treasures] shall be one-fifth, to be paid on the day they are produced, not at other times.⁵² For Sufyān [b. 'Uyayna] told us from al-Zuhri from [Sa'id] b. al-Musayyib and Abū Salama from Abū Hurayra that the Apostle said: "One-fifth [shall be paid] on rikāz."⁵³

If it were not for the evidence of the sunna, all goods would have been treated on an equal footing on [the basis of] the literal meaning of the Qur'ān, and the alms would have been imposed on all, not on some only.

[Pilgrimage]

155. [Shāfi'i said]: God imposed the duty of al-ḥajj (Pilgrimage) on all who can perform it.⁵⁴ It has been related from the Prophet that the means (al-sabīl) consists of the necessary provisions and transport (i. e., donkey or camel).⁵⁵ And he [the Prophet] specified the time of Pilgrimage, how to pronounce the formula of fulfilling [the duty],⁵⁶ and what is decreed [as recommended acts], and what should be avoided in the wearing of garments and the use of perfumes as well as other procedural matters [such as the halts] at the [sanctuary] of 'Arafa and the [passing of the night at] Muzdalifa, and the throwing [of the stones at Minā], the shaving [of the head], the circumambulation [of the Ka'ba] and other matters.⁸⁷

If someone was unaware that there was a sunna for matters on which there was a text in the Book of God except what I have already stated concerning the sunna laid down by the Apostle [specifying] the meaning implied in God's general communication, and that [the Prophet] merely explained God's prescribed acts, prohibited or permitted that I have mentioned, and all other matters connected with them, including their time of fulfilment as well as other matters not dealt with [in God's communications], it became obligatory on men that if the sunna of the Apostle confirms [and explains] God's communication in one or more instances it shall do so always.

It is evident that the [Prophet's] sunna never contradicts the Book of God, and that his sunna—even in the absence of legislation in the Book—is binding, as I have already stated here and elsewhere, in accordance with God's command to obey His Apostle. [For] it is obligatory on men to know that God has not given any other [person] such power save His Apostle, and that the word and deed of every person should be in conformity with the Book of God and the sunna of His Apostle. And the words and deeds of every one should conform to the Book of God and the sunna of His Apostle, and that should the opinion of a certain scholar be contradictory to the sunna of the Apostle, one should abandon that opinion when he becomes aware of the contradiction and should obey the sunna of the Prophet; for if one does not do so he is not excused. For what is more obligatory on men than that they should obey the Prophet, an obligation indicating the place in which [God] placed him in relation to His revelations, His religion and the followers of His religion?

[The 'Idda or Waiting Period]

156. God said:

Those of you who die, leaving wives, let them keep to themselves for four months and ten days [Q. II, 234].

And He said:

Divorced women shall keep to themselves for three periods [Q. II, 228].

And He said:

For those of your women who have despaired of [further] menstruation, if you are in doubt, their period of waiting shall be three months, as it is for those who have not menstruated as yet. For those who are pregnant, their term is when they are delivered of what they bear [Q. LXV, 4].

Some of the scholars said: Since God has obligated the woman whose husband dies to wait four months and ten [days], and has specified the period of waiting for the pregnant [woman] to last until she has been delivered, [it follows that] if the husband dies and the woman is pregnant she is bound by the two periods concurrently just as she would be bound to fulfil any other two duties combined together.⁵⁸

157. [Shāfi'i] said: But since the Apostle said to Subay'a, daughter of al-Hārith, who gave birth to a child a few days after her husband's death: "You are lawful [for marriage] and you may get married," this indicates that the 'idda—whether in the case of death or divorce to be fulfilled by [the expiration of] the required months—was intended to [bind] women who are not pregnant; but if they are pregnant the 'idda is dropped.⁵⁹

⁵⁸ This is the opinion of Ibn 'Abbās and, perhaps, 'Alī. See Shawkānī, Nayl al-Awṭār, Vol. VI, pp. 306-307.

⁵⁹ See Mālik, Vol. II, pp. 589-90; Abū Dāwūd, Vol. II, p. 293; Shāfi'i, Kitāb al-Umm, Vol. II, pp. 205-206; Shawkānī, Nayl al-Awṭār, Vol. VI, p. 305.

[Forbidden Women]

158. God said:

Forbidden to you are your mothers and daughters, your sisters, your aunts, paternal and maternal, your brother's daughters, your sister's daughters, your mothers who have given suck to you, your suckling sisters, your wives' mothers, your stepdaughters who are in your care being born of your wives you have been in to—but if you have not yet been in to them, it is no fault in you—and the spouses of your sons who are of your loins. And it is forbidden for you to take two sisters together, unless it be a thing of the past; God is All-forgiving, All-compassionate; and wedded women except what your right hand has possessed. So God prescribes for you. And it is lawful for you to seek what is beyond that by means of your wealth in wedlock and not in debauchery; those of them whom you enjoy thereby pay their hire as stipulated, and it is no fault in you in regard to anything you may give them by mutual agreement beyond the stipulated amount. Verily God is All-knowing, All-wise [Q. IV, 27-28].

This communication may have two meanings: [it may mean] that the women whom God has [specifically] forbidden shall be [regarded as] forbidden, and that those whom He has not specifically forbidden, shall be lawful on the ground that He is [both] silent about them and by His saying: "And [it is] lawful for you to seek what is beyond that" [Q. II, 28]. This may be regarded as the literal meaning of the communication.⁶⁰

But it is evident in this communication that the prohibition concerning the taking of [the two sisters] together as wives must be distinguished from the prohibition of taking mothers [as wives]. So what God specified as lawful shall be lawful; what He specified as forbidden shall be forbidden; and what He prohibited concerning the taking of the two sisters together [as wives] shall be prohibited.

God's prohibition of the taking [of two sisters] as wives is an evidence that He has [merely] forbidden taking them together, but that taking each one separately is lawful in principle while the taking of mothers, daughters, and paternal and maternal aunts is unlawful in principle.

⁶⁰ See Ṭabarī, Tafsīr, Vol. VIII, pp. 141-79.

The meaning implied in the communication: "And [it is] lawful for you to seek what is beyond that" is to specify those women who are in principle forbidden as well as others of equal status related by suckling—these can only be married in accordance with [the prerequisites of] lawful marriage. § 203 159. Some one may ask: What is the evidence for that?

160. The answer is: ⁶¹ Since [the maximum number of] women who may lawfully be taken as wives is four, the taking of a fifth [would be unlawful] and the marriage contract would have to be dissolved. For no [woman] shall be lawful unless taken in accordance with a valid marriage contract. The taking of a fifth woman, like the taking of a single one, is lawful in accordance with God's saying: "And [it is] lawful for you what is beyond that," provided she is taken in a lawful manner and in circumstances making the marriage lawful and not forbidden in principle.

But marriage between a man and a woman will not, under any circumstances, forbid other marriages to her paternal or maternal aunts—as God has forbidden his marriage to the wives' mothers—so her paternal and maternal aunts may be included in the category of who may lawfully be married. § 204^{2c} Just as it is lawful for a man to marry another woman if one of his four wives is separated from him [by death or divorce], so the maternal aunt becomes lawful, if the daughter of her brother is separated [from her husband].⁶²

[Forbidden Food]

161. God said to His Prophet:

Say: I do not find, in what is revealed to me, anything forbidden to one who eats of it, unless it be a dead animal, or blood out-

⁶¹ Būlāq ed., p. 29.

⁶² For further discussion on forbidden women, see Shāfiʿī, Kitāb al-Umm, Vol. V, pp. 2-5.

poured, or the flesh of swine, for it is an abomination, or an impious thing over which the name of a god other than God has been invoked [Q. VI, 146].

This communication may have two meanings: First, that nothing is forbidden at all except what God has [specifically] excluded. This is the clearest and the broadest meaning and any one presented with it will understand at once that nothing is forbidden except what God has specifically forbidden. If it means otherwise, the scholars are under obligation to accept no other meaning save what the sunna of the Prophet specifies and they should say: "This is the meaning intended by God, Blessed and Most High."

Nothing in the Book of God nor in the sunna [of His Prophet] is regarded as a particular [communication] unless there is a specific [evidence] in either one or in both, and nothing is regarded as particular unless the divine communication is intended to mean particular. So what is not intended to be a [particular] communication, must never be so regarded.

So God's saying: "Say: I do not find, in what is revealed to me, anything forbidden to one who eats of it . . .," may mean that the Apostle was asked [to specify] a certain thing to the exclusion of others. And it may [also] mean [nothing forbidden] in what you were eating. This [may be] the appropriate meaning in accordance with the evidence of the sunna. For Sufyān [b. 'Uyayna] told us from Ibn Shihāb from Abū Idrīs al-Khawlānī from Abū Tha'laba [al-Khushnī] that the Prophet prohibited "the eating of beasts having fangs."⁶³ And Mālik [b. Anas] told us from Ismā'il b. Abī Ḥakīm from 'Abīda b. Sufyān al-Haḍramī from Abū Hurayra from the Prophet who said: "The eating of any of the beasts which have fangs is forbidden."⁶⁴

[Women's Abstention during the 'Idda of Their Husbands' Death]

162. God said:

Those of you who die, leaving wives, let them keep to themselves for four months and ten [days]; when they reach the end of their term, then it is no fault in you what they may do with themselves honorably. God is aware of what you do [Q. II, 234].

So God specified that [women] who [suffer] the death [of their husbands] are under obligation of the 'idda [four months and ten days] and that upon the expiration of the term they shall be free to do honorably with themselves whatever they may wish, but He mentioned nothing else to be avoided during the 'idda.⁶⁵

The literal meaning of the divine communication is that [the widow] should abstain only from getting married during the 'idda and that she should stay in her house.

[The communication] may [also] mean that [the widow] should [not only] abstain from marriage, but also from certain other things which were not forbidden to her before the 'idda, such as [the use of] perfume and [the wearing of] ornaments. S 209

Since the Prophet decreed that the widow must abstain from the use of perfume and the like, she is under obligation to do so [by virtue] of the duty imposed by the sunna, but her abstention from marriage and her stay in the house of her [deceased] husband are [imposed on her] by the Book and the sunna.

The sunna's role here as elsewhere is [merely] to specify on God's behalf what [the widow] should abstain from doing, just as it specifies [the duties of] prayer, alms, and pilgrimage. The sunna [also] provides [rules] laid down by the Apostle [for matters] on which there is no divine communication. B 30 S 210

Chapter VIII

[ON THE NATURE OF GOD'S ORDERS OF PROHIBITION AND THE PROPHET'S ORDERS OF PROHIBITION]¹

163. He [the interlocutor] asked: Will you explain to me the sum-total of God's orders of prohibition and the Prophet's orders of prohibition generally, leaving nothing [unexplained]?

164. Shāfi'ī replied: [God's] orders of prohibition fall in two [categories] of meanings:

First, the act prohibited must be in itself unlawful, never to be lawful except by a particular indication laid down by God in His Book or [specified] by His Prophet's tongue. Thus if the Apostle prohibits a certain act it shall be regarded as unlawful, and no particular act is permitted unless it falls [in the category of] a certain meaning [of permission] as I have already explained.

165. He said: Explain to me this kind of prohibition which you have just stated by an example which indicates the like meaning.

166. [Shāfi'ī] replied: All women are forbidden [to men] except in one of two ways: Either by nikāh (marriage), or waṭī' (intercourse with a slave-woman) by virtue of possession. These are the two ways made lawful by God [in His Book]. The Apostle laid down in the sunna the modes in which the nikāḥ makes previously forbidden women lawful, [such as] the need for a guardian, [the testimony of] witnesses and the consent of the thayyib woman.² The Prophet's stipulation concerning the woman's consent is an evidence that [prior] consent of the [two] spouses is a prerequisite without distinction between them. Thus if the marriage [contract] fulfils four conditions—consent of the thayyib woman and the man, [presence of the] guardian who arranges the marriage for the woman, and the witnesses—it would be lawful, except in certain cases which I shall cite later. But if it lacks any one of the four conditions, it becomes fāsid (invalid), because it would not be in accordance with the sunna laid down by the Apostle for a valid marriage. If a ṣadāq (bride-price) were added [as an additional condition] it would be commendable; but the marriage [contract] would not be fāsid without it, for God's stipulations concerning marriage do not include mahr (dowry).³ (This subject has been treated elsewhere).⁴ These conditions are as equally [applicable] to honorable as to dishonorable women, for each one is equal to the other in all matters that are lawful and unlawful, obligatory or unobligatory, punishable or unpunishable.

167. Shāfi'ī said: ⁵ The circumstances in which marriage is permissible—in accordance with what I have described—are those in which marriage is not prohibited, for if marriage is made in accordance with the prohibited circumstances, it would be regarded as void by the orders laid down by God in His Book and by the Prophet's tongue. For example: [Marriage is void] if a man marries his wife's sister, because God prohibited the taking of two sisters as wives; or if a man takes a fifth woman as wife, because God permitted only four [at a time] and the Prophet made it clear that God prohibited the taking of any additional one; or if one marries his wife's aunt, paternal or maternal, since this is prohibited by the Prophet; or if one marries a woman during her 'idda. All these marriages are not lawful, for they are all prohibited, and no disagreement exists among scholars about them.

168. Shāfi'ī said: In like manner the Prophet prohibited [such marriages as] al-shighār,⁶ and mut'a.⁷ He [also] prohibited the pilgrim, [whether man or woman] from marrying or getting married [during the performance of Pilgrimage]. We hold that all such marriage [contracts] in the circumstances in which he [the Prophet] prohibited them, must be dissolved, just as other marriages which we have already cited must be dissolved. Some [scholars] may disagree with us on this matter, but we have discussed this elsewhere.⁸ Similarly, the marriage in which the woman is married without her prior consent [must be dissolved]. She may give her consent later—which is not permissible—but the contract was void at the time it was concluded.

Similarly the Apostle prohibited the gharar sale,⁹ the sale

⁶ Shighār is a mode of marriage which existed in Arabia before Islam by virtue of which a person may marry the sister or daughter of another person, and the latter reciprocating in like manner, so that neither one will need to collect the mahr (dowry) from the other. For Shāfi'ī's further treatment of the subject, See Kitāb al-Umm, Vol. V, pp. 68-69.

⁸ See Shāfi'ī, Kitāb al-Umm, Vol. V, pp. 68-72; and Ikhtilāf al-Ḥadīth (Kitāb al-Umm, Vol. VII, pp. 238-41, 254-57).

of dry dates for ripe dates except the sale of al-'arāya,¹⁰ and others. For in principle one's own property is forbidden to another save in a lawful manner and by [the kinds of lawful] sale the Apostle did not prohibit, but no sale prohibited by the Apostle which is unlawful in principle renders one's property lawful to another. Disobedience of a prohibition of sale does not make lawful what was unlawful, for in principle the unlawful will not become lawful except in acts which constitute no disobedience. These [examples] fall in the category of [legal] knowledge for the public.

169. Someone may ask: What is the kind of [orders of] permission that is prohibited to men [only] in specific cases and is different from the kind of [orders of] prohibition which you have just stated?

170. [Shāfi'ī replied]: It is like the Apostle's order of prohibition against wearing a single robe by a person who folds it on one side leaving uncovered a certain private area of his body while a lad is eating before him. [The Prophet] prohibited eating from the top of the dish; he is reported to have prohibited—although this is not certain—eating two dates together, exposing the inside of the date [prior to eating], and halting on the road for rest.¹¹ Since the wearing of the robe, the eating of food (as much as one desires), and [walking on] the earth (which belongs to God, and all men are equally entitled to use it) are all lawful acts, the Prophet's order of prohibition refers to particular acts which are different from those he permitted. For the [Prophet's] order of prohibition [is limited] only to the wearing of the robe if it were folded in such a way that it leaves uncovered a certain part—the 'awra (private parts)—but if the 'awra were covered by the cloth, the prohibition against uncovering the 'awra should not include the wearing of the robe, since one can wear it without uncovering the 'awra. [Similarly] the Prophet's orders against the [lad's] eating of the food [before an uncovered 'awra] and eating from the top of the dish, which are permissible, are merely orders of etiquette, for it is more appropriate on behalf of the host to observe them while eating with his table-companion, instead of eating voraciously. [The Prophet] prohibited eating from the top of the dish because God's blessing descends on the top and it should continue descending on it. So once he has eaten the food on the sides, it would be permissible to eat the top. If one is permitted to walk along a road, he does so because it is permissible [in principle], since nobody owns it, to forbid others from passing; but the Prophet prohibited halting for a certain specific reason, for he said: "It is the shelter of insects and a passage for snakes," not because halting is unlawful. He also prohibited halting if the road were narrow and crowded, for if one halts [for rest] others' right of passing would be encroached upon.

¹¹ See Bukhārī, Vol. III, p. 507; Muslim, Vol. XIII, pp. 228-29; Abū Dāwūd, Vol. III, p. 362; Vol. IV, p. 256.

171. Someone may ask: What is the difference between this [kind of prohibition] and the other?

172. [Shāfi'ī] replied: He to whom the proof is established [concerning the validity of these orders] must know that the Prophet prohibited [the acts] which I have just explained, and he who acts contrary to them, despite his awareness of them, would be regarded as disobedient and should ask God's forgiveness and never repeat them again.

173. He may ask: Such [a man] is disobedient, and since you have already called [the man who violates] the marriage and sale [contracts] disobedient in this [your] book, on what ground have distinguished between the two?

174. [Shāfi'ī] replied: I made no distinction between the two on the ground of disobedience, since I have regarded both as disobedients, although certain acts of disobedience may be greater than others.

175. He may ask: On what ground have you not regarded as disobedient the man who wears the robe, eats from the top of the dish and halts on the road, while you regarded as disobedient the man who violates the marriage and sale [contracts]?

176. [Shāfi'ī] replied: The first has been ordered to obey an order of permission and has done so, so I have regarded as lawful what was permitted and unlawful what was prohibited. His disobedience to what was permitted would not render it unlawful in all circumstances; but it prohibited him from committing an act of disobedience.

177. He asked: For example?

178. [Shāfi'ī] replied: A man having a wife and a slave-woman is prohibited from intercourse with them whenever they are menstruating or fasting; if he did, the intercourse would be unlawful. However, neither is forbidden in other circumstances, for they are in principle lawful to him.

179. Shāfi'ī said:¹² One's own property is forbidden in principle to be taken by another, except in a lawful manner which permits another to do so. [Similarly], women are forbidden to men except by marriage or ownership. So if one makes a marriage contract with a forbidden [woman] or enters into a sale transaction concerning forbidden [goods], such contracts would be invalid, for what is forbidden cannot become lawful by an unlawful act. The act which is in principle forbidden remains so unless there is a specific text in the Book or a sunna or consensus or the like [which make it lawful].

180. Shāfi'ī said:¹³ I have already given examples of [the kind of] prohibitions which were not intended to be [on the same footing as those] unlawful orders [specified] by indications which I do not want to repeat here. May God protect us against error and grant us success.

Chapter IX

[ON TRADITIONS]

Defects in the Traditions

181. Shāfi'ī said: Someone has asked me: We find that among the traditions from the Apostle some are in conformity with the Qur'ān; others are in conformity only with the general meaning of the Qur'ān; and [still] others provide either specifications additional to those of the Quranic text or legislation on matters on which the Qur'ān is silent. § 210

Further, there are certain traditions which agree with one another, and others which are contradictory to one another; the abrogating and the abrogated traditions are clearly distinguished [in some of them]; in others the traditions which are abrogating and abrogated are not indicated.

There are [certain traditions], consisting of orders of prohibition by the Apostle, the obligation of which you have regarded as binding, while there are others, consisting equally of orders of prohibition, the obligation of which you have regarded as optional.

We have noted that you have accepted certain contradictory traditions but not others; and that you have applied analogical deduction on the strength of some of them only. Your [method of] analogy, however, was discriminatory, for you have applied it in some [cases] but not in others. On what ground have you been applying analogy to some while § 211 abandoning it in the case of others? Furthermore, you have been disagreeing with other scholars—some of you have abandoned certain traditions in favor of others of equal or even weaker status.

182. Shāfi'ī said: I have replied as follows:

The sunna which the Apostle has laid down on matters for which a text is to be found in the Book of God is always in full agreement with that text and clarifying on God's behalf a general text; the [Apostle's] specification is more explicit than the text. But as for the sunna which he laid down on matters for which a text is not found in the Book of God, the obligation to accept them rests upon us by virtue of the duty imposed by God to obey the [Prophet's] orders. As to the abrogating and abrogated sunnas—like the abrogating communications laid down by God to abrogate orders—they are in like manner laid down by the Apostle so that each sunna may be abrogated by another. And I have given him [the interlocutor] other examples which I have already discussed in this book, in explanation of what I have just described.

As to contradictory traditions where no indications exist to specify which is the abrogating and the abrogated, they are all in accord with one another and contradiction does not really exist among them. [For] the Apostle of God, being an Arab by tongue and by country, may have laid down a general rule intended to be general and another general rule intended to be particular, as I have already pointed out in my discussion on the Book of God and the sunna of His Apostle. Or a certain question may have been asked to which he gave a certain concise answer, leading some of the transmitters to relate the tradition in detail and others in brief, rendering the meaning of the tradition partly clear and partly vague. Or [it may happen] that the transmitter of a certain tradition related the answer he heard [from the Prophet] without knowing what the question had been, for [had he known] the question he would have understood the answer clearly from the reasoning on which the answer was based.

He [the Prophet] may have likewise laid down a sunna covering a particular situation and another covering a different one, but some of those who [related what they] heard failed to distinguish between the two differing situations for which he had laid down the sunnas. And he may have laid down a sunna on a certain matter in conformity with the text [of the Qur'ān]—transmitted by one authority—and another in one form in agreement with the text and in another contradictory to it—owing to changes in the circumstances—transmitted by another authority. Hence the transmission by one authority appeared to many as contradictory to the other, while [in reality] no contradiction existed at all. He may have also provided a sunna consisting of an order of permission or prohibition the wording of which was general, and he may have provided a second specifying sunna which made evident that his order of prohibition was not intended to prohibit what he made lawful, nor that his order of permission made lawful what he had prohibited. For all possibilities of this kind parallel examples exist in the Book of God, which we have already described [in this book].

[Whenever] a certain sunna was abrogated by another [the Prophet] never failed to indicate in the abrogating sunna what he had intended to abrogate. If certain transmitters have overlooked some information concerning the abrogating and abrogated sunnas, [at least] one must have transmitted what the others did not, so that information concerning abrogations was never entirely lacking.

All such matters, as I have already explained, were accepted in accordance with what the sunna laid down and [men] knew how to distinguish between the sunna in the same way that [the Prophet] did, for obedience to his ruling distinguishing the sunnas one from the other was obligatory and no one had ever questioned that [the Prophet] did distinguish between one sunna and another. For if anyone says that the Prophet made no distinction between one [sunna] and another he would be ignorant [of what the Prophet said] or, what is worse, doubtful of it. Surely, obedience to God [imposes the duty] of obedience to [the Prophet's orders].

The contradictory sunna is due either to incomplete transmission rendering it contradictory, as I have explained before, although what was lacking can be known from other [traditions], or it is the product of the transmitter's imagination. No contradictory tradition [from the Prophet] is known to us for which a possible explanation is lacking or the category to which it belongs is not known, as I have already pointed out.

We may find [the answer], on the other hand, by the indication as to which of the contradictory traditions is the most reliable; for if two contradictory traditions exist, they cannot possess equal validity and only the reliable or authentic tradition should be accepted. The evidence as to which tradition is authentic may be found either in the Book of God or in the Prophet's sunna, on the strength of which we accept the tradition for which the strongest evidence exist. However, we have known of no two contradictory traditions for which we could find neither explanation nor evidence as to which is the authentic one, [either on the ground of] its conformity with the Book or with other traditions or any other kind of evidence.¹

Hence whatever the Apostle has prohibited is unlawful unless an evidence is found specifying that [his prohibition] was not intended to condemn the matter as unlawful.

Finally, [Shāfi'i] said, analogy [on the basis] of the sunna falls into two categories, each subdivided into various forms.

183. He [the interlocutor] asked: What are they?

184. [Shāfi'i] replied: God has imposed the obligation of obedience upon men through His Book and His Prophet's tongue, in accordance with the obligation of obedience set forth in His established judgment that men shall obey His will without challenge to His command.² The Apostle specified the meaning of what God made obligatory [in the tradition] or in any narrative transmitted from him so that nothing is left unexplained and the scholars are under obligation to regard this narrative [as authentic] as other traditions if it expresses the identical meaning.³ This [category of traditions] is subdivided into many forms. § 217

¹ For a discussion on this subject, see Ibn Qutayba al-Dīnawarī, Kitāb Ta'wīl Mukhtalaf al-Hadīth (Cairo, 1326/1909).

² "Lā mu'āqqib li hukmih," a Quranic expression (Q. XIII, 41) which Shāfi'i borrows, has been differently translated by different writers. Cf. Richard Bell, The Qur'ān, Vol. I, p. 234; and A. J. Arberry, The Koran Interpreted (London, 1955), Vol. I, p. 272.

The second category of traditions consists of a general order of permission qualified by a particular order of prohibition. Men should regard [all acts under] the general order of permission as lawful and [the specific act under] the particular order of prohibition as unlawful. But in so doing they should not apply analogy to a particular order of prohibition, for the general rule is that an order of permission and analogy must be applied ordinarily on the general, not on the particular rule. The same [rule] must apply if the general order is one of prohibition and the particular order is one of permission, or if [God] imposes a [general] duty and the Apostle qualified it by a permission that is particular. Thus analogy is valid to us [only] on the evidence of the Book, the sunna and precedents. § 218

To have given an opinion contrary to an authentic tradition from the Apostle is something, I hope, for which I shall never be reproached. Nor has anyone the right to give such an opinion. However, a man ignorant of a certain tradition may give an opinion contrary to it by oversight or by a wrong interpretation, without having intended to do so.

185.⁴ [Shāfi'ī] said: Someone may ask me: Give me an example for each of the categories you have described, embodying in a concise statement ⁴ all that I have inquired about, beginning with the abrogating and abrogated sunnas of the Prophet, citing some of it together with the Qur'ān, even though you may be repeating some of what you have already discussed. § 219

186. [Shāfi'ī] replied: God ordered His Apostle to turn in prayer first toward Jerusalem. So Jerusalem became the qibla and as long as the Apostle faced that direction, to face any other was unlawful. But ever since God abrogated the qibla toward Jerusalem and ordered the Apostle and men to turn toward the Ka'ba, the latter became obligatory in accordance with the text [of the Book] and no other qibla should be faced, save in case of fear [of danger]. It became absolutely unlawful to turn toward Jerusalem. Each [qibla] was valid in its time: Jerusalem from the time when the Prophet turned toward it until he was ordered to change, and the Sacred House [Ka'ba] from thence forward until the Day of Resurrection. All the other abrogated [communications], whether in the Book of God or the sunna, have in like manner been laid down.

³ Būlāq ed., p. 34.

⁴ Literally: "Avoiding a detailed treatment that I might forget."

187. [Shāfi'i] said: Such [a process of] abrogation is an evidence that whenever the Prophet laid down a sunna which God ordered him to revise, he laid down another sunna which men were ordered to obey in place of the earlier one so that they would no longer obey the abrogated sunna. Thus no one, except those unversed in the Arab tongue and in the [legal] knowledge concerning the place of the sunna in its relation to the Book (that it specified the meaning of the Book), should ever suppose [from the internal evidence of the sunna] that the Book abrogates the sunna.^a

188. He asked: Would it be possible for the sunna to contradict the Book [of God]?

189. [Shāfi'i] replied: Impossible! For God, glorified be His praise, imposed on men the obligation [of obedience to the law] through two avenues—the origin of both is in the Book—His Book and the sunna: [The latter is binding by virtue of] the duty of obedience laid down in the Book that it should be followed. So it was not permissible for the Apostle to allow the sunna to be abrogated [by the Book], without [the Apostle himself] providing another sunna to abrogate it. The abrogating sunna is known because it is the later one, while most of the abrogating [communications] of the Book can be known only by [indications provided in] the Sunna of the Apostle.

So if the sunna [itself] indicates what the abrogating [communications] of the Book are and distinguishes between the abrogating and the abrogated, it cannot be abrogated by the Qur'ān unless the Apostle himself provides another sunna—in conformity with the Qur'ān—which would abrogate an earlier sunna. Thus no doubt should ever remain in the minds of men that God has imposed the duty of obedience [to the Prophet].

190. He asked: Someone may say: If we find in the Qur'ān an explicit general meaning which a certain sunna may either make specific or to which it may give an implicit meaning that is contradictory, do you [not] agree that the sunna [in such a case] is abrogated by the Qur'ān?

191. [Shāfi'ī] replied: No scholar should ever hold such an opinion!

192. He asked: Why?

193. [Shāfi'ī] replied: Since God has imposed on His Prophet the duty to obey His communications to him, and He testified to his [right] guidance and imposed on men the duty to obey him, and since the Arab tongue—as I have already explained—may give a variety of meanings [for each word] so that some of the communications of the Book are general and intended to be particular and others particular and intended to be general, and some are general duties which the Apostle specified [in the sunna]—a function which the sunna fulfils in its relation to the Book, the sunna cannot be contradictory to the Book of God, but will always follow the Book of God, in conformity with His divine communication, and clarify on God's behalf the meaning intended by God. Thus [the sunna] always follows the Book of God.

194. He asked: Will you give an evidence in support of your opinion from the Qur'ān?

195. [Shāfi'ī] replied: I quoted for him a part [of the argument] embodied in [my] book "The [Conformity of the] Sunna to the Qur'ān,"* that God has imposed the duties of prayer, alms, and pilgrimage; but the Apostle specified the modes of performing the prayer, the number of prayers and

* This is a reference to a book which has not come down to us, but none of Shāfi'ī's biographers have mentioned it either.

the time for performing them each day and the rules [governing performance]; he specified the amount of the alms to be paid, the time of payment and the commodities exempted therefrom; and [he specified] the performance of pilgrimage and the rules as to what is permitted and what should be avoided. I have also cited to him God's saying:

As for the thief, male and female, cut off their hands [Q. V, 42].

And:

The fornicatress and the fornicator—scourge each one of them with a hundred stripes [Q. XXIV, 2].

And I pointed out that since the Apostle laid down in the sunna that cutting off the hand is the penalty for theft if the amount exceeds a quarter of a dinār, and that the penalty of scourging [for fornication] on the part of unmarried free and adult persons—not free married or slave married persons—the sunna indicated that God implied [in the text of the Qur'ān] a particular [category of] adulterers and thieves despite the fact that the literal [meaning of the] communication is apparently general concerning the [penalty for] thieves and adulterers.

196. He said: I am in agreement with what you have just explained; but can you give an evidence against those who related a saying on the authority of the Prophet which runs as follows:

Compare whatever is related on my authority with the Book of God; if it agrees with it, I have said it, but if it does not agree, I have not said it.*

197. [Shāfi'i] replied: This tradition was not related by one whose authority on any matter, significant or insignificant, has been recognized so as to constitute a proof for what he related.

* This tradition has been transmitted in a variety of forms and is regarded as weak. For a critical evaluation, see Ibn Hāzīm, Kitāb al-Ihkām Fi Uṣūl al-Ahkām, Vol. II, pp. 76-82. See also Shākir's edition of the Risāla, p. 224, n. 4; and J. Schacht, Origins of Muhammadan Jurisprudence, p. 28.

Besides, that is an interrupted transmission from an unknown person and is unacceptable to us.

198. He asked: Was anything related on the authority of the Prophet in support of your opinion?

199. [Shāfi'ī] replied: Yes. For Sufyān [b. 'Uyayna] told us from Sālim Abū al-Naḍr from 'Ubayd b. Abī Rāfi' from his father that the Prophet said: § 225

* Let me find no one of you reclining on his couch, who, when confronted with an order of permission or prohibition from me, says: 'I do not know [whether this is obligatory or not]; we will follow only what we find in the Book of God.'^a

So^o the Apostle urged men never to reject his orders, on the grounds that God imposed the duty that they should obey his orders.

200. He asked: Will you give an example of general communications on which the scholars, or the majority at least, have agreed with you that the sunnas, together with the Book, give an indication that such a communication is intended to be particular, although its literal meaning is general?

201. [Shāfi'ī] replied: Yes; it is as I have already discussed in this book.

202. He asked: Repeat some portion of it.

203. [Shāfi'ī] replied: God said:

Forbidden to you are your mothers and daughters, your sisters, your aunts, paternal and maternal, your brothers' daughters, your sister's daughters, your mothers who have given suck to you, your suckling sisters, your wives' mothers, your step-daughters, who are in your care being born of your wives you have been into—but if you have not yet been into them, it is no fault in you—and the spouses of your sons who are of your loins, and that you should take to you two sisters together, unless it be a thing of the past; God is All-forgiving, All-compassionate; and wedded women except what your right hands possess. So God prescribes for you. And lawful for you is what is beyond that [Q. IV, 27-28]. § 226

^a See paragraph 94, n. 15, above.

^o "Shāfi'ī said" is omitted.

So * God stipulated what He prohibited and added: "Lawful for you is what is beyond that"; but the Apostle specified that no woman together with an aunt, paternal or maternal, shall be taken as a wife.¹⁰ I know of no one who has disagreed with that specification.

There are two indications in that [tradition]: First, that the sunna of the Apostle can contradict the Book of God in no circumstance, but can only specify the general and particular communications of that Book. Second, that [the scholars] have accepted that [tradition] on the authority of a single transmitter. But I know of no transmitter other than Abū Hurayra who correctly related it on the authority of the Prophet.¹¹

204. He asked: Would it be possible in your opinion to regard this tradition as contradictory to any literal meaning in the Book [of God]?

205. [Shāfi'i] replied: Neither this [tradition] nor any other [can be contradictory to the Book of God].

206. He asked: What is, therefore, the meaning of God's saying: "Forbidden to you are your mothers," in which he stipulated the prohibition, and then added: "Lawful for you is what is beyond that" [Q. IV, 27]?

207. [Shāfi'i] replied: God stipulated the instances [of women] forbidden in all circumstances, such as mothers, daughters, sisters, aunts—paternal and maternal—, the brother's daughters and the sister's daughters; those forbidden in all circumstances on the basis of kinship and suckling; and those forbidden to be taken with others, although if each were taken separately it would be lawful. So God's saying: "Lawful for you is what is beyond that," means that any woman is lawful in permissible circumstance; for the stipulation "lawful etc.," means marriage in a lawful manner, not taking a wife in an illegal marriage, or the taking of a fifth wife in addition to the other four, or the taking of two sisters or any other [woman] who is in a forbidden category. § 229

I have also given him the [example of the] duty of ablution laid down by God, and the Prophet's [precedent of] wiping the shoes, and the agreement of the majority of the learned on the acceptance of wiping.

208. He asked: Is [the Prophet's] wiping contradictory to any [textual communication] in the Qur'ān?

209. [Shāfi'ī] replied: In no circumstance can the sunna contradict the Qur'ān.

210. He asked: How would you explain it?

211. [Shāfi'ī] replied: Since [God] said:

When you stand up for the prayer, wash your faces and your hands up to the elbows, and wipe your heads and your feet up to the ankles [Q. V, 8].

The sunna specified that whoever is in a state of purity, and who has not [subsequently become] polluted, is under no obligation to fulfil this duty [of washing the face, etc.] when he stands up in prayer; it also specified that the duty of washing the feet is obligatory only on him who had not worn the two shoes in complete purity. § 230

I have also given him the [example of the] Prophet's prohibition of [eating the meat of] beasts possessing fangs. For God stipulated:

Say; I do not find, in what is revealed to me, anything forbidden to one who eats of it, unless it be a dead animal or blood out-poured, or the flesh of the swine—for it is abomination—or an impious thing over which the name of a god other than God has been involved; but if one is compelled, not willingly or transgressing—then verily thy Lord is All-forgiving, All-compassionate [Q. VI, 146]; and specified what He prohibited.¹²

212. He asked: What is the meaning of this [communication]?

213. [Shāfi'ī] replied: The meaning of "Say: I do not find . . . forbidden, etc. . . ." is that nothing was forbidden of what men were accustomed to eat save a dead animal, etc. . . . but what was regarded as forbidden should not be forbidden unless God or the sunna so stipulated in accordance with God's saying: "Making lawful for them the good things and unlawful the corrupt things" [Q. VII, 156]; so it is not just forbidden because the food was spoiled.

214. [Shāfi'ī] said: Further, I cited to him God's saying:

God has permitted sale and forbidden usury [Q. II, 276].

And His saying:

Do not consume your property among you in vanity, except there be trading by mutual consent on your part [Q. IV, 33].

The Apostle of God, however, has forbidden certain kinds of sales, such as the exchange of [gold] dīnārs for [silver] dirhams for a specified time as well as others, and the Muslims, following the Apostle of God, have forbidden them, too, although these [transactions] and others are not contradictory to the Book of God.

215. He asked: Define for me the meaning of what you have said in a more comprehensive and concise manner.

216. [Shāfi'ī] replied: Since it is evident in the Book of God that God placed His Apostle in the position of a mouth-piece [and an interpreter] on God's behalf and imposed on men the duty to obey his orders, therefore when He said: "God has permitted sale and forbidden usury," He meant that He permitted the [kind of] sale which was neither forbidden in His Book nor through the tongue of His Prophet. In like manner His saying: "And lawful for you is what is beyond that" [Q. IV, 28], means that God permitted the taking of women in lawful marriage as well as "what your right hand possesses" in accordance with His Book;¹³ it is not an unqualified permission. This is clear Arabic speech.

217. Shāfi'ī said:¹⁴ [In my reply] I have added the following: If it were permissible to abandon a tradition in place of the opinion of those who are ignorant of its place in relation to the Book, we would have abandoned the wiping of the shoes—which we have already explained—and we would have permitted everything that comes under sale, as well as taking as wives a woman together with her paternal and maternal aunts, and the eating of beasts possessing fangs and the like. It would also have been permissible to hold the opinion that the Prophet laid down the sunna concerning the cutting off of the thief's hand if the value of the stolen article exceeds a quarter of a dīnār before the divine communication: "The thief, male and female, cut off their hands" [Q. V, 42] was revealed. So everyone in this category would have his hands cut off.

In like manner it would be permissible to maintain that the Prophet decreed the stoning of the thayyib woman [as penalty for adultery] before he received the communication: "The fornicatress and the fornicator—scourge each one of them a hundred stripes" [Q. XXIV, 2], which meant that [the penalty] for the unmarried and thayyib women would have been scourging, not stoning to death.

It would also have been permissible to maintain that all [the kinds of] sale forbidden by the Apostle had been forbidden before the divine communication "God has permitted sale and forbidden usury (al-riba)" was revealed, and that thereafter they became lawful. Usury [may be found] when a man is indebted to another, and the debt is due, and [the second] says [to the first]: Would you pay the debt or pay [in addition] the usury? Payment would be postponed, [in the latter event,] but the debt would grow larger.

B 33

Other examples parallel to it might be given. However, he who holds such an opinion would invalidate most of the sunnas of the Apostle; but such an opinion betrays ignorance indeed!

218. He said: That is correct.

219. [Shāfi'ī said]: The sunna of the Apostle is [obligatory] as I have already explained, and he who holds an opinion different from what I have stated, betrays a lack of knowledge about the sunna mixed with a false opinion on a subject in which he is ignorant.

220. He asked: Will you cite another example of a sunna abrogated by another?

221. [Shāfi'ī] replied: The abrogating and abrogated sunnas may be found in various places [of this book] and to repeat them here would take a long time.

222. He asked: Perhaps a few would be enough; will you cite them briefly and clearly?

223. [Shāfi'ī] replied: Mālik [b. Anas] told us from 'Abd-Allāh b. Abī Bakr b. Muḥammad b. 'Amr b. Ḥazm from 'Abd-Allāh b. Wāqid from 'Abd-Allāh b. 'Umar who said:

The Apostle of God prohibited the eating of the meat of sacrifice after three days [from the first Day of Sacrifice].¹⁵

'Abd-Allāh b. Abī Bakr said that he cited this [tradition] to 'Amra, daughter of 'Abd al-Raḥmān,¹⁶ who said: That is true, I have heard 'Ā'isha say:

A few people from the desert came [to Makka] during the Day of Sacrifice in the time of the Prophet, who said: 'You may preserve [the meat of sacrifice] for three days and give the rest to the poor.' She said [a year] later the Prophet was asked: 'O Apostle of God! men were accustomed to make use of their sacrifices: They took its fat and used its [skins] to carry water.' So the Apostle inquired: 'Why not?' You have prohibited preserving the meat of the sacrifice after three days,' they replied. 'I have prohibited that only for the sake of those who came [to the city] during the Day of Sacrifice. Surely you may eat of it; give to the poor and preserve the rest.'¹⁷

We are also told by [Sufyān] b. 'Uyayna from [Sa'd b. 'Ubayd] al-Zuhri from Abī 'Ubayd, freed-slave of Ibn Azhar, who said:

¹⁵ Sacrifices begin on the first day of the Great Feast. For the rules governing sacrifices, see Shāfi'ī, Kitāb al-Umm, Vol. I, pp. 187-91.

I have witnessed the Feast [of Sacrifice] with 'Alī b. Abī Ṭālib whom I have heard saying: 'Nobody should eat from the meat of Sacrifice after three days.'¹⁸

And we are told by the trusted authority¹⁹ from Ma'mar § 236 from al-Zuhri from Abū 'Ubayd from 'Alī who said:

The Apostle of God said: 'Nobody should eat from the meat of Sacrifice after three days.'²⁰

Ibn 'Uyayna also told us from Ibrāhīm b. Maysara who said:

I have heard Anas b. Mālik say: We were accustomed to slaughter our sacrifices and preserve the remaining portion of it [for our journeys] to Baṣra.²¹

224. Shāfi'ī said: These traditions include many meanings § 237
[from which we may draw several conclusions]. [First,] the tradition transmitted by 'Alī from the Prophet is in agreement with that of 'Abd-Allāh b. Wāqid concerning the Prophet's prohibition against keeping the meat of sacrifice after three days. [Second,] there is an indication that 'Alī heard the order of prohibition from the Prophet and that this order reached 'Abd-Allāh b. Wāqid. [Third,] there is an indication that the Prophet's permission failed to reach both 'Alī and 'Abd-Allāh b. Wāqid, for had it reached them, they would have ceased to relate the order of prohibition, which was abrogated,²² and would have followed the order of permission which had become the abrogating [order]. [For if] the abrogated order of prohibition were known to them they would not have disregarded the abrogating order [of permission]. [Finally,] the opinion of Anas that they were accustomed to enter Baṣra ¹⁸ This tradition is regarded as weak owing to interruption in the chain of authorities, but its content is in agreement with similar traditions. See Ibn Ḥanbal, Vol. II, p. 297, no. 1235.

with the meat of the sacrifices may mean either that Anas had heard the order of permission but not the earlier order of prohibition—thus he acted on the order of permission without knowing the order of prohibition—or he may have heard both, but since the order of prohibition was abrogated, he failed to mention it. So each one of the two conflicting transmitters related what he had known. Thus it is obligatory on everyone who has heard anything from the Apostle of God, or related on his authority, to transmit what he had heard for the information of others. § 238

225. Shāfi'ī said: Since 'Ā'isha related from the Prophet first the order of prohibition concerning the keeping of the meat of sacrifice after three days and then the order of permission, and the Apostle's [reason] that he gave the order of prohibition for the sake of those who came from the desert—the complete tradition related by 'Ā'isha from the Prophet is that which should include the first and the last parts, as well as the reason for the orders of prohibition and permission. It is obligatory on all who have known about it to follow it.

'Ā'isha's tradition is one of the clearest examples of the abrogating and abrogated sunnas. It also illustrates how a tradition may be split so that only a portion of it—not all—was related by one authority and another portion by others, each relating what he had remembered.

The order of permission concerning the keeping of the meat of sacrifice, eating it, and giving it to the poor may have only one of two meanings, each depending on one of two circumstances: Whenever the people of the desert enter [the city], the order of prohibition concerning the keeping of the meat after three days becomes obligatory; but if none should come, the order of permission is valid concerning eating, preserving, giving to the poor, and carrying it [on a journey]. It may also mean that the order of prohibition concerning the keeping of the meat after three days was abrogated—despite any [special] circumstance—so men can keep a portion of the meat after three days or give another to the poor.²² § 239 § 240

226. [Shāfi'ī said]: Muḥammad b. Ismā'il b. Abī Fudayk told us from Ibn Abī Dhī'b from al-Maqburī from 'Abd al-Rahmān b. Abī Sa'īd [al-Khudrī] from Abū Sa'īd al-Khudrī who said: S 241-242

We were withheld from performing prayer in [the battle of] the Trench for a long while, till [late at] night, but when we were relieved from fighting—as God said: 'God relieved the believers of fighting, God is All-strong, All-mighty' [Q. XXXIII, 25]—the Apostle ordered Bilāl [to call the believers to prayer] and performed the noon-prayer as fully as if it were performed in its time, and performed the 'aṣr, the sunset, and the evening prayers in like manner. This [incident] took place before the communication concerning fear-prayer was revealed which runs as follows: 'If you fear [danger], pray either on foot or mounted.' [Q. II, 240].²³

227. Shāfi'ī said: Since Abū Sa'īd related that the Apostle's prayer in the battle of the Trench was performed before the communication on fear-prayer (if you fear, etc.) was revealed, we concluded that the performance of fear-prayer took place after that time, for Abū Sa'īd was present [at the battle] and related the tradition concerning the deferment of prayers after their usual times²⁴ and stated that this [case] took place before the communication on fear-prayer was revealed. S 243

228. [Shāfi'ī] said: Thus in no circumstances shall fear-prayer be deferred from its usual time in the town, nor in another at another time. See his Ikhtilāf al-Ḥadīth (on the margin of the Kitāb al-Umm, Vol. VII, pp. 136-37, 247-48). Thus the matter was left undecided for further interpretations and the schools vary on this matter. See Shākir's ed., pp. 240-41, n. 3.

²⁴ 'Amm' āha means the times of all the prayers.

performing [two] prayers at one time in travel, whether [men are] in fear [of danger] or not. Prayers must always be performed in the same manner as performed by the Apostle of God.

Our opinion concerning fear-prayer is based on what Mālik [b. Anas] told us from Yazīd b. Rūmān from Šālih b. Khawwāt from men who performed the fear-prayer with the Apostle in the campaign of Dhāt al-Riqā' who said:

A company [of believers] stood in rank [for prayer] with [the Prophet] while another watched the enemy. He performed one cycle with the company who stood with him and remained standing until the others completed [the prayer]. Having thus taken the position of those facing the enemy, the other company stood [with the Prophet], who performed the other cycle and remained sitting while the company completed their prayer until he uttered the salutation with them.²⁵

229. [Shāfi'i] said: We have been told by men who heard 'Abd-Allāh b. 'Umar b. Ḥaṣṣ relating on the authority of his brother 'Ubayd-Allāh b. 'Umar from al-Qāsim b. Muḥammad from Šālih b. Khawwāt b. Jubayr from his father from the Prophet a similar tradition. It ²⁶ has also been related that the Prophet performed a fear-prayer differently from what Mālik had stated. We have, however, accepted [Mālik's] version, because it is more consistent with the Qur'ān and more deceptive to the enemy. This subject and the contradictory traditions related to it have been discussed in the Kitāb al-Ṣalāh [Book of Prayer].²⁷ We have dispensed with opposing views on this tradition since they are scattered in [the various chapters of] our books.

²⁶ Qāla (he said) is omitted.

²⁷ See Shāfi'i, Kitāb al-Umm, Vol. I, pp. 186-203. Cf. Shāfi'i's Kitāb Ikhtilāf al-Ḥadīth (margin of Kitāb al-Umm, Vol. VII, pp. 221-26). Shāfi'i's reference to his Kitāb al-Ṣalāh may well be to another book which is not in the Kitāb al-Umm (see Shākir's edition of the Risāla, p. 245, n. 4).

230. [Shāfi'ī said]: God, Blessed and Most High, said:

Those of your women who commit indecency, call four witnesses against them, and if they testify—then detain them in their houses until death takes them, or God appoints for them a way out.

And when two of you commit indecency, punish them both; but if they repent and reform, then let them [Q. IV, 19-20].

The punishment for the two adulterers, according to this communication, was detainment and suffering; but since God has communicated to His Apostle that the penalty for fornication shall be: "The fornicatress and fornicator—scourge each one of them with a hundred stripes" [Q. XXIV, 2], and for the slave-woman shall be: "If then, having been taken under iḥṣān, they commit an indecency, they shall be liable to half the punishment of freewomen" [Q. IV, 30], detainment as a punishment for adulterers has been abrogated, but punishment [by suffering] was confirmed.

As to the communication concerning the punishment of slave-women that "they shall be liable to half the punishment of freewomen," God has obviously drawn a distinction between the punishment of slave- and free-women: He made it evident that half [of the punishment] cannot be other than scourging, for only scourging can be halved by the number of stripes while stoning to death cannot be halved, since death might be caused either by the casting of one or by a thousand stones. So what is incapable of being halved cannot be regarded as penalty, and death certainly cannot be halved by dividing the number of stones cast at the person.²⁸

God's communication: "The fornicatress and the fornicator—scourge each one of them with a hundred stripes" [Q. XXIV, 2] may either mean as a penalty to all free adulterers, or to some to the exclusion of the others; but the sunna of the Apostle specified who is liable for such a penalty. For 'Abd al-Wahhāb al-Thaqafī told us from Yūnus b. 'Ubāyd from al-Ḥasan from 'Ubāda b. al-Ṣāmit that the Apostle of God said:

²⁸ See paragraph 123, above.

Take it from me [repeated twice] God has decided on a way [for their punishment]: For the fornication of the unmarried couple [the penalty] is scourging with a hundred stripes and banishment for a year; for [the adultery of] the married couple, scourging with a hundred stripes and stoning [to death].²⁹

231. [Shāfi'ī] said: The Apostle's saying that "God has decided on a way [for their punishment]" indicates that this was the first penalty imposed on adulterers in accordance with God's communication "until death takes them or God appoints for them a way out" [Q. IV, 19].³⁰

Since the Apostle ordered the stoning of both Mā'iz and the wife of al-Aslamī rather than scourging them, the sunna made it evident that scourging [as a penalty] for fornication by the unmarried was abrogated.³¹ For no such distinction in the penalty of freemen was ever made before except in the case of women under iḥṣān whether by marriage or otherwise. But the Prophet's saying that "God has decided on a way for their punishment, etc. . . ." is an indication that the first [penalty] abrogated was banishment, and that any other kind of punishment must have been imposed later, since the penalty of banishment was imposed first. [For] Mālik [b. Anas] told us from Ibn Shihāb al-Zuhrī from 'Ubayd-Allāh b. 'Abd-Allāh b. 'Utba from Abū Hurayra and Zayd b. Khālid who said:

S 248

Two men submitted a dispute to the Apostle of God. One of them said: 'O Apostle of God! Will you settle our dispute on the basis of the Book of God?' The other, who was more knowledgeable in the law, said: 'I concur, O Apostle, but I beg you to let me speak [first].'³² 'You may speak,' replied [the Prophet]. He said: 'When my son was in the employment of this [the plaintiff] he committed adultery with his wife. I was told that my son's penalty was stoning [to death]; but instead I paid a ransom of one hundred sheep and a slave-woman. Upon inquiry from those who are learned in the law, I have found that my son's penalty was a hundred stripes and banishment for a year, while the penalty for his [the plaintiff's] wife was stoning.' 'By ²⁹ See paragraph 122, above.

³¹ See paragraph 123, above.

Him in whose hand is my soul, I shall give my judgment on the basis of the Book of God: your sheep and slave-woman should be given back to you,' ruled the Apostle of God, and ordered that the son should be scourged by a hundred stripes and banished for a year. He also ordered Unays al-Aslamī to cross-examine the [plaintiff's] wife and to stone her if she admitted adultery. The woman confessed and was stoned [to death].²² S 249

Mālik [b. Anas] told us from Ibn 'Umar that the Prophet ordered the stoning of two Jews for committing adultery.²³

232. [Shāfi'ī] said: Thus the scourging of a hundred stripes and banishment were confirmed [as a penalty] for fornication on the part of the unmarried, and stoning for the married. But if punishment by scourging is imposed [on the two fornicators,] it should not be enforced together with stoning since the latter was abrogated; for if [the culprits] were regarded as married—therefore not liable for scourging—their penalty should be that imposed on married adulterers.²⁴ S 250

[The communication concerning] the penalty of stoning for the two married adulterers was revealed after that concerning scourging according to the Apostle, who made that [clear] on God's behalf. This is the meaning most consistent [with the Book of God] and most appropriate in our opinion. But God knows best!

[C. Third] Category

233. Mālik [b. Anas] told us from Ibn Shihāb al-Zuhri from Anas b. Mālik, who said:

The Prophet, riding on horseback, was thrown and his right side was scratched. Thereupon he performed one of his daily prayers sitting and we performed ours behind him sitting, too. After prayer the Prophet said: 'The imām [prayer leader]²⁵ is expected to be followed; if he performs the prayer standing, you should stand, too; if he bows you should bow; if he raises his hands, you should raise them; if he says: 'God listens to him who praises Him,' you should say: 'Praise be to you, Our Lord'; and if he performs his prayer sitting, you should perform yours sitting, too.'³⁶

Mālik [b. Anas] told us from Hishām b. 'Urwa from his father from 'Ā'isha, who said:

When the Apostle was sick, he performed his prayer sitting in his house; but when the men behind him performed their prayer standing, he ordered them to sit. After prayer, [the Prophet] said: 'The imām is expected to be followed; if he bows, you should bow; if he raises his hand, you should raise yours, too; if he sits, you should sit all together.'³⁷

This tradition, related by Anas [b. Mālik], is like the previous one, but the meaning of Anas' tradition is clearer.

Mālik [b. Anas] told us from Hishām b. 'Urwa from his father, who said:

The Apostle of God went out [from his house] while still sick [to perform his prayer in public]. While leading the prayer, Abū Bakr stepped aside [in favor of the Prophet], but the latter ordered him to continue and sat beside him: Abū Bakr followed the Apostle [in his prayer], and men followed Abū Bakr.³⁸

Shāfi'ī said that he was in favor of the opinion expressed in this tradition.³⁹

234. [Shāfi'ī] said: A similar tradition has been related by technique of prayer to perform the formalized recitals and postures. See Edwin E. Calverly, Worship in Islam (London, 1957), Chap. 4.

³⁶ Mālik, Vol. I, p. 135; Bukhārī, Vol. I, p. 180; Muslim, Vol. IV, pp. 130-31; Abū Dāwūd, Vol. I, p. 164; Shawkānī, Nayl al-Awtār, Vol. III, pp. 148, 180-81.

³⁷ Mālik's version omits the statement "in his house" (see al-Muwatta', Vol. I, p. 135). See also Bukhārī, Vol. I, p. 180; Muslim, Vol. IV, p. 132.

Ibrāhīm al-Nakha'ī from al-Aswad b. Yazīd from 'Ā'isha from the Apostle and Abū Bakr to the effect that the Prophet performed his prayer sitting while Abū Bakr, [leading the prayer,] followed the Prophet and men followed Abū Bakr standing.⁴⁰

235. [Shāfi'ī] said: Since the Prophet performed his prayer during his death-sickness sitting while men performed it standing behind him, we concluded that his previous order permitting men to perform prayer sitting at the time of his fall from the horse was abrogated by his later order that they may perform prayer standing, because they [should] sit when the imām sits.⁴¹

Thus the evidence of the sunna and the consensus of the people [i. e., of the scholars] indicate that prayers should be performed standing when men are able to stand, and sitting when they are unable to stand; but those who can perform it standing by themselves should never do so sitting.

Although the Prophet's sunna ordering men to perform their prayer behind him standing while he performed it sitting during his [death] sickness abrogated his previous sunna, it is in conformity with his sunna concerning the prayers of healthy and sick men, as well as the consensus of the people, that each man should fulfil his [prayer] duty in accordance with the rule stipulating that the sick man can perform his prayer sitting behind a healthy imām who performs the prayer standing.

So we maintain: [If sick,] the imām performs his prayer sitting, but the healthy men behind him should perform theirs standing. So each one fulfils his duty in his own way, although it is more appropriate if the imām deputizes another person [whenever he is sick].⁴²

236. One scholar⁴³ held: "Nobody after the Prophet shall lead the prayer sitting"; but the tradition which he cited in support of his opinion was an interrupted one related by an unreliable authority, and therefore cannot be accepted as binding. [The text of this tradition runs as follows]: "Let no one after me [the Prophet] lead the prayer sitting." 44

237. [Shāfi'i] said: There are other parallel examples concerning the abrogating and abrogated sunnas which provide evidence in support of this viewpoint. There are likewise parallel examples in the Book of God; some have been described in this book and others scattered in their proper places in this book and in [the chapters on] the Qur'ān and the sunna.⁴⁵

[Contradictory Traditions]

238. [Shāfi'i] said: He asked: Give examples of contradictory traditions in which no indications are to be found concerning the abrogating and abrogated [sunnas] and the reason for accepting some and rejecting others?

239. [Shāfi'i] replied: I have already cited a tradition to the effect that the Apostle performed the fear-prayer in the campaign of Dhāt al-Riqā', in which he performed one cycle with one company while the other watched the enemy, etc. However,⁴⁶ Ibn 'Umar related from the Prophet that he [the Prophet] performed the fear-prayer somewhat differently as follows:

He [the Prophet] performed one cycle with one company while another stood [for protection] between him and the enemy. The company that stood in rank [for prayer] replaced the one which had not prayed, taking a position between him [the Prophet] and against all the Hanafi and Māliki jurists. For differences between Shāfi'i and Mālik, see Shāfi'i, Kitāb al-Umm, Vol. VII, pp. 184-86.

the enemy. He performed the final cycle with this company, and uttered the salutation. Thus all performed the prayer together.⁴⁷

Abū 'Ayyāsh al-Zuraqī related:

The Prophet performed a [fear]-prayer in the campaign of 'Uṣfān⁴⁸ while Khālīd b. al-Walīd [and his army] stood between him and the qibla [watching the enemy]. He [the Prophet] stood in rank for prayer and performed one cycle [with his men]. When he bowed, one company bowed with him and the other watched the enemy. When he stood, the company that watched the enemy bowed. Thus all completed the prayer together.⁴⁹

Jābir related [a tradition] the meaning of which is nearly identical to that one.⁵⁰ Other⁵¹ contradictory traditions may be cited, but they are unreliable.

240. Someone has asked me: Why have you accepted [the tradition concerning] the Prophet's prayer in the campaign of Dhāt al-Riqā' to the exclusion of others?

241. [Shāfi'ī] replied: I would accept the tradition of Abū 'Ayyāsh and Jābir concerning fear-prayer if the reason given there for the Prophet's prayer were the same as that in the other [i. e., the tradition of Dhāt al-Riqā'].

242. He asked: What is it?

243. [Shāfi'ī] replied: The Apostle had under his command 1,400 men, while Khālīd b. al-Walīd had only 200. Far away in the desert, [Khālīd] was secure from attack owing both to the few under his command and the many under the Apostle's command. For if the enemy attacked [Khālīd], they could be seen [by the Prophet] while performing the bowing as he was in such a position that they were always seen by him. However, if the enemy consisted of only a few and were at a distance, and no company stood between them [and those who performed the prayer], I am of the opinion that fear-prayer should be performed in such circumstances, as I explained before.

244. He asked: I realize that owing to changes in circumstances the tradition concerning the prayer of Dhāt al-Riqā' is in agreement [with your opinion]; why are you opposed to the tradition of Ibn 'Umar?

245. [Shāfi'i] replied: [The tradition of Dhāt al-Riqā'] was related by Khawwāt b. Jubayr. A not very different one was related by Sahl b. Abī Ḥathma. Moreover, 'Alī b. Abī Ṭālib was reported to have performed the fear-prayer in the Night of al-Harir,⁵² in accordance with the tradition related by Khawwāt b. Jubayr from the Prophet. Finally, Khawwāt was an old and early companion of the Prophet.

246. He asked: Is there any evidence [for accepting Khawwāt's tradition] stronger than his [age and] early companionship?

247. [Shāfi'i] replied: Yes, it is its consistency with the meaning of the Book of God, as I have already explained.

B 37

248. He asked: What part of it is consistent with the Book of God?

249. [Shāfi'i] replied: God said:

When thou art with them and hast set up the prayer for them, let a party of them stand with thee, and let them take their weapons. When they bow, let them be behind you; and then let another party who has not prayed come and pray with thee, taking their guard and their weapons. The unbelievers wish that you should neglect your weapons and your baggage, then they would fall upon you all at once. There is no fault in you, if rain molests you, or you are sick, to lay down your weapons, but keep your guard [Q. IV, 103].

And He said:

When you feel secure again, observe the prayer. Verily, the prayer has become for the believer a thing prescribed for stated times [Q. IV, 104].

⁵² The Night of al-Harir, known also as the Day of al-Harir, was one of the days in the battle of Siffin (A.D. 657) between the Caliph 'Alī and Mu'awiya, then governor of Syria.

The meaning implied [in these texts] is that when men are secure, they should perform their [usual] prayer. But God knows best!

Since God has distinguished between fear and secure prayers in order to protect the followers of His religion from a sudden attack, we have found that by comparing the tradition of Khawwāt b. Jubayr with others contradictory to it, Khawwāt's tradition seems to be more appropriate to follow for precautionary [considerations]. It is recommended that the two parties should participate equally [in performing the prayer and in guarding against the enemy], for the party that performs the prayer first with the imām should be well guarded by the other which does not perform the prayer. The guarding party—relieved of the duty of prayer—should be fully occupied [in watching the enemy], whether standing or sitting, turning left or right, and prepared to defend should the enemy attack, giving warning whenever the enemy suddenly attacks and being ready to fight if necessary, never moving from their position between the enemy and the party performing the prayer. The imām should quickly perform the prayer if he fears a sudden attack by the enemy, upon a warning from the guarding party.

250. [Shāfi'ī] said: Both parties are equally right in fulfilling their duties, for in accordance with the tradition of Khawwāt, both are equally responsible. Each one, after it has performed its prayer, guards the other; thus each takes the place of the other fulfilling its duties. Such [a division of responsibility] is just.

251. [Shāfi'ī] said: The tradition contradictory to that of Khawwāt does not provide for such precaution, since one of the two parties protects the other only during one cycle while the other takes the place of the first in order to guard it before completing its prayer, so that when they were performing their prayer together they did not have any protection at all. So the only one who fully performed his prayer was the imām, who did not take part in guarding nor could he be strong enough to guard [against the enemy]. This [kind of performance] is inconsistent with the order of precaution and preparedness against the enemy. Yet God has made it plain that He distinguished between the fear-prayer and other prayers so that the followers of His religion should not be exposed to a sudden attack by the enemy and that neither party should be held responsible more than the other. We note that God made no stipulation that either the imām or the two parties should perform substitution prayers. This indicates that the imām and the men following him have equally fulfilled their duty. This is [clearly shown] in Khawwāt's tradition, but not in the one contradictory to it.

252. He asked: Is there any other meaning in the tradition unacceptable to you which you have not described?

253. [Shāfi'ī] replied: Yes. [The tradition] may mean that if it is permissible to perform the fear-prayer in a manner different from other prayers, it should be permissible to perform it in whatever manner is possible, depending on the circumstances in which [the Muslims] or the enemy happen to be, provided the number [of cycles] is completed, even though [the mode of] performance may be different, but all [such performances] fulfil the duty.

Another Kind of Contradictory [Traditions]

254. Shāfi'ī said: Someone has asked me: Traditions relating to the tashahhud⁵³ have been differently transmitted from the Prophet. Ibn Mas'ūd related that he [the Prophet] instructed men how to recite the tashahhud just as he instructed them to recite a portion⁵⁴ of the Qur'ān, beginning with the three words: Salutations to God.⁵⁵ Which [tradition of] tashahhud have you accepted?

⁵³ The tashahhud is the recital of the salutations to the Prophet and the formula of the profession of the faith.

⁵⁴ Literally: "The sūra [chapter] of the Qur'ān."

255. Shāfi'ī replied: Mālik [b. Anas] told us from Ibn Shihāb from 'Urwa [b. al-Zubayr] from 'Abd al-Rahmān b. 'Abd al-Qārī who heard 'Umar b. al-Khaṭṭāb on the pulpit instructing men how to recite the tashahhud say:

Say: Salutations to God. Sanctities belong to God. Goodness and prayers to God. O Prophet, peace is upon you and God's blessings and mercies to you. Peace is upon us and upon all good servants of God. I profess that there is no god at all but God, and I witness that Muḥammad is His servant and Apostle.⁵⁶

256. Shāfi'ī said: This is the tradition in which our learned predecessors have instructed us in our early age. We have known that tradition, including the names of authorities who related it, as well as others contradictory to it; but we know of no other transmission, whether it agrees or disagrees with it, which is more reliable than that one, although there are other reliable traditions also. For we are of the opinion that 'Umar did not instruct men from the pulpit in the presence of other companions of the Apostle save in what the Prophet himself had instructed. So any other tradition related to us by other companions which confirms this tradition is acceptable to us.

257. He asked: What tradition?

258. [Shāfi'ī] replied: We are told by the trusted authority—Yahya b. Ḥassān—from al-Layth b. Sa'd from Abū Zubayr al-Makkī from Sa'id b. Jubayr and Ṭāwūs from Ibn 'Abbās, who said:

The Apostle instructed us how to recite the tashahhud in the same manner as he taught us to recite the Qur'ān. He said: 'Blessed greetings and good prayers to God. O Prophet! Peace and God's mercies and blessings be upon you. Peace be upon us and upon all good servants of God. I profess that there is no god at all but God and that Muḥammad is the Apostle of God.⁵⁷

⁵⁷ For Shāfi'ī's remarks on this tradition as the dearest to him, see

259. Shāfi'ī said: He asked: Why does the transmission [of these traditions] from the Prophet vary? For Ibn Mas'ūd, Abū Mūsā and Jābir have related different versions, each varies from the other in certain words, and [the Caliph] 'Umar has instructed men differently. Moreover, the tashahhud of 'Ā'isha and Ibn 'Umar vary in wording; one of them includes a few words additional to the other.

260. [Shāfi'ī] replied: The matter is quite clear.

261. He said: Explain it to me.

262. [Shāfi'ī] replied: The recitals glorifying God instructed by the Apostle were committed to memory by men in words varying from one person to another, from the time of [the Prophet's] instruction. The main concern [of the transmitters] was the change in meaning, not the words; but whenever the change in wording resulted in a change of meaning such a change was not permissible. For it is possible that the Prophet himself permitted each man to recite what he had learned provided that there was no change in the meaning of his recital. So the transmitters in turn regarded as permissible the variations in the wording of the recitals but not in their meaning.⁵⁸

263. He asked: Is there any evidence making permissible what you have described?

264. [Shāfi'ī] replied: Yes!

265. He asked: What is it?

266. [Shāfi'ī] replied: Mālik [b. Anas] told us from Ibn Shihāb from 'Urwa [b. al-Zubayr] from 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. al-Qarī, who said: I have heard 'Umar b. al-Khaṭṭāb say:

I have heard Hishām b. Ḥakīm b. Hizām reciting the sūra of the Furqān [Q. XXV] differently from my recitation—which the Prophet himself had instructed me how to recite—so I almost quarrelled with him, but I waited until he completed the recitation, whereupon I wrapped his mantle around his neck and ⁵⁸ For further discussion on such variations in the wording of the tashahhud, see Shāfi'ī, Kitāb al-Umm, Vol. I, pp. 103-105.

dragged him to the Prophet, and I said: 'O Apostle of God! I have heard this man recite the sūra of the Furqān differently from what you have instructed me.' 'Recite it,' said the Prophet to the man; and he recited it the way I had heard it from him. 'This is the way it was revealed [to me],' said the Apostle; and he asked me to recite, which I did in the way he had instructed me to recite it. 'This is the way it was revealed [to me],' said the Prophet and added: 'The Qur'ān has been revealed in accordance with seven modes⁵⁹ and you may recite what is convenient of it.'⁶⁰ S 273

267. [Shāfi'ī] said: Since God, owing to His sympathy toward man and His recognition of the weakness of his memory, has permitted various recitals of His book in accordance with seven modes—provided no change in the meaning is made—variation in the wording of other books should be all the more permissible as long as the meaning is not affected. So changes in the wording of any text, save that of a divine communication, is permissible if the meaning is not changed. S 274

268. A Successor said: I have heard some of the Companions [relating traditions from the Apostle] agreeing in meaning but disagreeing in wording. I have taken up this matter with one of them, who said: "It is permissible unless the meaning is changed."

269. He asked: Since there is nothing in the recital of the tashahhud but the glorification of God, changes in the wording should be permissible, since, as you pointed out, [no change is made in the meaning]. Similarly, as you said [an argument might be advanced in favor of] fear-prayer, so that as long as it was performed as fully as related from the Prophet, it should fulfil the duty, since God has distinguished between that kind of prayer and others. But on what ground have you made your choice of the tradition related by Ibn 'Abbās on tashahhud to the exclusion of others? S 275

⁵⁹ This is an ambiguous expression in the Qur'ān, the meaning of which scholars have not agreed upon. "Modes" seems to be the nearest word to ahruf. See Tabarī, Tafsīr, Vol. I, pp. 58-72; and Suyūṭī, al-Itqān Fi 'Ulūm al-Qur'ān, Vol. I, pp. 46-48.

⁶⁰ Mālik, Vol. I, p. 201; Bukhārī, Vol. II, pp. 90-91; Muslim, Vol. VI, pp. 98-99.

270. [Shāfi'ī] replied: Since I have found that tradition comprehensive enough, comprising more words and meanings than others, and transmitted by reliable authorities from Ibn 'Abbās, I have decided to accept it without any reflection on others who have accepted other reliable traditions.

Contradictory Transmission of Traditions Different From Other Kinds

271. [Shāfi'ī said]: Mālik [b. Anas] told us from Nāfi' from Abū Sa'īd al-Khudrī that the Apostle said:

Let no one exchange gold for gold save in equal quantities, or increase one quantity against the other. Let no one exchange silver for silver save in equal quantities, or increase one quantity against the other. Let no one exchange anything at hand for another not in evidence.⁶¹

Mālik [b. Anas] told us from Mūsa b. Abī Tamīm from Sa'īd b. Yasār from Abū Hurayra from the Apostle, who said:

B 39

The [gold] dinār [shall be exchanged] for a [gold] dinār and the [silver] dirham for a [silver] dirham; there shall be no increase in the one against the other.⁶²

Mālik [b. Anas] told us from Ḥumayd b. Qays from Mujāhid from Ibn 'Umar, who said:

The dinār [shall be exchanged] for a dinār and the dirham for a dirham; there shall be no increase in the one against the other. This is the order of our Prophet to us and ours to you.⁶³

272. Shāfi'ī said: 'Uthman b. 'Affān and 'Ubāda b. al-Šāmit related [other] traditions from the Apostle to the effect that he prohibited the increase of gold for gold as the transfer of ownership takes place immediately.⁶⁴ § 277

We⁶⁵ accept these traditions, since there are others identical in meaning related by leading Companions and jurisconsults throughout the land.

Sufyān [b. 'Uyayna] told us that he heard 'Ubyad-Allāh b. Abī Yazīd say: I have heard Ibn 'Abbās say: Usāma b. Zayd told me that the Prophet said:

Al-ribā (usury) is to be found in al-nasī'a (deferred payment).⁶⁶ § 278

Ibn 'Abbās⁶⁷ and some of his followers in Makka and elsewhere have accepted this [tradition].

273. Someone has asked me: Is not this tradition contradictory to earlier ones?

274. [Shāfi'ī] replied: It may be regarded as both contradictory and not contradictory.

275. He asked: In what respect is it in agreement?

276. [Shāfi'ī] replied: Usāma may have heard someone ask the Apostle about [the exchange of] two different kinds of property such as gold for silver, dates for wheat, or any other different property the transfer of which was to take place immediately, and the Prophet said: "Ribā is in nasī'a." Or he may have been absent when the question was asked, but heard only the answer. So he related the answer without the question. Or he may have guessed [what the question was], for there is nothing in Usāma's tradition which is not in agreement with other traditions. § 279

277. He asked: Why do you maintain that [Usāma's tradition] may be regarded as contradictory to others?

⁶⁴ Literally: "As it passes from one hand to the other." See Mālik, Vol. II, p. 633; Muslim, Vol. XI, p. 11. Cf. Abū Dāwūd, Vol. III, p. 248, for a different wording.

⁶⁵ "Shāfi'ī said" is omitted.

⁶⁷ "Shāfi'ī said" is omitted.

278. [Shāfi'ī] replied: Because Ibn 'Abbās, who related it differently, said:

There is no ribā in a sale if the transfer of ownership takes place immediately; but ribā is in naṣī'a.⁶⁸

279. He asked: On what ground have you abandoned this tradition, notwithstanding its contradiction of earlier ones?

280. [Shāfi'ī] replied: Although those who related traditions contradictory to Usāma's were not as well-known experts as he, they were in the meantime no less reliable than he. However, 'Uthmān b. 'Affān and 'Ubāda b. al-Ṣāmit were earlier Companions and more intimately connected [with the Prophet] than Usāma. As to Abū Hurayra, he was regarded as one of the senior Companions and the most reliable transmitter of tradition in his time.

Since a tradition literally related by two authorities is likely to be more accurate and reliable than one related by one only, a tradition related by older and a greater number of authorities (e. g., five) should be the more acceptable than a tradition related by one only.

§ 281

Traditions Regarded as Contradictory [by Others], But Not by Us

[A. First] Category

281. [Shāfi'ī said]: [Sufyān] b. 'Uyayna told us from Muḥammad b. al-'Ajlān from 'Āṣim b. 'Umar b. Qatāda from Maḥmūd b. Labīd from Rāfi' b. Khadīj that the Apostle said:

Start your dawn-prayer at day-break,⁶⁹ i. e. [its performance] at that time is the most rewarding to you.⁷⁰

⁶⁹ Būlāq ed., p. 40.

⁷⁰ Tirmidhī, Vol. I, pp. 289-91; Dārimī, Vol. I, p. 277.

Sufyān b. 'Uyayna told us from al-Zuhri from 'Urwa from 'Ā'isha, who said:

They, the believing women, were in the habit of performing the dawn-prayer with the Prophet; then they went their way in the half-light, wrapped up in their robes and unrecognized by anyone.⁷¹

The Prophet's rising in the dawn was likewise related by Sahl b. Sa'd and Zayd b. Thābit and other Companions in traditions identical in meaning to 'Ā'isha's.

282. Shāfi'ī said: Someone has said to me: We hold that we should perform the dawn-prayer at daybreak, in accordance with the tradition of Rāfi' b. Khadij—which we regard as meritorious—while you maintain that it is permissible to choose one of the two contradictory traditions [on this matter]. Your [discretion] in our opinion, is contradictory to 'Ā'isha's tradition.

283. [Shāfi'ī] replied: If there is a tradition contradictory to 'Ā'isha's, it would be obligatory on both of us to accept her tradition rather than another, for her tradition should be the standard according to which you and I make our choice. So whenever traditions are found to be contradictory, we should choose the one for which there is valid reason which makes us believe that it is more reliable than others.⁷²

284. He asked: What would that reason be?

285. [Shāfi'ī] replied: It is that one of the two traditions should be more consistent with [the meaning of] the Book of God, for consistency with the Book of God is an evidence [of reliability].

286. He said: So we hold, too.

B 40

287. [Shāfi'ī] said: If there is no relevant text in the Book of God, we shall choose the more reliable of the two [traditions], the one related by an authority better known as an expert in transmission and who has a greater reputation for knowledge, or better memory; otherwise we choose the tradition related by two or more authorities in preference to one related by one authority, or the one which is more consistent with the general meaning of the Book or with the other sunnas of the Apostle, or more acceptable to the scholars, or validated by analogy, and [finally] the one followed by the majority of the Apostle's Companions.

288. He said: So we hold, as do all other scholars.

289. [Shāfi'i] said: 'Ā'isha's tradition is more consistent with the Book of God [than others], for God says: "Be you watchful over the prayers, and the middle prayer is included" [Q. II, 239]. So he who performs the prayer at the early time is the one who performs it more in keeping [with the duty of prayer].

Furthermore, the authorities who related 'Ā'isha's traditions are all reputed to possess reliability and better memory. For in addition to 'Ā'isha there are three authorities who related a similar tradition; they are: Zayd b. Thābit and Ibn Sa'd.⁷³ It is likewise more consistent with the Prophet's sunnas than Rāfi' b. Khadīj's tradition.

290. He asked: What sunnas?

291. [Shāfi'i] replied: The Apostle of God said: "To pray at the early time means that one receives God's satisfaction; to pray late [i. e., later than the proper time] means that one must ask His pardon."⁷⁴

S 286

He [the Prophet] does not prefer anything to God's satisfaction. As to pardon, it may either imply pardon for negligence or for allowable [action]. Permission means that favor will be given for the fulfilment of its opposite [i. e., prayer at the early time], because there is no order to abandon the opposite [action] which is permissible in the former.⁷⁵

⁷³ The third authority was perhaps left out by an error, for Shāfi'i gives the name as Anas b. Mālik in his book, Ikhtilāf al-Ḥadīth (Kitāb al-Umm, Vol. VII, p. 207).

⁷⁴ See Shāfi'i, Ikhtilāf al-Ḥadīth (Kitāb al-Umm, Vol. VII, p. 209). Doubt has been raised on the authenticity of this tradition. See Shākir's commentary on Tirmidhī, Vol. I, pp. 321-22.

⁷⁵ See Calverley, Worship in Islam, p. 6 f.

292. He asked: What do you mean by that?

293. [Shāfi'ī] replied: Since we are not permitted to abandon the performance of prayer at the scheduled time, only to delay the time of its performance, it is therefore meritorious to fulfil the duty at the scheduled time, although delay would be regarded as negligence that can be exercised. For the Apostle has made that clear in an answer to a question which he was asked: "What is the most meritorious act?" "Prayer at the scheduled time," he replied.⁷⁶ He [the Prophet] certainly will not abandon meritorious acts, nor will he order men to do otherwise. No scholar is ignorant that the performance of prayer at the scheduled time is most meritorious, but men are apt to be busy, forgetful, and [may suffer from] illnesses. That is the meaning which is more consistent with the Book of God.

294. He asked: In what part of the Book?

295. [Shāfi'ī] replied: God said: "Be you watchful over the prayers, and the middle prayer is included" [Q. II, 239]. So he who performs the prayer at the scheduled time is more in keeping [with his duty] than are those who delay its performance. We have noted that men prefer to perform their obligatory and voluntary prayers as nearly on time as they can, for they are liable to be busy or forgetful or suffer from other illnesses [which may cause postponement]—these are matters which are understandable. [Furthermore], the tradition related by Abū Bakr, 'Umar, 'Uthmān, 'Alī b. Abī Ṭālib, Ibn Mas'ūd, Abū Mūsa al-Ash'arī, Anas b. Mālik and others concerning the prompt performance of the dawn-prayer at the scheduled time is a reliable tradition.

296. He asked: Was it by the prolongation of the recital that Abū Bakr, 'Umar and 'Uthmān began their prayer in the half-light and completed it at day-break.

297. [Shāfi'ī] replied: They prolonged the recital [at one time] and shortened it [at another]; but the performance at the scheduled time is determined by when it begins, not by when it is completed. For they all began at half-light, and the Prophet completed [his prayer] at half-light [while the others completed theirs at day-break]. Thus you have disagreed with a reliable tradition from the Apostle which it was binding on you to accept; and you have disagreed with others by maintaining that one may begin the performance of his prayer at daybreak and complete it at daybreak, and that he can shorten the recital. So you have disagreed [with all the traditions] on the time of the beginning of the prayer and on the shortening of the recital as well as with the tradition that [the Prophet] completed his prayer at half-light.

298. He asked: Would you regard Rāfi's tradition as contradictory to 'Ā'isha's?

299. [Shāfi'i] replied: No!

300. He asked: In what respect do they agree?

301. [Shāfi'i] replied: Since the Apostle urged men to perform their prayer at the scheduled time and pointed out that [such performance] was meritorious, his [attitude] implied that he was in favor of performing the prayer at the end of daybreak. So he said: "Pray at day break," by which he meant just at the time the dawn begins.

302. He asked: Is there any other possible meaning?

303. [Shāfi'i] replied: Yes. It may mean either what you have held, or an intermediary position between your opinion and mine, or any other meaning that may be implied by [the term] daybreak.

304. He asked: What makes your opinion préférable to mine?

305. [Shāfi'i] replied: That which I have already explained as well as the Prophet's saying:

There are two dawns: The first is like the tail of the sirhān [false dawn]⁷⁷ in which [the performance of prayer] is neither prohibited nor permitted; [the other] is daybreak, at which the performance of prayer is permitted, but taking the meal is forbidden.

⁷⁷ Lane, Lexicon, p. 1345.

That is to say, [taking the meal] by him who intends to fast [for the coming day].⁷⁸

[B. Second] Category

306. [Shāfi'ī said]: Sufyān [b. 'Uyayna] told us from al-Zuhri from 'Aṭā' b. Yazīd from Abū Ayyūb al-Anṣārī that the Prophet said:

Let him who eases nature or makes water not face the qibla or turn his back to it; but turn either eastward or westward.⁷⁹

B 41

And Abū Ayyūb said:

When we entered Syria we found water-closets already built facing the qibla; ⁸⁰ we therefore turned to the other direction and asked God's forgiveness.⁸¹

Mālik [b. Anas] told us from Yahya b. Sa'īd from Muḥammad b. Yahya b. Ḥabbān from his uncle Wāsi' b. Ḥabbān from 'Abd-Allāh' b. 'Umar, who said:

Some people have said: Whenever you ease nature, you should face neither the qibla [toward Makka] nor Jerusalem. However, 'Abd-Allāh [b. 'Umar] said: When I was on the roof of our house I saw [at a distance] the Apostle easing nature, sitting on two clay bricks in the direction of Jerusalem.⁸²

307. Shāfi'ī said: The Apostle of God, living among Arabs who, most if not all, possessed no water-closets even when they lived in houses, instructed them [on how to ease nature] in a manner which might have one of two meanings:

⁷⁹ Bukhārī, Vol. I, p. 50; Muslim, Vol. III, p. 153; Abū Dāwūd, Vol. I, p. 3; Tirmidhī, Vol. I, pp. 13-14.

⁸⁰ Būlāq ed., p. 42. Cf. Mālik's wording in al-Muwaffa', Vol. I, p. 193.

⁸¹ See note 82; and Shākir's commentary on Tirmidhī, Sunan, Vol. I, pp. 13-14.

⁸² Mālik, Vol. I, pp. 193-94; Bukhārī, Vol. I, p. 50; Muslim, Vol. III, pp. 152-53; Shāfi'ī, Ikhtilāf al-Ḥadīth (Kitāb al-Umm, Vol. VII, pp. 269-70).

First, since [the Arabs] were in the habit of going out into the desert to ease nature, [the Prophet] ordered them neither to face the qibla nor to turn their backs to it, since it was easy to avoid facing the qibla and turning their backs to it in the open desert. Since it so often happened that those who went out to ease nature in the desert were seen uncovered by men performing prayer, they were ordered to respect the qibla of God by avoiding exposure of the uncovered portion of their bodies to men performing prayer. This is the meaning more consistent with [the Prophet's] instructions. But God knows best!

Second, it is possible that [the Prophet] prohibited men from going out to ease nature in the open desert in places which were likely to be in the direction of the qibla in order to protect it from filth which might hurt those who perform prayer on it.

308. [Shāfi'ī] said: It is possible that Abū Ayyūb heard the tradition related from the Prophet in a general manner, so he applied it both to the desert and the houses, making no distinction between facing the qibla in the open desert and in water-closets within houses in which those who ease nature would be hidden. He [Abū Ayyūb] seems to have related the tradition in a general manner as he had heard it. It is indeed the duty of all who may relate traditions in a general manner to do so as they heard them until they find [qualifying] evidence specifying them.

309. Shāfi'ī said: Because Ibn 'Umar related that he had seen the Prophet easing nature while facing [the qibla of] Jerusalem, one of the two qiblas—facing the latter qibla means that he should turn his back to the Ka'ba—, he objected to those who held that one should neither face the qibla nor turn his back on it while easing nature. He asserted that nobody should prohibit an act which the Apostle himself had permitted.

He [Ibn 'Umar] did not seem to have heard the Apostle's order concerning [easing nature in] the open desert in order to draw a distinction between that act in the desert and in houses, so that he would relate the order of prohibition applicable to the desert and the order of permission applicable to the houses. For [if he did] he would have cited the specification concerning the houses as he heard it and would have distinguished between the two in the way the Apostle did, owing to the differences in the conditions between houses and the open desert.⁸³

This is an evidence that whoever heard an order from the Apostle should obey it, even though [in obeying the order] the difference between one specifying order and another was unknown to him until such [an order] from the Apostle became known to him.

There are several other parallel traditions, but we have cited sufficient examples from among others we did not cite.

[C. Third] Category

310. [Sufyān] b. 'Uyayna told us from al-Zuhri from 'Ubayd-Allāh b. 'Abd-Allāh b. 'Utba from Ibn 'Abbās, who said:

Al-Ṣa'b b. Jaththāma told me that he had heard the prophet asked about the sudden attack at night on unbelievers in an enemy territory [whether] their [women and children] are included? 'They are included,' the Apostle replied.

'Amr b. Dinār, on the authority of al-Zuhri, added: They [the children] fall in [the same category as] their parents.⁸⁴

[Sufyān] b. 'Uyayna told us from al-Zuhri from Ibn Ka'b b. Mālik from his uncle, who said:

When the Prophet dispatched men to [kill] Ibn Abī al-Ḥuqayq, he prohibited them from killing women and children.⁸⁵

⁸³ Shāfi'ī's contention that Ibn 'Umar was unacquainted with such a tradition seems to be contradicted by a tradition cited by Abū Dāwūd to the effect that Ibn 'Umar was once seen urinating in the desert, sheltered by his camel, in the direction of the qibla. He was asked whether the Prophet had not prohibited this. Ibn 'Umar said yes, but not if there was a barrier between him and the qibla. See Abū Dāwūd, Vol. I, pp. 3-4.

⁸⁴ Bukhārī, Vol. II, pp. 250-51; Muslim, Vol. XII, pp. 48-49; Abū Dāwūd, Vol. III, p. 54; Ibn Ḥanbal, Vol. VI, pp. 332, 334; Shawkānī, Nayl al-Awṣār, Vol. VII, p. 259.

⁸⁵ For an account of this incident, see Ibn Hishām, Vol. II, pp. 714-16;

311. [Shāfi'ī] said: Sufyān held that the Prophet's saying: "They [women and children] are included," meant that their killing was permissible, but that [such a permission] was abrogated by his order relating to Ibn Abī al-Ḥuqayq; and [Sufyān] added that whenever al-Zuhri related the tradition of al-Ṣa'b b. Jaththāma, he added to it the tradition of Ibn Ka'b [prohibiting the killing of women and children].

S 298

312. Shāfi'ī said: The tradition of al-Ṣa'b b. Jaththāma dates from the time of the Prophet's 'umra [or lesser pilgrimage].⁸⁸ So if it were related from the time of the first 'umra, his order [of killing] Ibn Abī al-Ḥuqayq was either given before this 'umra, according to one opinion, or in the same year, to another; but if the tradition were related at the second 'umra, its date must be after the Prophet had given the order to [kill] Ibn Abī al-Ḥuqayq. But God knows best!

B 42

But we know of no order ever given [by the Prophet] permitting the killing of women and children which he later repealed. The reason for [the Prophet's] order prohibiting the killing of women and children, in our opinion, was to specify their exclusion from the order of killing whenever they could be distinguished from others [not because the killing of women and children was then permitted]. As to [the Prophet's] saying: "They [women and children] are included," the order means that [women and children] were subject to two rules: First, that they were immune neither by the faith [of Islam] which prohibits the shedding of blood of believers only, nor, [secondly,] by the rule governing only the territory [of Islam] which prohibits sudden attack on that territory.

Since the Prophet permitted sudden attack by night on enemy territory, on the strength of his order to attack the Guillaume's translation, pp. 482-83. See also Abū Dāwūd, Vol. III, p. 54 (the latter part of the tradition).

⁸⁸ The Prophet twice performed the 'umra (lesser pilgrimage): the first was in the year 7 of the hijra (A.D. 629), before the capture of Makka, and the second in the year 8 of the hijra (A.D. 630), shortly after the capture of Makka. See Ibn Hishām, Vol. II, pp. 788-89, 886-87; Guillaume's translation, pp. 530-31.

Banū al-Muṣṭaliq, [legal] knowledge prescribes that sudden attack by night, with the [consequential] killing of women and children, is lawful by an order of the Prophet, and that whoever kills them shall be subject neither to punishment nor to atonement [kaffāra], nor to blood-money [diya], nor to retaliation. Thus, if sudden attack by night is permitted the protection of Islam cannot save them. But whoever kills women and children should not do so intentionally, if they are recognizable and distinguishable.⁸⁷ He [the Prophet] prohibited the killing of children, because they do not comprehend disbelief sufficiently to be able to practice it, and the women, because they do not fight. They and the children might be taken as khawls (i. e., wives, slaves and servants) who will reinforce the followers of God's religion.

313. Someone said: Explain that by citing other examples?

314. [Shāfi'ī] replied: Enough has been given to the learned in distinction from others.

315. He asked: Will you give further evidence by citing a relevant text from the Book of God?

316. [Shāfi'ī] replied: ⁸⁸ God said:

It is not for a believer to kill a believer, unless it be by mistake. If anyone kills a believer by mistake, [the penalty is] the setting free of a believing slave, and blood-money is to be paid to his family, unless they forgo it as a free-will offering. If he [i. e. the victim] belongs to a people at enmity with you and is a believer, the compensation should be the setting free of a believing slave. If he belongs to a people between whom and you there is a compact, blood-money is to be paid to his family and the killer shall set free a believing slave. He who does not find the means to do that, shall fast two consecutive months—a repentance from God; verily God is All-knowing, All-wise [Q. IV. 94].⁸⁹

So ⁹⁰ God has imposed the penalty of paying the diya [blood-

⁸⁷ For further discussion on this rule, see Shāfi'ī, Kitāb al-Umm, Vol. IV, pp. 156-57.

⁸⁸ In the text: "Shāfi'ī replied: Yes, God said."

⁸⁹ But "if anyone kills a believer intentionally, his recompense is hell, to abide therein. God will be angry with him and will curse him, and prepare for him a mighty punishment" [Q. IV, 95].

money] and the freeing of a slave for the killing of a believer by mistake; and the payment of the diya and the freeing of a believing slave for the killing of a member [of a people] with whom Islam had made a compact. So in both cases killing is prohibited either by religion, or by compact, and by [residence in] the territory [of Islam]. If the believer kills another believer in a non-Muslim territory—wherein killing is not prohibited—faith prohibits him from so doing; he is therefore under [an obligation of] the kaffāra (atonement), but not the [payment of the] diya, for the shedding of the believer's blood is prohibited by the faith. Since the killing of non-Muslim children and women is neither prohibited by religion nor by residence in Muslim territory, compensation to the near of kin, retaliation, blood-money, and atonement are not obligatory.

317. He asked: Give some other kinds of traditions regarded by certain other scholars as contradictory.

318. [Shāfi'ī] replied: Mālik [b. Anas] told us from Ṣafwān b. Sulaym from 'Aṭā' b. Yasār from Sa'īd al-Khudrī, that the Apostle said:

The Friday [complete] washing is obligatory on every adult [believer].⁹²

[Sufyān] b. 'Uyayna told us from al-Zuhrī from Sālim from his father, that the Prophet said:

Friday washing, etc.," and his order for its performance has two possible meanings: [First,] the literal, is that cleanliness for the Friday prayer cannot be fulfilled except by [complete] washing just as freedom from pollution cannot be attained without [complete] washing. [The second,] it is obligatory by discretion [i. e., commendable], for ethical or health reasons. [For] Mālik [b. Anas] told us from al-Zuhrī from Sālim [b. 'Abd-Allāh b. 'Umar], who said:

A Companion of the Prophet entered the mosque on a Friday while the [Caliph] 'Umar was reciting the sermon. 'What is the time?' 'Umar asked. 'O Commander of the believers! I was at the market-place when I heard the call to prayer, so I performed the ablution at once [and hastened to this place,]' replied the Companion. '[Have you performed] the ablution too? I understand that the Apostle ordered only [complete] washing,' said 'Umar.⁹⁴

I have been told, [says Shāfi'ī], by the trusted authority [Yaḥya b. Ḥassā] from Ma'mar [b. Rashīd] from al-Zuhrī from Sālim from his father a similar tradition, giving the name of the Companion who entered the mosque without washing as 'Uthmān b. 'Affān.

320. [Shāfi'ī] said: Since 'Umar knew well that the Apostle had ordered [complete] washing [on Fridays], and knew that 'Uthmān was well aware of the Apostle's order and reminded him of it, and 'Uthmān admitted that he knew it, therefore if anyone thought that 'Uthmān might have forgotten, he should remember that 'Umar would have reminded him before he performed the prayer; and since 'Uthmān neither desisted from performing the prayer until he had washed nor was ordered by 'Umar to wash, this indicates that both must have been certain that the Apostle's order for the [Friday] washing was optional—not obligatory—, since neither 'Umar nor 'Uthmān would have neglected the order of washing unless, as I have already explained, it was regarded as optional.

[A General] Order of Prohibition in One Tradition Made Particular in Another

322. Shāfi'ī said:⁹⁷ Mālik [b. Anas] told us from Abū al-Zinnād and Muḥammad b. Yaḥya b. Ḥabbān from al-A'raj from Abū Hurayra that the Apostle said:

Let none of you seek a woman in marriage if his brother [in religion] already is seeking her.⁹⁸

Mālik [b. Anas] told us from Nāfi' from Ibn 'Umar from the Prophet, who said:

Let none of you seek a woman in marriage if his brother already is seeking her.⁹⁹ that no one should propose marriage to a woman in competition with his brother, the literal meaning of the tradition would have been that it was unlawful for any one to propose marriage to a woman in competition with another from the time when the suit was begun to the time of its withdrawal.

324. [Shāfi'ī] said: The Prophet's saying: "Let none of you propose, etc. . . .," may have been an answer to a specific question, but the one who related the tradition did not know the reason for which the Apostle had given the answer. So either a certain portion, not all, of the tradition was related, or the portion which was subject to doubt was [consciously] not related. Thus it is possible that the Prophet was asked a question about a man who sought to marry a certain woman, and she agreed to marry him, but when another, whom she preferred to the first, sought to marry her, she rejected the first in favor of the second. So [the Prophet] prohibited the proposal to this woman. For if the woman rejected [the second man] after she had accepted him, the first to whom she wanted to return might not agree to marry her. The consequences would be disadvantageous to both, [for it would be more difficult for them to find a partner to marry].

325. Someone may ask: Why do you maintain that the Prophet's order prohibiting one man to propose marriage in competition with another specified the meaning [in a certain situation], to the exclusion of others?

326. [Shāfi'ī replied]: Because there is a specific indication [in the tradition] to this effect.

327. He asked: Where is it?

328. [Shāfi'ī] replied: Mālik [b. Anas] told us from 'Abd-Allāh b. Yazīd—freed-slave of al-Aswad b. Sufyān—from Abū Salma b. 'Abd al-Rahmān from Fāṭima, daughter of Qays, who said: Her husband had divorced her and the Apostle ordered her to fulfil the 'idda [waiting period] in the house of Ibn Umm Maktūm before she could lawfully remarry, and told her to let him know when she had become lawful [for remarryage]. When the time had come, she told him that Mu'āwiya b. Abī Sufyān and Abū Jahm had proposed to her.

"Abū Jahm," said the Apostle, "is a man whose stick is never laid down from his shoulder, and Mu'āwiya is a beggar who owns no property. Get married to Usāma b. Zayd." "But I do not like him," she answered. "Get married to Usāma," he repeated. "So I married him and God has blessed him abundantly and I am happy with him," said she.¹⁰⁰

329. Shāfi'ī said: We are in favor of this opinion. For the evidence in the Apostle's proposition on behalf of Usāma to Fāṭima—after she had told him that Mu'āwiya and Abū Jahm had proposed to her—specified two points:

First, the Prophet knew well that the proposals of the two men [Abū Jahm and Mu'āwiya] had not been made [at the same time, but] one after the other. Since he did not tell her that one of them had no right to propose until the other had withdrawn, and since he [himself] proposed to her on behalf of Usāma—after she had been proposed to—we concluded that she must have rejected the earlier proposals, for [the Prophet] would have ordered her to marry the one she had accepted. So her intimation [to the Prophet] that two [men] had proposed to her was merely to inform him that she already had rejected them. She may have told him because she wanted his advice, for if she had accepted either one, she would not have sought his advice.

[Second], since the Prophet proposed to her on Usāma's behalf, we concluded that the circumstances in which he proposed to her were different from those which he regarded as unlawful. Nor does the circumstance [in which the Prophet proposed to her] distinguishing this proposal from the other—rendering the one lawful and the other unlawful—make the marriage valid unless she empowered her guardian [the Prophet] to arrange her marriage on her behalf. If the guardian [formally] arranges the marriage, [the contract] becomes [equally] binding on both, and she becomes lawful [only] to him. Otherwise, neither does the guardian have the right to arrange the marriage without her permission, nor does her approval or disapproval [of the proposition] make any difference.

330. Someone may ask: [Do you not think that] the circumstances of her approval are different from those of her disapproval?

331. [Shāfi'ī replied]: [Yes, they are] for if a man proposes to a woman and she rejects him with an affront, and she neither rejects him with an affront nor approves when he proposes again, her attitude is different and may be regarded as nearer to acceptance. Thus the circumstances in which she rejected him with an affront were different from those in which she did not reject him with an affront, for in the latter case her attitude was nearer to acceptance. Thus her attitude changed from non-committal to another nearer to approval than to non-approval.

No meaning other than the one which I have [just] described is valid: [The Prophet] has prohibited a proposal of marriage to a woman who had already been committed by her guardian, with her approval, to another; and that unless the guardian's commitment had been made, her previous position had not changed. But God knows best.¹⁰¹

Orders of Prohibition [in Some Traditions] More Clearly Stated Than in Previous [Traditions]

332. [Shāfi'ī said]: Mālik [b. Anas] told us from Nāfi' from Ibn 'Umar that the Apostle said:

The two parties to a sale [contract] have the right of option [to cancel the contract] so long as they have not separated, except the sale of option (bay' al-Khiyār) [i. e., that the right of option would be as stipulated in the contract].¹⁰²

Sufyān [b. 'Uyayna] told us from al-Zuhri from Sa'id b. al-Musayyib from Abū Hurayra that the Apostle said:

|| Let no one sell to someone else what he already has agreed to sell to another.¹⁰³

The meaning implied in this [communication] indicates that the Apostle decreed that "the two parties to a sale have the right of option so long as they have not parted," and his order of prohibition concerning sale by one person in contravention of his agreement to sell to another means that [such an order is applicable] only so long as the two [parties] have not departed from the place of the transaction. For the two cannot be regarded as two parties to the sale until they have made the contract. Once the contract is made, it becomes binding on the parties, and no disadvantage befalls the vendor if another man enters into another sale transaction with the purchaser whether relating to the same property or to different property after the property is sold. But so long as the two parties have the right of option and another vendor may offer, let us say, a suit of cloth for nine dīnārs while the other had asked ten, the purchaser is bound to cancel the sale transaction since he has the right of option before they separate. He may even cancel the first sale transaction and make no other one. So the other [vendor's] action could be disadvantageous to either the first vendor and the purchaser, or to either one of them. This is the explanation for the [Prophet's] order of prohibition that no man should enter into a sale transaction in contravention of his agreement to sell to another, and I know of no other. For do you not agree that if a man purchases a suit of cloth for ten dīnār and the sale contract is binding on the two parties before they separate, no damage accrues to the first vendor if a second vendor offers to sell the prospective purchaser one dīnār cheaper, because the sale contract for ten dīnārs had become binding and could not be cancelled.

¹⁰³ Cf. Shawkānī, Nayl al-Awṭār, Vol. V, pp. 195-96.

333. [Shāfi'ī] said: It has been related from the Prophet that he said:

Let none of you bargain in competition with his brother [i. e., another Muslim].

If this tradition were reliable, although I do not consider it to be so, it would be parallel to the one which runs as follows:

Let none of you propose marriage to a woman in competition with his brother.

"No one should bargain in competition with his brother" means that [no sale to another is permitted] if he [the vendor] has indicated an intent to sell before the sale takes place, so that if the contract is made it becomes binding.

334. If someone should ask: What is the evidence for that?

335. He would be told: The Apostle sold [a piece of property to a person] who paid a higher price. The sale of a property to one who paid a higher price is a bargain against another's bargain; but the vendor [in this case] did not accept the offer of the first person and demanded a higher price.¹⁰⁴

[Orders of] Prohibition Consistent with Previous Orders in Certain Matters and Inconsistent with Others

[A. First Category]

336. [Shāfi'ī said]: Mālik [b. Anas] told us from Muḥammad b. Yahya b. Ḥabbān from al-'Araj from Abū Hurayra, who said:

¹⁰⁴ Shāfi'ī disagreed with Mālik on the khiyār al-majlis, following more consistently the spirit of the Prophet's tradition, while Mālik, under the influence of local practice, rejected a tradition in favor of a sound legal rule. See Mālik, Vol. II, pp. 671-72; Shāfi'ī, Kitāb al-Umm, Vol. VII, pp. 204-205.

The Apostle of God has prohibited the performance of prayer after the 'aṣr till the sun has set, and after the break of dawn till it has risen.¹⁰⁵

1 Mālik [b. Anas] told us from Nāfi' from Ibn 'Umar that the Prophet said:

S 316

Let no one intend to perform his prayer at the time of the sun-rising nor at the sun-setting.¹⁰⁶

'Mālik [b. Anas] told us from Zayd b. Aslam from 'Aṭā b. Yaṣār from 'Abd-Allāh al-Ṣunābiḥī that the Apostle of God said:

When the sun first rises, Satan's horns are associated with it; when it is up, they are separated; when it is at the meridian they join it; when it begins to descend, they are separated; when it approaches its setting, they join it again; and when it disappears, they are separated. The Apostle of God has forbidden the performances of prayer during these hours [when Satan's horns are associated with the sun].¹⁰⁷

The Apostle's order of prohibition during these times may have two meanings:

The first, which is the more general, is that all kinds of prayers are incumbent on him who forgets or oversleeps, and those of that for any reason are incumbent on one are prohibited during these times, and no one is permitted to perform them. Should any one perform one of them, the duty would not be fulfilled, just as it would not be if he performed the prayer before its proper time.

S 318-320

The second, [the Prophet] may have intended to specify a certain [kind] of prayer, not others.

Prayers may be divided into two kinds: The one is obligatory which no Muslim is permitted to omit at its proper time, for if he ever does, he must make up for it. The other, the performance of which may draw [us] nearer to God, is supererogatory. He who omits a supererogatory prayer is under no obligation to make up for it.

¹⁰⁵ Mālik, Vol. I, p. 221; Bukhārī, Vol. I, p. 154; Muslim, Vol. VI, p. 110; Shawkānī, Nayl al-Awtār, Vol. III, p. 93.

¹⁰⁶ Mālik, Vol. I, p. 220; Bukhārī, Vol. I, pp. 154-55; Muslim, Vol. VI, pp. 110-12.

¹⁰⁷ Mālik, Vol. I, p. 219; Ibn Ḥanbal, Vol. VIII, p. 8; Shāfi'ī, Musnad, Vol. I, p. 55; cf. Tirmidhī, Vol. I, pp. 301-302.

We have found that obligatory [prayers] are to be distinguished from the optional if one is travelling as a rider. The obligatory prayers can be performed on the ground, and no other way fulfils the duty, but the supererogatory ones may be performed while riding in whatever direction one desires. The two [kinds] may be distinguished [on the basis of] their performance: whether in town or [in the country] while on travel. He who can perform the obligatory prayers standing, should not do so sitting, but he is permitted to perform the supererogatory ones sitting.

Since the two meanings [are permissible] it is obligatory on the learned not to become attached to any particular—in distinction from general—meaning unless there is a specifying indication in the sunna or an agreement among the scholars who do not agree on any matter contrary to the sunna.

337. [Shāfi'ī] said: Similarly, other traditions from the Apostle should be accepted as explicitly general unless an indication specifies otherwise, as I have explained, or unless there is an agreement of the Muslim [scholars], specifying that their meaning is implicit, not explicit [literal], and that it is particular, not general; and men should obey them in either case, as such. [For] Mālik [b. Anas] told us from Zayd b. Aslam from 'Aṭā' b. Yasār from Busr b. Sa'īd and al-A'raj from Abū Hurayra that the Apostle said:

Whoever performed one cycle of the morning prayer before sunrise would be regarded as having performed the morning prayer, and whoever performed one cycle of the 'aṣr prayer before sunset, would be regarded as having performed the 'aṣr prayer.¹⁰⁸

338. Shāfi'ī said: Thus [legal] knowledge indicates that he who performs one cycle of the morning prayer before sunrise and he who performs one cycle of the 'aṣr prayer before sun-set, would be regarded as having performed his prayers at forbidden times, because both would be regarded as having been performed after the morning and 'aṣr prayers, coinciding with sun-rise and the sun-set, and these are times at which the performance of prayers is prohibited.

Since the Apostle considered those who perform their prayers at these times as having performed the morning and 'aṣr prayers, we concluded that his order of prohibition against performing prayer at these times governs supererogatory prayers [only], which are not obligatory, for he would not permit the performance of a prescribed prayer at a time forbidden for such prayers.

Mālik [b. Anas] told us from Ibn Shihāb from Ibn al-Musayyib that the Apostle said:

Whoever forgot to perform a certain prayer should make up for it whenever he remembered it, for God said: 'And perform the prayer for my remembrance' [Q. XX, 14].¹⁰⁹

Mālik [b. Anas] and 'Imrān b. al-Ḥuṣayn related a tradition from the Prophet similar to that of Ibn al-Musayyib, but one of them added: "[Whoever forgot . . .] or was asleep . . ." ¹¹⁰

Shāfi'ī said: In his saying that ". . . he should make up for it whenever he remembered it," the Apostle, on God's behalf, appointed no specific time for it, but stated that it should be performed as soon as it was remembered.

[Sufyān] b. 'Uyayna told us from Abū al-Zubayr [al-Makkī] ¹¹¹ from 'Abd-Allāh b. Bābāh from Jubayr b. Muṭ'im that the Prophet said :

Men of 'Abd-Manāfil Whoever of you may be in authority, shall never prevent anyone from performing the circumambulation of this House [of the Ka'ba] or the prayer at any time, whether in daytime or at night.¹¹²

'Abd al-Majīd [b. 'Abd al-'Azīz] told us from Ibn Jurayj from 'Aṭā' [b. Yasar] from the Prophet, a similar tradition, adding at the beginning: "Men of 'Abd al-Muṭṭalib, etc. . . ."¹¹³ S 325

339. [Shāfi'ī] said: So Jubayr informed [us] that the Prophet gave an order permitting the performance of the circumambulation and prayer at any time that anyone wished to do so. This [order] clearly indicates that the [Prophet's] orders prohibiting the performance of prayers at certain times related only to optional prayers, not to obligatory prayers. For Muslims performed the funeral prayers, which were obligatory, generally after the morning and the 'aṣr prayers [irrespective of the forbidden times].

Some of our followers argued that since 'Umar b. al-Khaṭṭāb performed the circumambulation after daybreak and, finding the sun had not yet risen, went to Ṭuwa¹¹⁴ and couched his camel and performed the prayer after sunrise, they prohibited the performance of the circumambulation prayer after both the 'aṣr and the morning prayers just as they prohibited optional prayers.¹¹⁵ S 326

340. [Shāfi'ī] said: If 'Umar delayed the circumambulation prayer, he delayed it because it was permissible for him to do so. For he may have been in need of a certain place at Ṭuwa to ease nature,¹¹⁶ and it was permissible for him [to delay the prayer]. However, ['Umar] had heard only the general order of prohibition, and he punished al-Munkadir [b. 'Abd-Allāh] by striking him for performing a prayer after the 'aṣr in Madīna, without realizing that the order of prohibition was specified to the situation that I have just explained and so S 327

[he felt] himself under obligation [(to punish 'al-Munkadir]. He who knows the reasons for the orders of prohibition and permission [should distinguish between the two], since the order of permission was different from that of prohibition, just as I have already explained in the [case of the tradition of] 'Alī b. Abī Ṭālib concerning the Prophet's order of prohibition against keeping the meat of sacrifice beyond three days, because 'Alī had heard the Prophet's [general] order but did not hear the reasons for that [particular] prohibition.

341. He said: Someone may ask: Did not Abū Sa'īd al-Khudrī do what 'Umar had done?

342. [Shāfi'ī] replied: The answer to this [question] is like the answer to other [questions].

343. He asked: Someone may ask: Is there any one who did contrary to what the two have done?

344. [Shāfi'ī] replied: Yes! They were: Ibn 'Umar, Ibn 'Abbās, 'Ā'isha, al-Ḥasan, al-Ḥusayn, and others. Ibn 'Umar heard the order of prohibition directly from the Prophet. [For] [Sufyān] b. 'Uyayna told us from 'Amr b. Ḍinār, who said:

'Atā' b. Abī Rabāḥ and I saw Ibn 'Umar perform the circumambulation after daybreak and a prayer of two rak'as before sun-rise.¹¹⁷

Sufyān [b. 'Uyayna] told us from 'Ammār al-Duḥnī from Abū Shu'ba that al-Ḥasan and al-Ḥusayn performed the circumambulation after the 'aṣr and [then] prayed.

Muslim [b. Khālīd al-Zanjī] and 'Abd al-Majīd [b. 'Abd al-'Azīz] told us from Ibn Jurayj from Ibn Abī Mulayka, who said:

I have seen Ibn 'Abbās perform both the circumambulation and the prayer after the 'aṣr.¹¹⁸

345. [Shāfi'ī] said: The reason for stating the Companions' disagreement on this matter is to enable him who is aware of this disagreement to understand that the meaning could not be other than what we have just said, or that the sunna was unknown by him who acted differently from it, or that he who knew the sunna may have interpreted its meaning in a certain way or may have found justification for certain other interpretation.

¹¹⁸ Ibid., p. 463.

So if a certain tradition from the Apostle is proved to be authentic, it is obligatory on all who are aware of it to accept it, and nothing else shall be accepted instead, for God has given no one else [authority] to give an order contrary to the [Prophet's] order.

[B. Second] Category:

346. Mālik [b. Anas] told us from Nāfi' from Ibn 'Umar that the Apostle prohibited "muzābana." Muzābana is the exchange of the [fresh] fruit [of palm-trees] for dry dates in equal quantities, and of grapes for raisins in equal quantities.¹¹⁹

Mālik [b. Anas] told us from 'Abd-Allāh b. Yazīd, freed-slave of al-Aswad b. Sufyān, that Zayd Abū 'Ayyāsh told him from Sa'd b. Abī Waqqāṣ that he heard the Prophet asked about the exchange of [dry] dates for fresh dates. "Do fresh dates lose weight after they dry?" inquired the Prophet. "Yes, they do," was the answer. Thereupon the Prophet ordered the prohibition [of such a sale].¹²⁰

Mālik [b. Anas] told us from Nāfi' from Ibn 'Umar from Zayd b. Thābit, who related that the Apostle permitted [the owner of] an 'ariya, [to sell a branch which contains a quantity of dates roughly estimated].¹²¹

[Sufyān] b. 'Uyayna told us from al-Zuhri from Sālim from his father from Zayd b. Thābit that the Prophet permitted the sale of 'ariyas.¹²²

¹²² Ibid.; and Shāfi'ī, Ikhtilāf al-Ḥadīth (Kitāb al-Umm, Vol. VII, p. 319).

347. Shāfi'ī said: The exchange of [fresh] dates for dry dates was prohibited on the strength of the Prophet's order of prohibition, and the Prophet made it clear that he prohibited [such an exchange] because fresh dates lose weight after they dry. He [the Prophet] prohibited the exchange of dates for dates except in equal quantities, because he noted the loss of weight when fresh dates become dry, so that the exchange cannot possibly be equal in quantities since the [amount] lost cannot be known. Thus the [Prophet's] order of prohibition includes two meanings: The differential in weight, and al-muzābana; the latter means the sale of a known for an unknown [i. e., shrinking] measure of the same kind.

Since the Apostle permitted the exchange of 'ariyas for dry dates by measure, his special permission [of sale] should not be construed as permission for other kinds of sale, such as al-muzābana or the exchange of [dry] dates for fresh dates, for his order of prohibition is general excluding only [the sale of] 'ariyas. This is an example of the general speech intended to mean the particular.¹²³

348. [Shāfi'ī said]: Sa'īd b. Sālim [al-Qaddāh] from Ibn Jurayj from 'Atā' [b. Abī Rabāh] from Šafwān b. Mawhab from 'Abd-Allāh b. Muḥammad b. Šayfī from Ḥakīm b. Hizām, who said:

S 335

The Apostle of God said to me: 'I have been told that you are engaged in selling foodstuffs.' 'Yes, O Apostle of God,' answered Ḥakīm. 'Let no one sell foodstuffs until it is purchased and its price is paid for,' said the Apostle.¹²⁴

Sa'īd [b. Sālim] told us from Ibn Jurayj, who said: 'Atā' [b. Abī Rabāh] related to me a similar tradition from 'Abd-Allāh b. 'Iṣma [al-Jushamī] from Ḥakīm b. Hizām, who heard it from the Prophet.

The trustworthy authority [Yaḥya b. Ḥassān] told us from Ayyūb b. Abī Tāmīma from Yūsuf b. Māhak from Ḥakīm b. Ḥizām, who said:

The Apostle prohibited me from selling what I did not own.¹²⁵

["What I did not own,"] means what one has not received and became responsible for.

[Sufyān] b. 'Uyayna told us from Ibn Abī Najih from 'Abd-Allāh b. Kathīr from Abū al-Minhāl from Ibn 'Abbās, who said:

When the Apostle of God entered Madīna, he found men in the habit of paying for dates in advance for one or two years. Thereupon he stipulated: 'Whoever pays in advance [for a commodity], he shall do so for a specified measure and a definite weight, to be delivered at a fixed time.¹²⁶

S 338

349. [Shāfi'ī] said: The Prophet's order of prohibition against the vendor's sale [of a commodity] not in his own possession means either that the vendor may sell the commodity before it is seen by the buyer as it had been seen by the vendor at the time of sale, or that the vendor may sell a commodity he either did not have or had not taken possession of, so that the vendor was not responsible for it nor was it in his possession to be able to hand it over to the buyer. [Finally] the Prophet's order may have another meaning, other than the two [mentioned].

Since the Apostle stipulated that "whoever pays in advance [for a commodity] should do so for a specified measure and a definite weight, to be delivered at a fixed time," such [kind of a commodity] falls in the category of sale in which the commodity is neither in the vendor's possession nor ready for delivery at the time of sale. But since the vendor is responsible [for such a commodity] at the time of delivery, the Prophet's order indicates that he prohibited only the kind of sale in which the commodity is not in the vendor's possession. But God knows best!

¹²⁵ See Abū Dāwūd, Vol. III, p. 281.

¹²⁶ Cf. Būlāq ed., p. 47, where there is a repetition of the same stipulations. Paragraphs 917-918 in Shākir's edition are omitted for the same reason. See Bukhārī, Vol. II, p. 44; Muslim, Vol. XI, pp. 41-42; Abū Dāwūd, Vol. III, p. 275. Sale by paying in advance is called salaf or salam sale.

The [Prophet's] order of prohibition may have been intended against the sale of a commodity not in evidence, regardless of whether it is in the vendor's possession or not, for it would be liable to destruction or shrinkage before it were seen by the buyer.

350. [Shāfi'ī] said: Thus every explicitly general statement in the sunna of the Apostle should be accepted as such unless another reliable tradition from the Apostle indicates that only part of that explicitly general statement was intended to be general, as I have already explained regarding this and other similar points. It is obligatory on the scholars to accept the two kinds of traditions as complimentary—not as contradictory—in so far as they can be regarded as complimentary, for if there is a way for harmonizing them, without regarding either one more binding than the other, [they should do so]. No two traditions should ever be regarded as contradictory so long as there is a possibility of harmonizing them; a contradictory tradition is one which is incapable of being harmonized except by abandoning another, such as when two traditions relate to one [specific] act, the one permitting it and the other prohibiting it.

Chapter X

[ON SINGLE-INDIVIDUAL TRADITIONS]¹

351. Someone has asked me: Will you state what the minimum proof for a narrative related by a few [transmitters] should be in order to be binding upon scholars?

352. [Shāfi'ī] replied: [The minimum proof] is that the narrative must be related by one person from another [before him] back to the Prophet, or to one next to the Prophet.² The proof for such a tradition is not established unless certain conditions are fulfilled:

S 369

He who relates a tradition must merit confidence in his religion, and be known as reliable in his transmitting, comprehending what he transmits, aware of any pronunciation that might change the meaning of the tradition, capable of transmitting the tradition word for word as he heard it, not merely transmitting [in his own words] its meaning; for if he transmits only the meaning and is unaware of what might alter its sense, he might unknowingly transmute the lawful into the unlawful and vice-versa.³ So if he transmits word for word there remains no ground for fearing a change of the meaning. [Furthermore], he should have learned the tradition by heart,

³ Būlāq ed., p. 51.

if he relates it from memory, and should have memorized the written text [of traditions] if he relates it in its written form; when he participates with others in relating a tradition from memory, that which they relate must agree. He must not be an interpolator,⁴ attributing to someone whom he has not met that which he has not heard from him, or attributing to the Prophet something different from that which reliable authorities relate from him.

The same [qualifications] must be possessed by transmitters preceding him until the transmitter relates back to the Prophet or to him who carries it back closest to him, for each of them vouches for the tradition as he received it and verifies it for him to whom he passes it. So none of them should lack [the qualifications] I have just described.

353. He asked: Explain this to me by an example concerning which I am better informed, owing to my knowledge of it and my limited knowledge of what you have described in the traditions.

354. [Shāfi'ī] replied: Would you like me to cite an example for which this might be an analogy?

355. He said: Yes.

356. [Shāfi'ī] said: [Traditions] constitute a source in themselves and should not be regarded as analogous to anything else, for analogy is weaker than the original source.

357. He asked: I do not mean that you should consider it as an analogy. Will you give me an example of it from testimonies which are generally known?

358. [Shāfi'ī] replied: Testimonies may disagree in certain matters and agree in others.

S 372

359. He asked: In what [matters] could they disagree?

360. [Shāfi'ī] replied: I accept a tradition from either one man or one woman,⁵ but I will accept neither one alone in testimony. I accept the traditions [in the form]: "So-and-so related to me from so-and-so" if the transmitter is not an interpolater; but I do not accept it in testimony unless [the witness] says: "I heard [so-and-so]" or "I saw [so-and-so]" or "take me as a witness."

Traditions, however, vary; I accept some of them by istidlāl (inductive reasoning) on the basis of the Book [of God], the sunna, consensus, and analogy, but istidlāl is not applicable to testimony as well. There are many people whose testimony is acceptable, but I do not accept a tradition related by them owing to the possibility that it might contain many changes in meaning and might omit certain words affecting the meaning. But [traditions] may agree with testimony on matters other than those I have already described. § 373

361. He asked: I agree with what you have said concerning your refusal to accept a tradition from anyone except a trustworthy authority who had learned it by heart and is aware of what might change the meaning of the tradition. But why do you not accept such conditions in the case of testimony?

362. [Shāfi'ī] replied: Changes in the meaning of traditions are more difficult to detect than in the case of testimony. So I am much more careful in the case of a tradition than in the case of testimony.

363. He said: I agree with you; but if the person from whom someone quotes a tradition is reliable and he [in turn] transmits from a man whose reliability you do not know, then I do not accept your refusal to put confidence in his good reputation and your insistence that he must narrate only from a reliable source even though you may not know who it is. § 374

364. [Shāfi'ī] replied: If four persons of just character, well-versed in the law, testified confirming the testimony of two witnesses in favor of the claim of one man against another,⁶ would you take a decision if the four persons did not tell you that the two witnesses were of just character?

365. He replied: No, I should by no means take any decision on the basis of their testimony until I knew their just character, either on the basis of the confirmation by the four persons of their just character, or of the confirmation of their just character by others; or on the basis of my own knowledge of their just character.

366. [Shāfi'i] said: Why would you not accept their [testimony] for the same reason that you wanted me to accept the tradition, and say that they would not have testified in favor of anyone unless they considered him to be of just character?

367. He said: They might testify both in favor of someone whom they considered to be of just character, and in favor of someone whom they knew, although they did not know his just character. Since such a possibility might exist in their testimony, I could not accept the testimony of those who testified in his favor until [either] they declared him of just character or I was certain of his just character and the just character of those who testified before me concerning the just character of others. Nor do I accept the confirmation of the just character of a witness unless I know the just character of the person who confirms the just character of the witness.

368. [Shāfi'i] said: The proof that you have adduced in this matter is against you, because you do not accept the narrative of a truthful [person] from someone whose truthfulness we do not know. People are more careful to testify only on behalf of the testimony of someone whose just character they know than they are in accepting a tradition only from someone whose transmission of traditions is known to be sound. This is because one man may meet another in whom he sees the mark of goodness and thinks well of him, so that he accepts the tradition from him and passes it on without knowing his character. Thus he may relate that a man called so-and-so transmitted to him such-and-such [a tradition] and hopes that he might find a trustworthy man who would know of the tradition so that he could accept it from him, or that he could relate it on the authority of a transmitter whether he approves of it or not; or he might be careless in transmitting the tradition from him. For I do not know that I have ever met anyone who did not relate [traditions] both from a trustworthy authority who had learned them by heart and from other sources who were quite different. In such cases, I have done what was incumbent upon me. Nor was my search for knowing the veracity of him who related a tradition to me more of an obligation than my quest for knowledge of the veracity of those from whom he had received the tradition. For as far as all of them are concerned I know, all I need [to know] about those from whom I receive a tradition, since all of them confirmed the narrative as received from those before them and handed it on to those after them. S 376

369. He asked: What about [the possibility of] accepting a tradition from a person whom you have never known to be an interpolator, relating it from so-and-so, although it might be possible that he had never heard it?

370. [Shāfi'ī] replied: Muslims of just character are right [when they testify] about themselves, but their status vis-à-vis themselves is different from their status vis-à-vis others. Do you not agree that if I knew them to be of just character [in matters] concerning themselves, I should accept their testimony; but that when they confirm the testimony of another witness I cannot accept that testimony until I know the just character of the other witness. For my knowledge of their just character does not constitute knowledge of the just character of him whose testimony they confirmed. We should accept the information they relate about themselves and assume that their statements are valid until their deeds indicate the opposite. We should then be on our guard in the matter with regard to which their deeds did not conform to what they ought to have done. S 377

Tadlīs has neither been practiced in our lands by our predecessors in the past nor by our followers whom we have known until recently, for some have taken it over from people who practised it and who would have been better off if they had left them alone [to indulge] in it. S 52

It is the same to them whether a man says: "I heard so-and-so say 'I heard so-and-so,'" or whether he says: "So-and-so S 378 related from so-and-so"; they only narrate what they have heard from others whom they have met from those whom we know who [operate in] this fashion. We accept the form: "So-and-so related to me from so-and-so," if he is not an interpolater.*

He whom we have known to interpolate on one occasion has exposed to us his fault in his transmission. This fault constitutes neither falsehood, which would cause us to reject his tradition, nor a real truth. Hence we accept from him that which we accept from those who speak the real truth. So [our position is] that we do not accept a tradition from an interpolater unless he says in it: "He related to me" or "I heard."

371. He said: I see that you accept the testimony [of a man] whose tradition you do not accept.

372. [Shāfi'i] replied: This is because of the greater significance and position of traditions among the Muslims as well as for another obvious reason.

373. He asked: What is it?

374. [Shāfi'i] replied: A word might be omitted from the tradition and thus alter its meaning; or a word might be pronounced differently from the way it was pronounced by the transmitter, thus altering the meaning of the tradition, even though he who pronounced it did not intend to do so. If he who transmits a tradition is ignorant of its meaning, he does not understand the tradition, and we do not accept it. [For] if he transmits what he does not understand, he is of those who do not transmit the tradition word for word; and he seeks to transmit the meaning of the tradition, but he does not understand the meaning at all.

375. He asked: Is it possible that the tradition of a man of just character might not be acceptable?

376. [Shāfi'i] replied: Yes, for if he were [the type of person] I have just described, this would give rise to open suspicion that would cause his tradition to be rejected. A man might be just in testifying for other men, but suspect when he testifies for himself or for some of his relatives. For it is [perhaps] easier for a man to let himself fall from a height than to give a false testimony. However, whenever he becomes subject to suspicion his testimony is rejected for that reason. For distrust of those who do not transmit a tradition word for word and who do not understand its meaning is most clearly [indicated] in the case of those who testify in favor of someone whose testimony has been rejected because of dubious [elements] that it contains.

* Būlāq¹ ed., p. 53.

The testimony of witnesses should be [carefully] considered; if we detect a certain bias or an excessive interest in the person on whose behalf they are testifying, we do not accept their testimony. If they testify regarding a difficult matter beyond their ability to comprehend, we do not accept their testimony, for we do not believe that they understand the meaning of that to which they have testified. We do not accept the testimony of those whose transmission betrays many errors and which has no sound written source, just as we do not accept witnesses who make many errors in their testimony.

377. Shāfi'ī said: ' Traditionists vary: Some are well known [for their knowledge] of tradition; they make every effort in their search for it, listening to their fathers, uncles, near of kin, and friends as well as spending long hours in the company of scholars and disputants in the field. Such people stand in the forefront of [the science of] tradition.⁸ If [their transmission] is contradicted by someone who is less knowledgeable, it is better to accept the tradition of the former.

S 382

With regard to the traditionists, if they are jointly [engaged in considering] a tradition handed down by a certain man, they try to find out whether it agrees with what has been memorized by one of them and whether it is supported by those who have committed [the traditions] to memory, or whether it conflicts with what he and those who have memorized the traditions have learned by heart. If the transmitted [versions] differ, we seek guidance from [the versions that people] have memorized. One can then tell from the errors and other indications therein what the truth is. We have explained about memorization and errors in another section [of this work]. I ask God to protect us against error and grant us success.⁹

378. He asked: On what ground do you accept a tradition related by a single individual even though you do not accept the [unsupported] testimony of one witness? What is your argument for holding that the single-individual tradition and testimony are ambiguous in most cases but different in others? 833

379. [Shāfi'i] replied: You are repeating a question that I thought I had already answered: I do not compare [the single-individual tradition] with testimony. You asked me to give a parallel example more familiar to you than traditions. I gave you such an example, but I did not mean that analogical deduction is applicable to tradition. For the proof of a single-individual tradition is too strong to need the support of a parallel example; indeed it is an original source in itself.

380. He asked: How is it that traditions are like testimony in certain respects but not in others?

381. [Shāfi'i] replied: [Traditions] are different from testimony in some respects, as I have already pointed out to you; but if I have said that they are similar to testimony in some respects and not others, I have done so for certain obvious reasons. 834

382. He asked: What are they, since the purpose of all testimony is the same?

383. [Shāfi'i] replied: Do you mean in all cases or only in certain ones?

384. He said: In all cases.

385. [Shāfi'i] asked: What is the minimum number [of witnesses] you would require in [a case of] adultery?

386. He replied: Four.

387. [Shāfi'i] asked: If there are only three of them, would you order [the accusers] to be scourged?

388. He replied: Yes.

⁹ Būlāq ed., p. 53.

389. [Shāfi'ī] asked: How many witnesses would you require in [the case of] murder, disbelief [i. e., apostasy], and highway robbery, all of which are punishable by death?

390. He replied: Two.

391. [Shāfi'ī] asked: How many witnesses would you require in [cases of theft of] property? § 385

392. He replied: One male and two female witnesses.

393. [Shāfi'ī] asked: How many witnesses would you require in [cases relating to] vices affecting women?

394. He replied: One woman.

395. [Shāfi'ī] asked: If there were lacking [either one] of the two witnesses or one of the male and two female witnesses, would you not order the [remaining] witnesses to be scourged as you did in [the case of] adultery?

396. He replied: No.¹⁰ § 53

397. [Shāfi'ī] asked: Do you consider that all these cases are similar?

398. He replied: Yes, I agree that the number [of witnesses] required is not the same and that only the witnesses in the case of adultery should be scourged.

399. [Shāfi'ī] asked: If I were to tell you that the same applies to the single-individual tradition, namely that I accept it as I do in testimony but that it is different with regard to the number [of witnesses], would that [not] constitute a strong argument against you? § 386

400. He replied: I have held my opinion concerning the variation in the [minimum] number of witnesses required in testimony on the strength of narrative and inductive reasoning.

401. [Shāfi'ī] said: Likewise, what I have held concerning the acceptance of the single-individual tradition is based on narrative and reasoning.

402. [Shāfi'ī] said: Do you maintain that if you did not accept the testimony of women in [a case concerning] child-birth that you would not accept it in [a case involving] property?

¹⁰ "Yes" in the Arabic text (implying approval that the remaining witnesses should not be scourged).

403. He replied: [I should act] according to precedent [i. e., the practice followed by Muslims].

404. [Shāfi'ī] said: What would you do if someone told you that the Qur'ān does not stipulate [that there can be] less than one male and two female [witnesses]? § 387

405. He replied: Nothing is stipulated against accepting less than that [number], so we have accepted what the Muslims have permitted, which is not contrary to the Qur'ān.

406. [Shāfi'ī] said: We have held the same opinion concerning the confirmation of the single-individual tradition, based on reasons all of which are stronger than that permitting the testimony of women.

407. He asked: Is there anything other than precedent that could justify a distinction between tradition and testimony?

408. [Shāfi'ī] replied: Yes, and I know of no scholar who does not accept it. § 388-y

409. He asked: What is it?

410. [Shāfi'ī] replied: It is [the witness of] just character, whose testimony is acceptable in certain circumstances and unacceptable in others.

411. He asked: In what circumstances is his testimony unacceptable?

412. [Shāfi'ī] replied: [The circumstances are] when he testifies in cases in which his personal interests are principally involved, as when he defends himself against a certain debt, when he testifies in cases involving his son or his father or when he uses the testimony to defend them, and [finally] in any other circumstance liable to arouse suspicion. § 389

Furthermore, in a matter of testimony, [if] a witness testifies that a certain person is liable for a debt or a punishment, or if he testifies that a debt should be paid to a man or a punishment be inflicted on his behalf, he [the witness] is not responsible for any debt which is not concerned with his [the accuser's] debt, nor for the dishonor which befalls him. However, the witness might become more partial if his son or father were involved. But his testimony would be accepted [in the cases stated above], because there is no obvious suspicion such as there would be in the case involving himself, his son, and his father or any other situations which might give ground for suspicion.

But the one who related traditions concerning what is lawful or unlawful is not obtaining any material advantage for himself or for others nor is he defending himself or anyone else, nor is he dealing with anything that involves punishment [meted out] against anybody or on behalf of anybody. Therefore, he and the Muslims from whom he related the tradition are on equal footing, whether [the tradition] concerns lawful or unlawful acts. He is like anyone else and his status is not different in this respect; on one occasion he might be suspected and his narrative rejected; on another occasion he might be free of suspicion and his narrative accepted, just as the status of any witness may differ whether he is an ordinary or notable Muslim.

There are circumstances in which people relate information more accurately and there are [cases] in which they are more pious than others. When people are in fear during illness or travel, or are mindful [of death] under such conditions or similar ones making them alive to [the danger of] negligence, they strive to be more careful; they concentrate their thoughts more effectively and are less forgetful. In such conditions¹¹ the untruthful Muslim might become truthful and his information trustworthy. His narrative might be regarded as reliable and fully trustworthy, if not because he is pious at least because he is afraid that he might cause people to distrust a tradition that he is not trying to use to defend himself or exploit to his own advantage. Subsequently, however, he might revert to prevarication or cause people to have reservations about believing everything he has said.

Since there are certain circumstances in which the public and the untruthful might be truthful to the satisfaction of transmitters of traditions, it is more appropriate that pious and truthful men should in all circumstances be more careful than others; for they are in a position of [public] trust and they are held up as examples for the faith and they are aware of the obligation imposed on them by God to be truthful in all matters and that the traditions dealing with that which is lawful and unlawful are of the highest importance and hence above all should be beyond suspicion. Moreover, a tradition from the Apostle has given them a meaning that has never been given with regard to anyone else—namely, that the fate of him who attributes a falsehood to the Apostle shall be hell-fire.

413. Shāfi'ī said: ¹² 'Abd al-'Azīz [al-Darāwardī] has told us from Muḥammad b. 'Ajlān from 'Abd al-Wahhāb b. Bukht from 'Abd al-Wāhid al-Naṣrī from Wāthila b. al-Asqa' from the Prophet, who said:

The greatest of liars is he who ascribes to me that which I did not say, who claims to have dreamt what he did not dream, or claims that he is the son of someone other than his own father.¹³

'Abd al-'Azīz [al-Darāwardī] related from Muḥammad b. 'Amr [b. 'Alqama] from Abī Salāma [b. 'Abd al-Raḥmān] from Abū Hurayra, that the Apostle said:

He who ascribes to me what I did not say shall surely occupy his place in the fire [of hell].¹⁴

Yahya b. Sulaym related to me from 'Ubayd-Allāh b. 'Umar from Abū Bakr b. Sālim from Ibn 'Umar, that the Prophet said:

He who tells a lie about me will have a house built for him in the fire [of hell].¹⁵

'Amr b. Abī Salāma told us from 'Abd al-'Azīz b. Muḥammad from Asīd b. Abī Asīd from his mother, who said:

I asked Abū Qatāda: How is it that you do not relate [traditions] from the Apostle as other men do? 'I heard the Apostle say: He who tells a lie about me is surely seeking for himself a resting place in the fire [of hell]. The Apostle began to say this while he was wiping the ground with his hand,' replied he.¹⁶ B 54

Sufyān [b. 'Uyayna] related from Muḥammad b. 'Amr [b. 'Alqama] from Abū Salama [b. 'Abd al-Raḥmān] from Abū Hurayra, that the Apostle said:

You may relate from the children of Israel whatever you like, but whenever you relate from me you shall not relate an untruth.¹⁷ S 397

This is the most emphatic tradition ever related from the Apostle on this matter. We have relied on this as well as on other traditions in not accepting a tradition unless it is from a trustworthy transmitter and we know the trustworthiness of those who transmitted it from first to last.

414. Someone may ask: What evidence is there in this tradition for what you have stated?

415. [Shāfi'ī] replied: [Legal] knowledge teaches [us] that in no circumstance has the Prophet ordered anyone to attribute falsehood to the children of Israel or to anyone else. While he permitted the relating of traditions from the children of Israel, the ascription of falsehood to them was not permitted; he merely permitted the acceptance of traditions from one who related from them, without its being known whether he was truthful or untruthful. S 398

Nor did he permit [the acceptance of traditions] from one whose untruthfulness was known, for it is related that [the Prophet] said:

He who relates a tradition that he considers to be false is a liar.¹⁸

So whoever relates a tradition from a liar is not guiltless of falsehood because he has perceived the liar lying in his tradition, and except in a few special [cases] he relies on the trustworthiness of the informant, or his lack thereof, for guidance as to the truth or the falsity of the tradition. In the latter case he can tell whether it is true or false if the transmitter relates what cannot possibly be the case, or what is contradicted by information that is better authenticated and is more indicative of the truth.¹⁹

Since the Apostle distinguished between traditions related on his authority and traditions from the children of Israel by saying: "You may relate on my authority, but do not, etc.," [legal] knowledge instructs us²⁰ that the untruthfulness which [the Prophet] prohibited was hidden untruthfulness, namely, [that which might occur in a tradition] related from a person whose truthfulness is unknown. For since untruthfulness is prohibited in all circumstances, there is no untruthfulness greater than that which is related on the authority of the Prophet, God's peace and blessings be upon him.²¹

Authentication of the Single-Individual Tradition

416. Someone might ask:²² What is the proof for the authentication of the single-individual tradition, whether based on the text of a narrative, an indication in it, or on consensus?

417. [Shāfi'i] replied: Sufyān [b. 'Uyayna] told us from 'Abd al-Malik b. 'Umayr from 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. 'Abd-Allāh b. Mas'ūd from his father, that the Prophet said:

God will grant prosperity to His servant who hears my words, remembers them, guards them, and hands them on. Many a transmitter of law is no lawyer himself, and many may transmit law to others who are more versed in the law than they. The heart of a Muslim shall never harbor vindictive feelings against ¹⁹ See J. Schacht, Origins of Muhammadan Jurisprudence, pp. 37-38.

²⁰ Literally: "Knowledge makes it certain to us."

²² The opening statement "Shāfi'i said" is omitted.

three: sincerity in working for God; faithfulness to Muslims; and conformity to the community of believers—their call shall protect [the believers] and guard them from [the Devil's] delusion.²³ § 401

Since the Apostle has urged men to listen to his words, guard them, and hand them on, and since the man who hands them on is only one person, this indicates that the Apostle ordered that no one should transmit anything from him unless the proof were established to him to whom it was transmitted, because what is transmitted is something lawful [to be observed] or unlawful to be avoided, a punishment to be inflicted, a property to be taken or paid, and advice in matters relating to religion and worldly [life]. § 402

It also indicates that one who is not an expert in law may transmit law; he may have learned it by heart even though he is not an expert in the law.²⁴ The Apostle's order that men should follow the Muslim community is a proof that the ijmā' of the Muslims is binding.

Sufyān [b. 'Uyayna] told us from Sālim Abū al-Naḍr [client of 'Umar b. 'Ubayd-Allāh] from 'Ubayd-Allāh b. Abī Rāfi' from his father, who related that the Prophet said:

Do not let me find anyone of you who, reclining on his couch, when confronted with an order of permission or prohibition from me, says: We do not know [whether this is authentic or not]; we follow only what we find in the book of God.²⁵ § 403

Sufyān b. 'Uyayna said: Muḥammad b. al-Munkadir related to me a similar tradition from the Prophet without the names of the transmitters.

In this case the confirmation of the narrative was from the Apostle [himself] and they were informed that it was binding on them, even though they did not find any relevant text in the Book of God. This subject is discussed elsewhere in this book.²⁶

Mālik [b. Anas] told us from Zayd b. Aslam from 'Atā' b.

²⁶ See Chap. V, above.

Yasār that a man kissed his wife while fasting and became emotionally aroused. So he dispatched his wife [to the Prophet's wife] to ask her opinion about the matter. She found Umm Salama, Mother of the believers [and wife of the Prophet], and told her about the matter. "The Apostle [himself] kisses when fasting," she replied. The wife returned and told her husband, who became increasingly worried and said: "We are not like the Apostle, for God may permit him [to do] what he desires!" Thereupon the wife returned to Umm Salama and found the Apostle [with her], and he inquired: "What does this woman want?" So Umm Salama told him about the matter. "Have you not told her that I do it myself?" he remarked. "I have told her, but her husband was not satisfied and said: 'We are not like the Apostle, for God permits him [to do] what he desires,'" she answered. The Apostle became angry and said: "By God, I am more fearful of God than you and better informed regarding punishments!"²⁷ I have heard someone who gave the names of all the transmitters of this tradition, but I do not remember the names.

418. Shāfi'i said: In the Prophet's reply to Umm Salama, in which he said: "Have you not told her, etc.," an indication that Umm Salama's narrative from him [is of the category of traditions] which may be accepted, for the Prophet would not have ordered her to repeat what he had said, provided what she said contains a valid argument. The same would be true of the wife [of the man in question] if he considered her truthful.

Mālik [b. Anas] told us from 'Abd-Allāh b. Dinār from Ibn 'Umar, who said:

When men were performing the dawn prayer at [the mosque] of Qubā', a messenger arrived and said: A Quranic communication was revealed to the Apostle last night ordering him to face the qibla [of the Ka'ba]. So whereas they had been facing al-Shām [Syria], they [immediately] turned around toward the Ka'ba.²⁸

²⁷ Mālik, Vol. I, pp. 291-92; cf. Bukhārī, Vol. I, p. 480; Muslim, Vol. VII, pp. 215-20. Mālik, however, did not approve of kissing while fasting (al-Muwatṭa', Vol. I, p. 293).

²⁸ See paragraph 119, above.

419. Shāfi'ī said: ²⁹ 'The men of Qubā' were among the first Muslims of the Anṣār [the Prophet's supporters in Madīna] and were versed in the law and they used to face the qibla which God had ordered them to face. They would not have abandoned God's [previous] command concerning the qibla if the obligation to do so had not been established upon them, for they had neither contacted the Apostle nor had they heard [from him] what God had revealed concerning the change of the qibla; so they faced the qibla in accordance with the [new text of the] Book of God or the [new] sunna of the Prophet as they heard it from the Apostle, and not according to a tradition related by the public; they felt they were obligated to change the qibla on the authority of one transmitter only since he was considered by them a truthful person, and abandoned it because he told them that the Prophet had changed the qibla. [Surely] they would not have accepted this on the authority of one individual unless they had known that the proof is established if the person who relates the narrative is truthful. They would not have made such a great innovation as this in the religion [of Islam] unless they had to do so. Nor would they have failed to inform the Apostle of what they had done.

If the information they had accepted from a single individual, related from the Apostle, concerning the shifting of the qibla—which was obligatory—were [not] permissible, the Apostle would have said to them: "You were facing a [certain] qibla, and it was not up to you to abandon it unless the proof for it were established through what you heard from me, from the public, or from more than one person [on my authority]."

Mālik [b. Anas] told us from Ishāq b. 'Abd-Allāh b. Abi Ṭalḥa from Anas b. Mālik, who said:

S 408

When I was serving a drink made of grape-juice and dates to Abū Ṭalḥa, Abū 'Ubayda b. al-Jarrāḥ, and Ubayy b. Ka'b, a messenger arrived saying: 'Wine has just been forbidden.' Thereupon Abū Ṭalḥa said: 'Come, Anas, break these jars!' So Anas took a mortar that we had and struck the jars with the bottom of it until they broke.³⁰

420. Shāfi'ī said: ³¹ These men were closely connected with the Prophet in knowledge and position, and the Prophet's companions occupied a position of prominence that is not denied by any learned man. The drink of which they were partaking was lawful to them, but when a single person came and informed them that wine had been declared unlawful, Ṭallḥa, the owner of the jars, ordered that they should be broken. Neither he nor the others said that they would consider the wine lawful until they should see the Apostle, who was near by, or until they should learn about it through public channels. Otherwise they would not have wasted something lawful by pouring it out when they were not wasteful people. For they would have asked the Apostle what they should do, if they felt they were not bound to accept a single-individual tradition, and the Apostle himself would have prohibited its acceptance.

The Apostle ordered Unays to go to a certain man's wife who was said to have committed adultery and ordered him to stone her if she confessed. She confessed, whereupon Unay; stoned her to death.³² This tradition has been related by Mālik [b. Anas] and Sufyān b. 'Uyayna from al-Zuhri from 'Ubayn-Allāh b. 'Abd-Allāh from Abū Hurayra and Zayd b. Khālīd [al-Juhānī] from the Prophet. Sufyān added Shibl [b. Mi'bad] to the list of transmitters after Abū Hurayra and Zayd b. Khālīd.

S 410

'Abd al-'Azīz [al-Darāwardī] told us from Yazīd b. al-Hādī from 'Abd-Allāh b. Abī Salama from 'Amr b. Sulaym al-Zuraqī from his mother, who said:

S 411

When we were at Mina, 'Alī b. Abī Ṭālib arrived on a camel and declared that the Apostle of God said: 'These are days [in which

The Apostle would not have sent a single truthful person with his order of prohibition if that person's veracity and the words he reported from the Prophet were not acceptable without question to those who were the recipients of the Prophet's prohibition. Furthermore, there were pilgrims with the Apostle, and he would have been able either to go and speak to those [who were drinking the wine] himself or to send a number of men [on the mission], but he sent only one man whose veracity they knew. For he would not have sent any emissary to them unless the latter possessed [convincing] proof that bound them to accept his words as being those of the Apostle. S 412

If such was the situation with the Prophet's, as I have said, having been in a position to send to them several men [instead of one], it would be most appropriate for those who came after him and who were not in a position to do what [the recipients of the Prophet's instruction] could have done or what the Prophet could have done with regard to them, to use the same procedure in establishing the truth of the narrative of a single veracious man.

Sufyān [b. 'Uyayna] told us from 'Amr b. Dīnār from 'Amr b. 'Abd-Allāh b. Šafwān [al-Jumahī] from one of his uncles, Yazīd b. Shaybān, who said:

When we were standing at a certain place at 'Arafa, while 'Amr [b. 'Abd-Allāh] was at a great distance from the Imām, Ibn Mīrba' al-Anṣārī arrived and said to us: 'I am the messenger of the Apostle of God to you; he orders you to stand [in reverence] at the places of devotion of yours, because they are part of the heritage of your father Abraham.'³⁴ S 413

The Apostle sent Abū Bakr in command of the pilgrimage in the year 9 [A. D. 631]. Many pilgrims came from various countries and diverse peoples, and Abū Bakr led the religious rites and instructed them, on behalf of the Apostle, in their rights and duties.³⁵ In the meantime [the Prophet] sent 'Alī b. Abī Ṭālib, who recited to the assembled pilgrims on the day of Al-Nahr some verses from the sūra of Barā'a,³⁶ enjoining some of them to equity while encouraging others and forbidding them to do certain things.³⁷

³⁴ Abū Dāwūd, Vol. II, p. 189.

8414

Both Abū Bakr and 'Alī were well-known to the people of Makka as virtuous, religious, and truthful men, and those pilgrims who did not know either one or both of them could have found someone to testify to their truthfulness and virtue. The Apostle would not have sent a lone messenger unless the latter's words bore convincing proof to him to whom the Prophet had sent the messenger.

The Prophet dispatched governors to various regions, and the names of the men and the places to which they were sent to are known to us. [For example], he sent Qays b. 'Āsim and al-Zibriqān b. Badr and [Mālik] b. Nuwayra to their own tribes, because they were known to them as truthful men.

A delegation from Baḥrayn came [to the Prophet] and became acquainted with the men around him. [The Prophet] sent [Abān b.] Sa'īd b. al-'Āṣ back with them [as governor of Baḥrayn].

[The Prophet] sent Mu'ādh b. Jabal to al-Yaman with orders to lead those who followed him against those who resisted him.³⁸ Since Mu'ādh and his status and veracity were known to them, the Prophet also ordered him to instruct them in their duties toward God and to collect the obligatory

³⁶ Sūra (Chapter) 9.

³⁸ The wording of the sentence is slightly re-arranged for clarity.

[tax] from them. So all those who were appointed [by the Prophet] as administrators [of various regions] were ordered by him to collect [the taxes] imposed by God on the people subject to their rule. None of those veracious men who were sent by [the Prophet] was ever told that he was only one individual and that he had no power to collect [the tax] until the Apostle [himself] had been heard to say it was obligatory. I do not believe that the Prophet would have sent those who were well known for their veracity in the provinces to which they were sent if, as I have stated, men such as they did not carry binding proof to those to whom they were sent.

The same applies to those men who were commanders of [the Prophet's] expeditions. He [the Prophet] sent an expedition against Mu'ta and appointed Zayd b. Hāritha [his freed slave] as its commander; "If he is killed, Ja'far shall succeed him, and if [the latter] is killed, then Ibn Rawāḥa," he said. He also sent Ibn Unays on an expedition by himself.

All of the commanders of expeditions who were sent forth [by the Prophet] were competent judges of the matters on which they were sent, for they were responsible for appealing to those who had not yet received the call [of Islam] and for fighting those who had to be fought. The same was true of every commander and expedition leader whom [the Prophet] sent forth, although he was in a position to send two, three, four or more [if he had wished].

421. Shāfi'ī said: ³⁹ On one occasion [the Prophet] sent twelve messengers simultaneously to twelve rulers, inviting them to accept Islam. Those [messengers] were sent only [to people] who either had already received the summons to Islam and who had been confronted with its arguments, or who had received [from the Prophet] letters indicating to those to whom the messengers had been sent that the letters were from the Prophet. He [the Prophet] was careful to choose well-known men both as his messengers and as his commanders. For example, he sent Dihya [b. Khalifa al-Kalbī] to the region in which he was known. For if [the person] to whom the messenger was sent had not known him, he first would have had to ascertain that he had been sent by the Prophet so as to rid himself of any doubt as to whether it was the Apostle's message, thus obliging the messenger to wait until his identity had been certified.

The Prophet's orders of permission and prohibition were continuously sent to his governors, and none failed to carry them out because the Prophet sent only messengers who were known as truthful to those to whom they were sent, and whose veracity could be certified by those on the spot. In case the recipient suspected that the letter carried by the messenger had been altered, or found that there were circumstances giving rise to a suspicion that the messenger who brought the communication had been forgetful, it was his duty to seek enlightenment regarding that which he suspected so that he could carry out the orders of the Apostle after they had been confirmed to his satisfaction.

In the same category fall the letters of the [Prophet's] successors and their governors and the Muslim's agreement that the caliph, the judge, the commander, and the imām were respectively single individuals. So they chose Abū Bakr [as caliph], and Abū Bakr designated 'Umar. 'Umar appointed a council of electors to choose one man. They selected 'Abd al-Rahmān b. 'Awf, who chose 'Uthman b. 'Affān. Thus those governors who were judges, as well as others, handed down decisions, had their decisions executed, and imposed penalties. Their decisions were carried out after them, and these decisions were narratives handed down from them.

From what I have said concerning the sunna of the Apostle and the consensus of the Muslims, there is indication of a distinction among testimony (shahāda), narrative (khabar), and a decree (ḥukm).

Do you not agree that the decision of a judge in favor of one man against another is [a similar kind of] narrative handed down by the judge on the basis of confirmed evidence or on the basis of a confession made to him by one of the parties upon whom it was executed? Since the judge is obliged to act on the basis of such a narrative according to [the best of] his knowledge, then in accordance with the interpretation of the person who transmitted the decision, he would have to declare [the matter in question] as lawful or unlawful on the basis of the testimony given with regard to it.

S 413

S 420

If a judge [other than the one in the present case] related a narrative from witnesses who testified to him against a person who was not on trial before him, or on the basis of confession of one of the parties to a dispute, [the judge in the case] is not obligated to take a decision on the basis of the evidence of the other judge, because the party was not referred to that judge, but to him [the judge in the case], or because the party was referred to another judge for trial. Then the judge [in the case] makes the decision on the basis of the testimony of one witness in addition to the other [judge], since the latter would be regarded as [only] one witness, and the testimony of one witness—whether he is a judge or any other person—is not acceptable unless his testimony is supported by that of a second witness, just as the testimony of [any] one witness is not acceptable unless supported by that of a second witness.⁴⁰

422. [Shāfi'ī said]: Sufyān [b. 'Uyayna] and 'Abd al-Wahhāb [al-Thaqafī] told us from Yaḥya b. Sa'īd from Sa'īd b. al-Musayyib that 'Umar b. al-Khaṭṭāb decreed that [the compensation] for the loss of a thumb was fifteen [camels],⁴¹ ten for the next finger, ten for the middle finger, nine for the finger next to the little finger, and six for the little finger.

423. Shāfi'ī said: Since 'Umar knew that the Prophet had fixed the compensation of the hand at fifty [camels], and since the hand consists of five fingers varying in attractiveness and usefulness, he gave each of them its proportional value based on the amount of the compensation for the hand. This was [a decision taken] on the strength of a narrative through analogical reasoning.

When, however, it was found in the letter of Āl 'Amr b.

⁴⁰ The wording of the sentence is slightly rearranged.

⁴¹ Būlāq ed., p. 58.

Ḥazm that the Prophet said: "For every finger [the compensation] shall be ten camels," they were inclined to follow it. But they did not accept the letter of Āl 'Amr until it was confirmed to them that it was from the Apostle.⁴²

There are two indications in this tradition:

First, a narrative [from the Prophet] must be accepted. Secondly, the narrative is to be accepted when it is confirmed, even though none of the imāms may ever have done anything similar to the narrative in question. This indicates also that if the action of one of the imāms subsequently were found to be contrary to a narrative of the Prophet, the imām's action must be abandoned in favor of the Apostle's narrative. It [also] indicates that a tradition from the Apostle is self-confirming and does not need to be confirmed by the action of anyone else after him. For the Muslims never said: "Umar acted differently [from the Prophet] in matters concerning the Muhājirīn⁴³ and the Anṣār."⁴⁴ Nor did you⁴⁵ or any other say anything about other men's having acted differently; they accepted traditions from the Apostle as they were bound to do and they desisted from all acts contrary to them.

Had 'Umar been aware of this tradition he would have accepted it as he had accepted other things that emanated from the Apostle, owing to his fear of God, his [readiness] to carry out his obligation to obey the order of the Apostle, his knowledge that no one else's order is on a par with that of the Apostle, and that obedience to God is obedience to the Apostle's order. § 424

424. Someone said: Give me an example indicating that 'Umar changed his practice when a tradition from the Apostle became known to him.

425. [Shāfi'ī] replied: [What will be the advantage of] my giving you one?

426. He said: Such an example will establish two rules: First, that opinion may be accepted in case there is no sunna. Secondly, that if the sunna reveals that one must do a certain thing, one must abandon what he [previously] had been doing: For one must discard all practices contrary to the sunna. One must also abandon [the idea that] the sunna is confirmed only by a narrative that has preceded it, for he should know that it is not vitiated by anything that contradicts it.⁴⁶ § 425

427. [Shāfi'ī] said: Sufyān [b. 'Uyayna] told us from al-Zuhri from Sa'id b. al-Musayyib who said: 'Umar b. al-Khaṭṭāb held that the diya should be paid by the 'āqila, and that the wife cannot inherit from the diya of her husband; but al-Ḍaḥḥāk b. Sufyān told 'Umar that the Apostle had written to him ordering him to permit the wife of Ashyam al-Dibābī to inherit the diya [of her husband]. So 'Umar changed his opinion. This tradition has been explained elsewhere.⁴⁷ § 58

Sufyān [b. 'Uyayna] told us from 'Amr b. Dinār and Ibn Ṭāwūs from Ṭāwūs that 'Umar said: Has God mentioned anything that anyone has heard from the Prophet concerning [the diya for] foeticide? Ḥamal b. Mālik b. al-Nābigha replied that he had two concubines, one of whom struck the other [who was pregnant] with a rolling pin causing a miscarriage. The Prophet ordered the payment of a ghurra or a slave [as § 426

⁴⁶ Shāfi'ī repudiates an ancient legal doctrine by virtue of which practice validates certain legal decisions even if they were contrary to traditions. See paragraph 423; and J. Schacht, Origins of Muhammadan Jurisprudence, pp. 59-60.

⁴⁷ For Shāfi'ī's discussion on this tradition see Kitāb al-Umm, Vol. VI, p. 77. For text of the tradition, see Mālik, Vol. II, p. 866; Abū Dāwūd, Vol. IV, p. 192.

the diya]. "Had I not heard this, I would have decided it differently," said 'Umar. Others related that ['Umar said]: "We almost decided this matter on [the basis of our] own opinion."⁴⁸

'Umar changed his decision on the strength of a tradition related by al-Ḍaḥḥāk that conflicted with his own decision. He declared that if he had not heard that tradition he would have arrived at a different decision and that he almost made a decision concerning foeticide on the basis of his own opinion.

428. Shāfi'i said: [Since] the sunna specified that the diya for a life is a hundred camels, the diya for foeticide should be one hundred camels if the foetus is alive, and no diya if it is dead.

When the Apostle's order was related [to 'Umar] he deferred to him and obeyed him despite his prior contradictory decision. His own decision had been taken without his having heard anything with reference to it from the Apostle, but when he learned that his action was not in accord with the Apostle's decree, he abandoned his practice in order to obey the Apostle's decree and did likewise in all other matters. It is equally incumbent upon men to act accordingly.⁴⁹ [For] Mālik [b. Anas] has told us from Ibn Shihāb from Sālim b. 'Abd-Allāh that [the Caliph] 'Umar returned before [visiting] men [in Syria] on the strength of a tradition related by 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. 'Awf. This was when he set out for Syria and then learned that a plague had broken out there.⁵⁰

⁴⁹ For further discussion on this point, see Shāfi'i's Ikhtilāf al-Ḥadith (Kitāb al-Umm, Vol. VII, pp. 20-21).

⁵⁰ In A. D. 639 the Caliph 'Umar visited the borders of Syria where he met Abū 'Ubayda, Governor of Syria, and other leading men. The Caliph was advised to return owing to the plague, when thousands of believers died, but, according to one version of the story, Abū 'Ubayda said: "What! You flee from the decree of God?" "Yes," replied 'Umar, "if we flee, it is from the decree of God unto the decree of God." At this juncture 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. 'Awf arrived and said that he had heard the Prophet saying: "When you hear of it [the plague], you should not approach the land; if you were in the land where it was, you should not leave it."

Mālik [b. Anas] told us from Ja'far b. Muḥammad [al-Ṣādiq] from his father [Muḥammad al-Bāqir] who said: Upon mentioning the Magians, 'Umar said: "I do not know what we should do with regard to them." Thereupon 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. 'Awf said: "I bear witness that I heard the Apostle of God say: 'Follow the same usage with regard to them as you do with regard to the People of the Book.'" ⁵¹

Sufyān [b. 'Uyayna] told us from 'Amr b. Dīnār that he heard Bajāla say: 'Umar did not collect the poll tax from the Magians until 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. 'Awf told him that the Prophet had ordered it to be collected from the Magians of Hajar.⁵²

429. Shāfi'ī said: All the traditions that I have cited [above] in an interrupted fashion were [originally] heard by me as uninterrupted, or are well-known traditions related by many people transmitting them from scholars who were acquainted with them through common knowledge; but I did not want to cite traditions that I had not fully memorized, nor did I have access to some of my books which I had lost [to verify them]; but I have verified the accuracy of what I memorized by checking it with the knowledge of scholars, and I have summarized it fearing that this book might become too long. I have, however, cited what might be sufficient without going into every aspect of it in an exhaustive fashion.

So 'Umar accepted the tradition of 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. 'Awf concerning the Magians and collected [the jizya] on the basis of the Quranic communication:

Of those who have been given the Book, until they pay the jizya out of hand and have been humbled [Q. IX, 29].

On the basis of the Qur'ān, which states that the unbelievers should be fought until they accept Islam, and since 'Umar never heard anything from the Prophet [regarding the Thereupon 'Umar, acting on the strength of this tradition, returned to Madīna. See Mālik, Vol. II, pp. 895-96; Muslim, Vol. XIV, pp. 205-206.

Magians] and thought that they were unbelievers and not people of the Book, he accepted the tradition of 'Abd al-Rahmān b. 'Awf and followed it.

The tradition related by Bajāla is uninterrupted; for he [Bajāla] had known 'Umar b. al-Khaṭṭāb personally and had served as a scribe to some of his provincial governors.⁵³

430. Someone might say: 'Umar might have sought for another transmitter in addition to the one who related the narrative to him.

431. [Shāfi'i said]: The answer would be: 'Umar would not ask for another transmitter [to substantiate] a tradition related to him by a man, except for one of three possible reasons:

[First,] he may have wanted to be careful; for even though the proof is verified by the narrative of a single person, the narrative of two makes it even stronger. I have known [some men] who confirmed the narrative of a single person and sought a second narrative [to confirm it]. [If] a man possesses a sunna from five [different] sources and a sixth is related to him, he writes it down. For the more numerous the authorities of a tradition and the better known, the better it is authenticated and the more satisfactory to him who hears it. And I have known certain judges who, although two or three witnesses were confirmed to them as witnesses of just character, asked the person on whose behalf the testimony was given to produce more witnesses. By this they sought to satisfy themselves more fully. If the party on whose behalf the testimony was given did not produce more than two witnesses, the decision would have been given in his favor.

[Secondly,] it is possible that the transmitter might not have been known [to 'Umar], so he would suspend judgment until another transmitter whom he knew confirmed it. Likewise, [a tradition] related from an unknown person, is not acceptable. A tradition is acceptable only from someone known to be qualified.

⁵³ Shāfi'i cited this tradition in Kitāb al-Umm, Vol. VI, p. 96, on the authority of Sufyān b. 'Uyayna. See also Abū Dāwūd, Vol. III, pp. 168-69; Ibn Hanbal, Vol. III, p. 141, no. 1685; Abū 'Ubayd b. Sallām, Kitāb al-Amwāl, ed. Muh. Hamid al-Fiqqī (Cairo, 1353/1935), pp. 31-32.

[Thirdly,] it is possible that the information related to 'Umar by the transmitter was unacceptable to him; in this case he would reject the narrative until he could find someone else whose word was acceptable.

432. Someone might ask: In your opinion, which of these reasons motivated 'Umar?

B 59

433. [Shāfi'ī] replied: According to the tradition related by Abū Mūsa, it was caution, for he regarded Abū Mūsa as a trusted authority.

434. If he says: What is your evidence?

We reply: Abū Mūsa's tradition was transmitted by Mālik b. Anas from Rabī'a from more than one of their authorities. 'Umar, however, said to Abū Mūsa: "I did not suspect you; I was merely afraid that people might attribute something to the Apostle that he did not say."⁴⁴

435. Should he ask: Is this [not] an interrupted [tradition]?

436. [Shāfi'ī replied]: This is a well-authenticated tradition.⁴⁵ For it is not permissible for an imām of the religion, whether 'Umar or anyone else, to accept the tradition of a single individual on one occasion, when he is satisfied that it is well authenticated, and reject it on another. This is never permissible for an intelligent scholar, just as it is not permissible for a judge to take a decision on the basis of [the testimony of] two witnesses on one occasion and reject them on another, unless they have been proved wrong on grounds disqualifying them or because of his ignorance of their just character. For 'Umar was an extremely knowing, intelligent, trustworthy, and meritorious man. In the Book of God is an evidence for what I have discussed; God said:

S 435

⁴⁴ Mālik, Vol. II, p. 964; Bukhārī, Vol. II, p. 8; Muslim, Vol. XIV, pp. 130-33; Abū Dāwūd, Vol. IV, pp. 345-46.

⁴⁵ Shāfi'ī did not answer the interlocutor's question directly. He had already pointed out in paragraph 429 that although some of the traditions he cited were lacking the names of transmitters, he had either heard them with the full chain of transmitters or they were well-authenticated traditions.

And He said:

We did indeed send Noah to his people [Q. XI, 27; XXIII, 23; XXIX, 13].

And He said:

We revealed to Abraham and Ishmael [Q. IV, 161].

And He said:

And to 'Ad [we sent] their brother Hūd [Q. VII, 63; XI, 52].

And He said:

And to Thamūd [we sent] their brother Šālih [Q. VII, 71; XI, 64].

And He said:

And to Midian [we sent] their brother Shu'ayb [Q. VII, 83; XI, 85; XXIX, 35]

And He said:

The people of Lot gave the lie to those who were sent to them. When their brother Lot said to them: 'Will you not fear God? I am for you a faithful apostle. So fear God and obey me' [Q. XXVI, 160-163].

And to His Apostle Muḥammad, God's blessings and peace be upon him, He said:

Verily, we have revealed to thee as We have revealed to Noah and the prophets after him [Q. IV, 161].

And He said:

Muḥammad is only an apostle; apostles have passed away before him [Q. III, 138]. 8436

So [God] has given proof to His creatures through His prophets, who were distinguished by certain signs from others, and the proof was clear to those who witnessed the actions of the prophets and the indications which distinguished them from others as well as from those who came after them. One of them is as good as more than one, since the proof is established by one just as well as by more than one. For [God] said:

Coin a parable for them: the people of a town when the envoys came to it; when we sent to them two, and they called them liars; so we sent a third as reinforcement and they said: 'To you we are envoys.' They said: 'You are only human beings like ourselves, and the Merciful has not sent down anything; you are only speaking falsely' [Q. XXXVI, 12-14].

437. Shāfi'ī said: Thus God established the proof to them by sending two and later a third [prophet]; likewise He established it for various people by sending one, for the confirmation [of the proof by more than one] does not mean that it cannot be established by one only, if God endows him with that which distinguishes him from those who are not prophets.

438. Shāfi'ī said: ⁵⁶ Mālik [b. Anas] told us from Sa'd b. Ishāq b. Ka'b b. 'Ujra from his paternal aunt Zaynab, daughter of Ka'b, who said that al-Furay'a, daughter of Mālik b. Sinān, had told her that she [al-Furay'a] went to the Prophet requesting him to let her return to her family among the Banū Khudra,⁵⁷ since her husband, who had gone forth looking for some slaves of his, had been killed by them when he met them near al-Qaddūm.⁵⁸ "I requested the Apostle to let me return to my family since my husband left no house of his own for me to live in," she said. "Yes [you may return]," replied the Apostle. So I left, but he called me back when I was either in [my] chamber or in the Mosque, and said: "What did you say?" So I repeated the story of what had appeared to my husband. "Stay in your house until the end of the period stipulated in the Book," said the Prophet. "So I passed the period of the 'idda, four months and ten days," she said. When 'Uthmān became caliph, he sent for me and inquired about this [tradition], and I related it to him. He followed it and took decisions on the strength of it.⁵⁹ Thus 'Uthmān, who was an imām and a man of knowledge and virtue, settled disputes between the Anṣār and Muhājirīn on the strength of a tradition related by a woman.

Muslim [b. Khālid] told us from Ibn Jurayj from al-Ḥasan b. Muslim [b. Yannāq] from Ṭāwūs, who said: I was with Ibn 'Abbās when Zayd b. Thābit said to him: "Would you rule that a woman [who has begun to] menstruate should return from the pilgrimage before visiting the Sacred House?" "It is not for me to say so," replied Ibn 'Abbās, "ask so-and-so, the woman from the Anṣār, whether the Prophet ordered her to do so." Zayd b. Thābit went away laughing and said: "I must say that what you said is right."⁶⁰

439. Shāfi'ī said: Zayd had heard an order of prohibition [from the Prophet] against a pilgrim's returning from the pilgrimage before visiting the Sacred House, and thought that it included the menstruating woman. When Ibn 'Abbās ruled that she could return if she had visited the House after the Day of Sacrifice (al-Nahr), Zayd took exception to it, but when Ibn 'Abbās related to him a tradition from a woman who was ordered to do so by the Apostle—and when the woman was asked, she confirmed the tradition—he believed the woman and saw that the right thing for him to do was to cease differing with Ibn 'Abbās. But Ibn 'Abbās had no other proof than the woman's narrative.⁶¹

440. [Shāfi'ī said]: Sufyān [b. 'Uyayna] told us from 'Amr [b. Dīnār] from Sa'īd b. Jubayr, who said: I have told Ibn 'Abbās that Nawf al-Bikālī claims that Mūsa, the companion of al-Khiḍr, is not the Mūsa of the children of Israel. "The enemy of God had told a lie," replied Ibn 'Abbās, for Ubayy b. Ka'b told me that the Apostle in speaking to him once mentioned the story of Mūsa and al-Khiḍr in such a way as to indicate that the Mūsa of the children of Israel was the Mūsa who was associated with al-Khiḍr.⁶²

Thus Ibn 'Abbās, pious and versed in the law as he was, accepted the authenticity of a tradition related by Ubayy b. Ka'b from the Apostle as a proof against the opinion of a certain Muslim. Ubayy b. B 60

Muslim [b. Khālid al-Zanjī] and 'Abd al-Majīd told us from Ibn Jurayj [from 'Āmir b. Muṣ'ab] that Ṭāwūs told him that he asked Ibn 'Abbās about the two cycles (rak'atayn) after the 'aṣr prayer, and Ibn 'Abbās forbade him to perform them. "I replied: I was not going to abandon them," said Ṭāwūs. Thereupon Ibn 'Abbās, [quoting the Qur'ān], said:

It is not for any believer, man or woman, when God and his Apostle have decreed a matter, to have a choice in any matter affecting him. Whoever disobeys God and His Apostle has gone astray into manifest error [Q. XXXIII, 36].⁶³ S 443

Ibn 'Abbās was of the opinion that the proof against Ṭāwūs was established by his tradition from the Prophet and by his indicating through a citation from the Book of God that both sources deprived Ṭāwūs of any choice in a matter that had been decided by God and His Apostle. Although Ṭāwūs knew of the decision of the Apostle from a tradition related only by Ibn 'Abbās, he did not reject it and tell [Ibn 'Abbās]: "This is a tradition related by you alone. I do not consider that it is established as being from the Prophet, since it is possible that you have forgotten something with regard to it."

441. Someone might say: Would [Ṭāwūs] not hesitate to say such a thing to Ibn 'Abbās?

442. [Shāfi'ī replied]: Ibn 'Abbās was above being afraid to tell anyone the truth as he saw it. For he forbade [Ṭāwūs] to perform the two cycles after the 'aṣr prayer and told him S 444 not to perform them before informing him that the Prophet had prohibited them.

443. [Shāfi'ī said]: Sufyān [b. 'Uyayna] told us from 'Amr [b. Dīnār] from Ibn 'Umar, who said: "We used to practice mukhābara⁶⁴ (share-cropping), seeing no harm in it until Rāfi' b. Khadīj claimed that the Apostle had prohibited it. So we gave it up because of what [Rāfi'] had said."⁶⁵

Thus Ibn 'Umar, who was profiting from mukhābara and regarded it as lawful, did not continue to practise it after a tradition was related to him by a trusted transmitter that the Apostle had prohibited it. Furthermore, he did not use his own judgment regarding what was related from the Apostle and say: "Nobody has so far reproached us for this, and we have been practising it till now." This clearly indicates that something that was practised after the Prophet's death and was not supported by a tradition from the Prophet does not vitiate a narrative from the Prophet.⁶⁶

444. [Shāfi'ī said]: Mālik [b. Anas] told us from Zayd b. Aslam from 'Aṭā' b. Yasār that Mu'āwiya b. Abī Sufyān once sold [either] a gold or a silver drinking cup for more than [the value of] its weight. "I heard the Apostle prohibit that kind [of thing]," said Abū al-Dardā' to him. "I do not see any harm in it," said Mu'āwiya. "Who will support me against Mu'āwiya?" asked Abū al-Dardā'. "I relate to him [a tradition] from the Apostle, and he gives me his own opinion. I cannot live in the same land with you [Mu'āwiya]."⁶⁷ Thus Abū al-Dardā' was of the opinion that the proof against Mu'āwiya was established by a narrative related to him; but when Mu'āwiya did not agree with him, he departed from the land in which he had been to save his self-respect, since Mu'āwiya had rejected a narrative related by a reliable source from the Prophet.

445. [Shāfi'i] said: We have been told that Abū Sa'īd al-Khudrī met a man to whom he related something from the Apostle; the man, however, related another narrative contradictory to it. "By God, may I never be [again] with you under the same roof," said Abū Sa'īd.

446. Shāfi'i said: The transmitter [Abū Sa'īd] was chagrined because [the other man] did not accept the tradition he related from the Prophet, but quoted another contradictory to it. However, there were two aspects of the latter's tradition; one of them may have conflicted with Abū Sa'īd's tradition and the other not.

447. Shāfi'i said: "I was told by one whom I do not suspect [Ibrāhīm b. Abī Yaḥya] "9 from Ibn Abī Dhi'b from Makhḥad b. Khufāf, who said:

I bought a slave whom I employed, but later I discovered a certain defect in him. So I took the case before [the Caliph] 'Umar b. 'Abd al-'Azīz, who made a decision in my favor that I could return the slave but decided against me that I should return the profit [I made on him]. When I called on 'Urwa b. al-Zubayr and told him about the matter, he said: I shall go to [the Caliph] this evening and tell him that 'Ā'isha related to me a tradition that the Apostle decreed that 'the profit belongs to him who bears the responsibility.' So I hastened to 'Umar and I told him what 'Urwa had related to me, on the authority of 'Ā'isha, from the Prophet. 'What a hasty decision I have taken! God knows that I sought nothing but what was right. Now that you have informed me of a sunna of the Apostle concerning this matter, I shall revoke the decision of 'Umar and carry out the sunna of the Apostle of God,' said 'Umar. When 'Urwa called on 'Umar [to whom he related 'Ā'isha's tradition], 'Umar decided that I should take the profit from the man in whose favor the [earlier] decision was taken."⁹

I was told by an authority from Madīna [Ibrāhīm b. Abī Yaḥya], whose truthfulness I do not suspect, from Ibn Abī Dhi'b, who said:

Sa'd b. Ibrāhīm took a decision against a certain man on the strength of an opinion of Rabī'a b. Abī 'Abd al-Raḥmān, whereupon I related to him [a tradition] from the Prophet that was contradictory to his decision. So Sa'd said to Rabī'a: "Here is Ibn Abī Dhi'b, a trustworthy authority in my opinion, who related a tradition from the Prophet that is contradictory to what I have just decided." "You have exercised ijtihād (personal reasoning), and your decision has been given," replied Rabī'a. "How strange! Shall I carry out the decision of Sa'd, son of Umm Sa'd⁷¹ and reject the order of the Apostle of God?" said Sa'd. "No," he added, "I shall reject the decision of Sa'd, son of Umm Sa'd, and carry out the order of the Apostle of God." So he called for the written decision, tore it up, and made a decision in favor of the one against whom he had made the decision.

448. Shāfi'i said: Abū Ḥanīfa b. Simāk b. al-Faḍl al-Shihābī told us from Ibn Abī Dhi'b from al-Maqburī from Abū Shurayḥ al-Ka'bī that the Prophet, in the year of the conquest [of Makka], said:

and ending with him and agree that they may be used as the basis of fatwas. Each one of these [transmitters] has accepted the tradition from a preceding transmitter and from him it was accepted by a succeeding transmitter.

If it is permissible for anyone to hold the view of the specialists' knowledge that the Muslims, ancient and contemporary, are agreed in accepting the authenticity of the single-individual tradition and its binding [force], since no Muslim jurist is known who did not do likewise, it would be permissible for me to say so also. But I can add that none of the Muslim jurists have told me that they differ over the authentication of the single-individual tradition, since they were all in agreement, as I have already pointed out.⁷⁶

451. [Shāfi'ī] said: 'If it could be supposed that one person might say that a certain tradition was related from the Prophet in one way, while another person might say something contradicting that tradition, then in my opinion it would not be permissible for a scholar [to insist that] the tradition of a single person be confirmed by many and use it to declare things lawful and unlawful while he rejects others similar to it, unless he possesses a tradition that contradicts it. For he considers that which he has heard and those who heard it from [the single transmitter] as more trustworthy than those who told him something different from it. Or he who transmitted might not have been a memorizer; or he might consider him suspect; or he might suspect one of the previous transmitters; or the tradition might be ambiguous and he might accept one interpretation in preference to the other. But one should not imagine that an intelligent jurist could on one or more occasion accept the authenticity of a sunna on the strength of a single-individual narrative and then discard the same in favor of a narrative similar to or more reliable than the previous one, except for one of those causes that might cast doubt upon the interpretation of it (as in the case of the commentators on the Qur'ān) or because he either suspects the transmitter, or is aware of a narrative contradictory to it.

452. Someone might say: Few are the jurists anywhere who have not related many traditions acceptable to them while they have related [only] a few that were unacceptable.

453. [Shāfi'ī replied]: It is not permissible [for a jurist] to reject a tradition save for one of the reasons I have discussed, or because he is relating from one of the successors or from someone from a succeeding generation a saying that he is not bound to accept. He relates it only as information and does not vouch for it; he may or may not accept it. If he does not follow any of these courses, he would commit a great error which would be inexcusable, although failure to follow some of them might be forgiven.

454. Someone might ask: Has your term "proof" different meanings?

455. [Shāfi'ī] replied: Yes, it has; God willing.

456. He asked: What are they?

457. [Shāfi'ī] replied: No one shall be excused for discarding something [that is supported by] a clear text of the Book or a generally accepted sunna, for there is no doubt concerning either one of them, and he who refuses to accept either one must ask forgiveness.

But if a sunna were derived from a narrative handed down by a few [persons] but there is disagreement concerning it because the narrative is open to different interpretations and came [originally] from a single source, then any argument regarding it would be that it should be binding on those who are informed about it. For they cannot reject it as long as there is a text to support it, just as they are bound to accept the testimony of witnesses of just character, since [such knowledge] is as certain as the text of the Book [of God] or a narrative well known to the public. So if someone were to cast doubt upon it, we should not tell him to repent. Instead, we should tell him that if he is a learned man he should not doubt, just as one should take a decision only on the strength of the testimony of witnesses of just character, even though they are liable to err, for one is bound to take decisions in this regard on the basis of the apparent truthfulness [of the witnesses], since only God knows those things about them that are hidden from a person.

458. He asked: Can an interrupted tradition be used as an argument by him who knows about it? Are such interrupted traditions different from others, or are they on the same level?

459. Shāfi'ī replied: Interrupted traditions vary. A tradition related by one of the successors who saw one of the Apostle's companions but did not carry the tradition back to the Prophet should be scrutinized from various angles:

[First,] one should examine the transmission of the tradition. If the transmitter is supported by trustworthy memorizers of traditions who have related from the Apostle traditions of similar meaning, this would be an indication of the soundness of those who passed on the tradition.

[Secondly,] if he were the only one to relate a tradition and no other was found to support him with a similar one, the tradition related by one individual should be accepted.

[Thirdly,] it should be considered whether he is supported by any other transmitter whose traditions were accepted by others but who did not belong to that group of men from whom he accepted his traditions. If such is found [to be the case], it would be an indication supporting the transmitter of the tradition, although [such an indication] would be weaker than the former one. In case such an indication is not found, the information related from the Apostle by some of his Companions should be examined. If they are found to be in agreement with [other] traditions from the Apostle, its transmitter took [his information] only from a sound source.

Furthermore, if scholars in general are found to have given rulings consistent with a tradition said to have been related from the Prophet, and if the transmitter cites as his authorities persons who were neither unknown nor objectionable, it is indicative of the soundness of what was related from the transmitter, since such authorities constitute a proof of reliability.

If [a transmitter] seeks the opinion of a memorizer regarding a tradition that the latter has never contradicted, and if the memorizer contradicts it but his tradition is found to be defective, it is an indication of the soundness of the person who gave out the transmitter's tradition. If the opposite of what I have described happens, then the [transmitter's] tradition is adversely affected and no one can accept it. But ⁷⁷ if certain indications [in favor] of the soundness of his tradition are found by the means I have described, we should prefer to accept his tradition.

We cannot, however, claim that the proof [for the interrupted tradition] would be as good as that of an uninterrupted [tradition]. The reason is that the interrupted tradition has something lacking, though it may have been related from a person who, if his name had been known, might prove to be acceptable. But some interrupted [traditions]—even if similar interrupted traditions agree with them—might have been related from the same source, which if known might prove to be unacceptable. If the narrator is stating his own opinion [regarding the soundness of the tradition], even if some of the companions of the Prophet agree with him, it is not a strong indication of the soundness of the source of the tradition; for it is possible that [the transmitter] might have mistakenly thought that some of the companions were agreeing with him just as he might have mistakenly thought that some of the jurists agreed with him.⁷⁸

But as for those who came after the leading Successors who so often saw some of the Companions of the Apostle, I do not know a single one of them whose transmission would be acceptable for various reasons. The reasons for that are: First, they were not so particular as to those from whom they related traditions. Secondly, there are certain indications in that which they transmitted that betray weakness in the source of their transmission. Thirdly, there are many variations [in their traditions], and this raises the possibility of misunderstanding and lack of reliability on the part of him from whom it was received. S 465

⁷⁷ "Shāfi'ī said" is omitted.

⁷⁸ Cf. Ibn Hāzīm, Vol. II, pp. 2-6.

460. Shāfi'ī said: ⁷⁹ My experience with certain scholars indicates that there are groups with [two] opposite tendencies: Some are satisfied with meager knowledge and want to derive knowledge from only one source, neglecting similar or more reliable ones. These are the ones who are lacking in knowledge. Others, who have criticized this approach and aspired to a broader and thorough knowledge [of tradition], have been driven by this [desire] to accept traditions from transmitters from whom it would have been better not to accept. I have noticed that most of them are inclined to be unreliable, because they accept [traditions] from the same transmitters whose similar and better traditions they have rejected. They accept traditions that are interpolated, as well as those from unreliable sources if they agree with their opinions, while they reject traditions from reliable transmitters if they happen to contradict their opinions.

Interpolations reach some of these people from various sources. He who scrutinizes the knowledge [of traditions] with competence and care is shocked by the [number of] interrupted traditions from those who are not well-known Successors, as shown from certain indications explicit in them. S 466

461. He asked: Why do you distinguish between well-known early Successors who knew [many of the] Companions of the Apostle and those who knew only some of them?

462. [Shāfi'ī] replied: Because it was quite impossible for those who had never met most of the Companions to relate traditions from them.

463. He asked: Why do you not accept an interrupted tradition from them or from any of the jurists who came after them?

464. [Shāfi'ī] replied: For [the reasons] that I have already described.

⁷⁹ Būlāq ed., p. 64.

465. He asked: Is there any interrupted tradition from the Apostle that was transmitted by a reliable person but not accepted by any of the jurists?

466. [Shāfi'ī] replied: Yes. For Sufyān [b. 'Uyayna] has told us from Muḥammad b. al-Munkadir, who said: A man asked the Prophet: "O Apostle of God! I have my own family and property, and my father has his own family and property; yet he wants to take my property and use it to feed his family." "You and your property belong to your father," replied the Apostle of God.⁶⁰

467. He said: We do not accept this tradition; but some of your followers accept it.

468. [Shāfi'ī] said: No, [we do not accept this tradition] for he who accepts it will give [the right to] the rich father to take the property of his son.

469. He asked: That is right; nobody accepts it. But why do people dispute it?

470. [Shāfi'ī] replied: Because it is not established that it is from the Prophet. For when God decreed that a father can inherit from his son as others, he put him on the same basis as other heirs. He might also receive a smaller share than many other heirs—an indication that the son owns his property independently of the father.

471. He asked: Is Muḥammad b. al-Munkadir extremely reliable in your opinion?

472. [Shāfi'ī] replied: Yes, he is, for he is distinguished in matters of religion and piety; but we do not know from whom he accepted this tradition. [You will recall that] I have explained to you the case in which two witnesses of just character testify concerning two men,⁶¹ and how their testimony could not be accepted until their just character had been confirmed either by the two men in question or by others.

473. He asked: Will you give a tradition [in support of this opinion]?

474. [Shāfi'ī] replied: Yes. The trusted authority [Yaḥya b.

⁶⁰ Cf. Ibn Ḥanbal, Vol. X, p. 206; Suyūṭī, al-Jāmi' al-Ṣaḡīr, Vol. I, p. 365.

⁶¹ Būlāq ed., p. 64.

Ḥassān] told us from Ibn Abī Dhī'b from Ibn Shihāb, who said: "The Apostle ordered a man who laughed during the performance of prayer to repeat both the ablution and the prayer." We did not accept this tradition because it is interrupted. Then the trusted authority [also] related the same tradition from Ma'mar from Ibn Shihāb from Sulaymān b. Arqam from al-Ḥasan from the Prophet. We consider Ibn Shihāb to be an authority on traditions and expert in the choice of reliable transmitters; he names some of the Companions of the Prophet and prominent Successors, and we know of no transmitter who can relate from men more reliable or better known than those from whom Ibn Shihāb relates.

475. He said: We think it strange that he related from Sulaymān b. Arqam.

476. [Shāfi'ī replied]: [Perhaps] he did so because he thought that [Arqam] was a man of virtue, knowledge, and reason. So he accepted traditions from him and had good opinion of him, but failed to mention his name, either because Arqam was younger than he, or for some other [reason]. But when Ma'mar asked [Ibn Shihāb] who related the tradition, he gave him as his authority. Thus though it is possible that Ibn Shihāb may have related a tradition from Sulayman b. Arqam [the tradition should be accepted] in view of what I have said [in praise of] Ibn Shihāb; but other [transmitters] should not be trusted in similar cases.

477. He asked: Is there any sunna of the Apostle established by an interrupted chain of transmitters which everybody has refused to accept.

478. [Shāfi'ī] replied: No; sometimes we do find people disagreeing about it among themselves, some accepting it and others not. However, we have never found people agreeing in opposition to a well-authenticated sunna as we have found them to do in the case of an interrupted tradition from the Apostle.⁵²

⁵² Būlāq ed., p. 65. For further discussion, see Shāfi'ī, Kitāb Ikhtilāf al-Ḥadīth (Kitāb al-Umm, Vol. VII, p. 338); and J. Schacht, Origins of Muhammadan Jurisprudence, p. 11.

479. Shāfi'ī said: I [also] pointed out [to the interlocutor]: You have asked for the proof on the basis of which an interrupted tradition is rejected and you have rejected such a tradition; but you have gone too far in rejecting a well-authenticated tradition which, in our opinion, you are under an obligation to accept.

Chapter XI

[ON CONSENSUS (IJMĀ')] ¹

480. Shāfi'ī said: Someone has asked me: I have understood your doctrine concerning God's commands and His Apostle's orders that he who obeys God obeys His Apostle, [for] God has imposed [on men] the duty of obeying His Apostle, and that the proof for what you held has been established that it would be unlawful for a Muslim who has known the Book [of God] and the sunna [of the Prophet] to give an opinion at variance with either one, for I know that this [i. e. acceptance of the Book and the sunna] is a duty imposed by God. But what is your proof for accepting the consensus of the public [on matters] concerning which no explicit command of God nor any [sunna] related on the authority of the Prophet is to be found? Do you assert, with others, that the consensus of the public should always be based on an established sunna even if it were not related [on the authority of the Prophet]?

481. [Shāfi'ī] replied: That on which the public are agreed and which, as they assert, was related from the Apostle, that is so. As to that which the public do not relate [from the Prophet], which they may or may not relate as a tradition from the Prophet, we cannot consider it as related on the authority of the Prophet—because one may relate only what he has heard, for no one is permitted to relate [on the authority of the Prophet] information which may or may not be true. So we accept the decision of the public because we have to obey their authority, and we know that wherever there are sunnas of the Prophet, the public cannot be ignorant of them, although it is possible that some are, and we know that the public can neither agree on anything contrary to the sunna of the Prophet nor on an error.

482. Someone may ask: Is there any evidence in support of what you hold?

483. [Shāfi'ī] replied: Sufyān [b. 'Uyayna] told us from 'Abd al-Malik b. 'Umayr from 'Abd al-Rahmān b. 'Abd-Allāh b. Mas'ūd from his father, who said: The Apostle said:

God will grant prosperity to His servant who hears my words, remembers them, guards them, and hands them on. Many a transmitter of law is no lawyer himself, and many may transmit law to others who are more versed in the law than they, etc.²

And Sufyān [also] told us from 'Abd-Allāh b. Abī Labīd from 'Abd-Allāh b. Sulaymān b. Yasār from his father, who said: 'Umar b. al-Khaṭṭāb made a speech at al-Jābiya in which he said: The Apostle of God stood among us by an order from God, as I am now standing among you, and said:

Believe my Companions, then those who succeed them [the Successors], and after that those who succeed the Successors; but after them untruthfulness will prevail when people will swear [in support of their saying] without having been asked to swear, and will testify without having been asked to testify. Only those who seek the pleasure of Paradise will follow the community, for the devil can pursue one person, but stands far away from two. Let no man be alone with a woman, for the devil will be the third among them. He who is happy with his right [behavior], or unhappy with his wrong behavior, is a [true] believer.³

§ 474

² Only the first three words of this tradition are cited, because Shāfi'ī considered it quite unnecessary to repeat a text which he has already given in full in paragraph 417 above. It is reproduced in full in the Būlāq edition, p. 65.

³ In the year 638 the Caliph 'Umar went to al-Jābiya, a village on the 484. He asked: What is the meaning of the Prophet's order to follow the community?

485. [Shāfi'ī] replied: There is but one meaning for it.

486. He asked: How is it possible that there is only one meaning?

487. [Shāfi'ī] replied: When the community spread in the lands [of Islam], nobody was able to follow its members who had been dispersed and mixed with other believers and unbelievers, pious and impious. So it was meaningless to follow the community [as a whole],⁴ because it was impossible [to do so], except for what the [entire] community regarded as lawful or unlawful [orders] and [the duty] to obey these [orders].

He who holds what the Muslim community holds shall be regarded as following the community, and he who holds differently shall be regarded as opposing the community he was ordered to follow. So the error comes from separation; but in the community as a whole there is no error concerning the meaning of the Qur'ān, the sunna, and analogy.⁵

outskirts of Damascus, where he met several leading Companions. For the text of the tradition, see Shāfi'ī, Musnad, Vol. II, p. 187; and Ibn Ḥanbal, Vol. 1, pp. 112-13, 176-81.

⁴ This sentence is twice repeated in the Arabic text, in the middle and toward the end of the paragraph.

⁵ For a brief translation of the last two paragraphs, see J. Schacht, Origins of Muhammadan Jurisprudence, pp. 90-91.

Chapter XII

[ON ANALOGY (QIYĀS)]¹

488. He asked: On what ground do you hold that [on matters] concerning which no text is to be found in the Book, nor a sunna or consensus, recourse should be had to analogy? Is there any binding text for analogical deduction?

B 65

489. [Shāfi'ī] replied: If analogy were [stated] in the text of the Book or the sunna, such a text should be called either God's command or the Apostle's order rather than analogy.

S 476

490. He asked: What is analogy? Is it ijtihād, or are the two different?

491. [Shāfi'ī] replied: They are two terms with the same meaning.

492. He asked: What is their common [basis]?

493. [Shāfi'ī] replied: On all matters touching the [life of a] Muslim there is either a binding decision or an indication as to the right answer. If there is a decision, it should be followed; if there is no indication as to the right answer, it should be sought by ijtihād, and ijtihād is qiyās (analogy).²

494. He asked: If the scholars apply analogy correctly, will they arrive at the right answer in the eyes of God? And will it be permissible for them to disagree [in their answers] through analogy? Have they been ordered to seek one or different answers for each question? What is the proof for the position that they should apply analogy on the basis of the literal rather than the implicit meaning [of a precedent], and that it is permissible for them to disagree [in their answers]? Should [analogy] in matters concerning the scholars themselves be applied differently from the way it is applied in matters concerning others? Who is the person qualified to exercise ijtihād through analogy in matters concerning himself, not others, and who is the person who can apply it in matters concerning himself as well as others? 8 477

² Cf. Schacht, Origins of Muhammadan Jurisprudence, p. 127.

495. [Shāfi'ī] replied: [Legal] knowledge is of various kinds: The first consists of the right decisions in the literal and implied senses; the other, of the right answer in the literal sense only. The right decisions [in the literal and implied senses] are those based [either] on God's command or on a sunna of the Apostle related by the public from an [earlier] public. These [God's commands and the sunna] are the two sources by virtue of which the lawful is to be established as lawful and the unlawful as unlawful. This is [the kind of knowledge] of which nobody is allowed to be ignorant or doubtful [as to its certainty].

Secondly, [legal] knowledge of the specialists consists of traditions related by a few and known only to scholars, but others [the public] are under no obligation to be familiar with it. Such knowledge may either be found among all or a few [of the scholars], related by a reliable transmitter from the Prophet. This is the [kind of] knowledge which is binding on scholars to accept and it constitutes the right decision in the literal sense such as we accept [the validity of] the testimony of two witnesses.³ This is right [only] in the literal sense, because it is possible that [the evidence of] the two witnesses might be false. 8 478

[Thirdly], [legal] knowledge derived from ijmā' (consensus).⁴

[Finally], [legal] knowledge derived from ijtihād [personal

³ Būlāq ed., p. 66. Shākir's edition reads: "just as we condemn to death the murderer on the strength of two witnesses," p. 479.

⁴ This subject is dealt with in Chap. XI.

reasoning] through qiyās [analogy], by virtue of which right decisions are sought. Such decisions are right in the literal sense to the person who applies analogy, not to the majority of scholars, for nobody knows what is hidden except God.

496. [He asked]: If [legal] knowledge is derived through analogy—provided it is rightly applied—should [the scholars] who apply analogy agree on most [of the decisions], although we may find them disagreeing on some?

497. [Shāfi'ī replied]: Analogy is of two kinds: the first, if the case in question is similar to the original meaning [of the precedent], no disagreement on this kind [is permitted]. The second, if the case in question is similar to several precedents, analogy must be applied to the precedent nearest in resemblance and most appropriate. But those who apply analogy are likely to disagree [in their answers].

498. He asked: Will you give examples known to me explaining that [legal] knowledge is of two kinds, the one consisting of the right decisions in literal and implicit senses, and the other of the right decisions in the literal, not the implicit, sense?

499. [Shāfi'ī replied]: If we were in the Sacred Mosque and the Ka'ba is in sight, do you not agree that we should face it [in prayer] with certainty?

500. He said: That is right.

501. Shāfi'ī asked: [Since] the duties of prayer, [the payment of] the alms, performance of pilgrimage, and the like have been imposed on us, are we not under obligation to perform them in the right ways?

502. He replied: That is right.

503. [Shāfi'ī asked]: Since the duty imposed on us to punish the fornicator with a hundred stripes, to scourge him who casts an imputation [of adultery] with eighty, to put to death him who apostatizes, and to cut off [the hand of] him who steals, are we not under obligation to do so [only] to him whose offence is established with certainty on [the basis of] his admission?

504. He replied: That is right.

505. [Shāfi'ī] asked: Should not [the decisions] be the same whether we were obligated to take them against ourselves or others, although we realize that we know about ourselves what others do not know, and we do not know about others by outward observation what we know about ourselves inwardly?

506. He replied: That is right.

507. [Shāfi'ī] asked: Are we not under obligation to face the Sacred House [in prayer] wherever we may be?

508. He replied: That is right.

509. [Shāfi'ī] asked: Do you hold that we [could always] face the Sacred House correctly?

510. He replied: No, not always as correctly as when you were able to see [the Sacred House]; however, the duty imposed on you was fulfilled.

511. [Shāfi'ī] asked: Is our obligation to seek the unknown object different from our obligation to seek the known object?

512. He replied: That is right.

513. [Shāfi'ī] asked: Are we not obligated to accept the just character of a man on the basis of his outward behavior, and establish marital and inheritance relationship with him on [the basis of] his outward acceptance of Islam?

514. He replied: That is right.

515. [Shāfi'ī] said: Yet he may not be just in character inwardly.

516. He replied: That is quite possible; but you are under no obligation to accept save what is explicit.

517. [Shāfi'ī] asked: So is it not lawful for us to establish marital and inheritance relationship with him, and to accept his testimony, and is it not unlawful for us to kill him on the basis of [our] explicit [knowledge] of him? But if others should discover him to be an unbeliever, would it not be lawful for them to kill him and to repudiate marital and inheritance relationship or whatever else he had been permitted to do?

518. He replied: That is right.

519. [Shāfi'ī] said: Thus the obligation imposed on us toward the same person differs in accordance with the degree of our understanding of it and others' understanding of it.

520. He replied: Yes, for each one fulfils his obligation on the basis of his own understanding.

521. [Shāfi'ī] said: Thus we hold concerning matters on which there is no binding explicit text that these should be sought by ijtihād—through qiyās—because we are under obligation to arrive at the right answers according to us.

522. He asked: Are you not seeking the answer to one question through different means?

523. [Shāfi'ī] replied: Yes, whenever the grounds are different.

524. He asked: Give me an example.

525. [Shāfi'ī] replied: If a man admits an obligation on his part to God or to another person, I should take a decision against him on the strength of his admission; if he does not admit, I should take the decision on the evidence established against him; if no evidence can be established against him, I should take the decision on the basis of an oath taken by him which might acquit him; if he refuses [to take the oath], I should ask the other party to take an oath and I should make the decision against him on the basis of the oath of the other party. It is understood that [one's own] admission against himself—owing to [one's natural] covetousness and greed—is more certain than the evidence of others, since they might make a mistake or tell a lie against another. The evidence of witnesses of just character against a person should be regarded as nearer to the truth than [the accused] refusal to take an oath, or [nearer to the truth] than the oath taken by the other party [against him], since the latter might not be just in character. Thus the decision is taken on several grounds, some of them stronger than others.

526. He said: That is all right, but if he refuses to take an oath, we [the Ḥanafī School] will take the decision [against him] on the ground of his refusal.

527. [Shāfi'ī] said: But you will have taken a decision on an evidence weaker than ours.

528. He said: Yes; however, I disagree with you on the source of evidence [on the strength of which you have taken the decision].

529. [Shāfi'ī] said: The strongest evidence for your decision was his admission, although one is liable to make an unfounded or erroneous admission [on the strength of which] a decision might be taken against a person.

530. He said: That is correct; for you are under no other obligation than that.

531. [Shāfi'ī] asked: Do you not agree that we are under an obligation to take the right decision by one of two means: Either by certainty based on the literal and implicit meanings, or by certainty based on literal, not implicit meaning?

532. He replied: Yes, but is there any explicit text in the Book or the sunna in support [of your opinion]?

533. [Shāfi'ī] said: Yes, in such examples as I have [already] discussed concerning the determination of the qibla for myself and others. [For] God said:

And they comprehend not anything of His knowledge save what He willeth [Q. II, 256].⁵

Thus God endowed knowledge to man in whatever amount or way He wanted; no one shall raise an objection to His decision; for He is quick at reckoning.⁶

And He said to His Prophet:

They ask thee about the Hour: 'When is its arrival?' What hast thou to do with the mention of it? To thy Lord is its final coming [Q. LXXIX, 42-44].

Sufyān b. 'Uyayna told us ' from al-Zuhri from 'Urwa, who said:

The Prophet went on inquiring about the Hour until God communicated to him: 'What hast thou to do with the mention of it?' [Q. LXXIX, 43] so he stopped.

S 485

And God said:

Say: No one in the heavens or on earth knows the unseen except God [Q. XXVII, 66].

⁵ Cf. Ṭabarī, Tafsīr, Vol. V, pp. 396-97.

⁶ Cf. Q. XXXIII.

⁷ Būlāq ed., p. 67.

And God, the Blessed and Most High, said:

With God is the knowledge of the Hour; He sends down the rain, He knows what is in the womb. No person knows what he will gain tomorrow, and no person knows in what land he will die. Verily God is all-knowing, All-aware [Q. XXXI, 34].

So men are under obligation to hold opinions and to act in accordance with what they have been ordered [to do], provided that they do not exceed the limits. However, they cannot reward themselves; only God can reward. So we ask God to reward us for fulfilling our duties to Him and to enlarge His reward [to us].

Chapter XIII

[ON PERSONAL REASONING (IJTIHĀD)]¹

534. He asked: On what ground do you hold that [the exercise of] ijtihād is permitted in addition to what you have already explained?

535. [Shāfi'i] replied: It is on the basis of God's saying:

From whatever place thou issuest, turn thy face in the direction of the Sacred Mosque; and wherever you may be, turn your faces in its direction [Q. II, 145].²

8 487

Regarding him who [wishes to] face the Sacred Mosque [in prayer] and whose residence is at a distance from it, [legal] knowledge instructs [us] that he can seek the right direction through ijtihād on the basis of certain indications [guiding] toward it. For he who is under an obligation to face the Sacred House and does not know whether he is facing the right or wrong direction may be able to face the right one through certain indications known to him [which help him] to face it as accurately as he can, just as another person may know other indications which help to orient him [in the right direction], although the direction sought by each person may be different from that sought by the other.³

² Paragraphs 1379 and 1380 (of Shākir's ed.) are omitted because Shāfi'i's answer to the interlocutor's question on the meaning of "direction" is confined to citing a verse of poetry without actually giving directly the meaning of the term. Besides, this is a repetition of paragraph 109 (Shākir's ed.).

536. He asked: If I agree with you on this [matter], I should agree with you on the permissibility of disagreement in other matters.

537. [Shāfi'ī] replied: You may hold whatever opinion you like.

538. He asked: I hold that [that disagreement] is not permissible.

539. [Shāfi'ī] asked: Let us [assume that] you and I, who know [the direction of] this road, [hold different opinions]: I hold that the qibla is in this direction; but you may disagree with me. Who should follow the opinion of the other?

540. He replied: Neither one is under an obligation to follow the other.

541. [Shāfi'ī] asked: What should each one do?

542. He replied: If I hold that neither one should perform the prayer until he is certain [of the right direction], both might not know with certainty the unknown object. Thus either the prayer [duty] should be abandoned, or the obligation of the qibla waived so that each one can pray in whatever [direction] he wishes. But I am not in favor of either one of these two [opinions]—I am rather bound to hold that each one should pray in the direction he believes [is right] and he would be under no obligation to do otherwise. It is also possible to hold that while each one is ordered to seek the right [solution] on the strength of the literal and the implicit meaning [of the duty], neither shall be responsible for the error [which might be committed], in the implicit—not the literal—meaning [of the duty].

543. [Shāfi'ī] said: Whatever opinion you may hold is a proof against you, because you have distinguished between [the validity of] decisions taken in the literal and the implicit [senses], a distinction for which you have already criticized us by saying: "If they disagree [on the qibla, etc.],"⁴ one of them must be in error.

544. He replied: That is right [I did].

545. [Shāfi'ī] asked: You have held that the prayer was permissible despite your awareness that one of them was in error; it is even possible that both may have been in error. I have added: Such [a distinction] would be binding on you in [the cases of] testimonies and analogical deduction.

546. He replied: I hold that [such an error] is inevitable, but it is not intentional.

547. [Shāfi'ī] said: God said:

O believers, do not kill the game when you are in pilgrim sanctity; whosoever of you kill it intentionally, there shall be compensation equal to what he has killed, in flocks as shall be judged by two men of just character among you, an offering to be delivered at the Ka'ba [Q. V, 96].

Thus God ordered [men] to pay compensation [in kind], to be determined by two men of just character. Since the eating of game in general was prohibited, compensation for animals taken by hunting shall be by other [edible animals] equal to their size. Some Companions of the Prophet made decisions [to the effect] that the compensation for the hyena is a ram, for the gazelle a goat, for the rabbit a she-goat, and for the jerboa a kid.⁵ [Legal] knowledge instructs [us] that equal compensation means compensation in kind, not in prices, for if decisions were taken on the basis of prices they would vary, owing to the variation of the prices of game from one town and one time to another, even though legal decisions should be the same.

Knowledge instructs [us] that the jerboa is not quite equal in size to the kid, but since it is the nearest in size, it is regarded as equal [for this purpose]. This kind of analogy is closer to [the analogy of] the goat and the deer than to that of the kid and the jerboa.

⁵ A jafra is a small kid about four months of age. For the Companions' decision, see Shawkānī, Nayl al-Awṭār, Vol. V, pp. 18-19; Shāfi'ī, Kitāb-al-Umm, Vol. II, pp. 175-76.

548. Shāfi'ī said: * In the event equal compensation in kind is for four-footed game—not birds—[such compensation] is permissible only in accordance with 'Umar's opinion that game killed shall be compensated for in kind by another animal nearest in resemblance to it. If the game killed is larger, compensation shall be made by another animal nearest in size to it, as in the case of the hyena, the compensation for which is a ram; and the jerboa, though smaller than the little she-goat, a kid.

Since game birds do not resemble cattle, owing to differences in their physical make up, compensation for those which are not lawfully edible shall be made on the basis of precedent and analogy by paying their price to the owner. It is agreed ⁷ [among the scholars] that the decision as to the price should be on the basis of the price [of the game] in the place and the day [it was killed], for [prices] vary from one place and time to another, so that the price of a bird in one place may be one dirham and in another only a fraction of a dirham.

549. Shāfi'ī said: * We are ordered to accept the testimony of [witnesses of] just character. Thus, if the acceptance of [the testimony of] "just character" is stipulated, the indication is that we should reject [the testimony] of those who are not [of just character]. [Since] there is no sign in the body or speech of the witness of just character which distinguishes him from the witness lacking it, such a sign should be sought in the truthfulness reflected in his behavior. Thus if his behavior were on the whole good—although certain things may be lacking, as nobody, as far as we know, is [completely] devoid of sin—[his testimony] must be accepted. If his sins and good deeds are mixed, only by ijtihād may the good be distinguished from the bad, but in such a case the mujtahids are liable to disagree. If the just character [of a person] is apparent his testimony must be accepted by us; but if another person finds him deficient in just character, the testimony must be rejected.

* Būlāq ed., p. 68.

⁷ "Shāfi'ī said" is omitted.

* Būlāq ed., p. 68.

Thus two judges may take a decision in which one of them accepts [a testimony] while the other rejects it. This is [an example of] disagreement,⁹ but each judge has fulfilled his duty. S 493

550. He asked: Will you cite a tradition permitting [the exercise of] ijtihād?

551. [Shāfi'ī] replied: 'Abd al-'Azīz b. Muḥammad [al-Darāwardī] told us from Yazīd b. 'Abd-Allāh [b. Usāma] b. al-Hādī from Muḥammad b. Ibrāhīm [al-Taymī] from Busr b. Sa'īd from Abī Qays [the client of 'Amr b. al-'Āṣ] from 'Amr b. al-'Āṣ, who heard the Prophet say:

If a judge makes the right decision through ijtihād, he shall be doubly compensated; if he errs, he shall be compensated once.¹⁰ S 494

'Abd al-'Azīz b. Muḥammad told us from Yazīd b. al-Hādī, who said: I have related that tradition to Abū Bakr b. Muḥammad b. 'Amr b. Ḥazm, who said: The tradition was related to me by Abū Salama b. 'Abd al-Raḥmān from Abū Hurayra.

552. He said: This is a narrative transmitted by one individual which other [scholars] reject and [for which they] demand a proof [for its authenticity].

553. [Shāfi'ī] replied: You and I are capable of establishing its authenticity.

554. He said: Yes.

555. [Shāfi'ī] said: Those who reject it know what I have already stated concerning the authentication [of such a tradition] as well as others.¹¹ Which ¹² part [of the tradition] is in question? S 495

556. He asked: Did not the Prophet specify in what you related from him ¹³ [what kind of] ijtihād is right and [what kind is] wrong?

557. [Shāfi'ī] replied: This is an argument against you.

558. He asked: How?

¹⁰ Muslim, Vol. XII, pp. 13-14; and Abū Dāwūd, Vol. III, p. 299.

¹¹ See Chap. X, above.

¹² "Shāfi'ī said" is omitted.

¹³ Būlāq ed., p. 68.

559. [Shāfi'ī] replied: Because the Prophet stated that [the judge] shall be rewarded for the one [i. e., the right kind of ijtihād] more than for the other [the wrong]; but rewards are not granted for things forbidden nor for intentional errors. For if he [the judge] were ordered to exercise ijtihād on the basis of the literal meaning [of the text], and his ijtihād was indeed on the basis of the literal meaning [of the text], his error would be forgiven, as I have pointed out. But the punishment for an error which is not permissible is not forgivable as far as I can see; however, God might forgive him. This is [another] example for what I have already discussed that one is ordered to exercise ijtihād on the strength of the explicit, not the implicit meaning [of the text].

560. He asked: This may well be, as you hold; but what is the meaning of "wrong" and "right"?

561. [Shāfi'ī] replied: Their meaning is the same as that [explained in the example] of the qibla. He who can see it with certainty would face it correctly; but if it is out of sight, whether he [the person facing it] is at a distance or close to it, he should search for it. So some may face it correctly and others wrongly. Thus the facing itself is liable to be right or wrong, just as if one intends to relate a certain narrative concerning right or wrong, he says: So-and-so is right in seeking [the right solution] for he did not fall into error, but so-and-so fell into error although he sought [the right solution].

562. He said: It is as you hold; but do you not agree that ijtihād might be right in a different sense?

563. [Shāfi'ī] replied: Yes; for one is under an obligation to exercise ijtihād only in the search for an unknown object. If one does so, he would be right by doing what he was obligated to do. This is right for him on the basis of the literal meaning [of the text]; only God knows the implicit meaning. For we know that those who disagree in their search for the qibla cannot be right if the qibla is in sight; but they would be right in seeking it by ijtihād even though they may disagree [on how to face it]. The same [reasoning] may be applied in such cases as [the testimony of] witnesses and others which I have described.

564. He asked: Will you give an example?

565. [Shāfi'ī] replied: I do not think it would be explained by a stronger example than this.

566. He asked: Will you give a different example?

567. [Shāfi'ī] replied: God has made it lawful to marry two or three or four women and what our right hand possesses; but he made it unlawful [to marry] mothers, daughters, and sisters.

568. He said: That is correct.

569. [Shāfi'ī] asked: If a man purchases a slave-woman, whom he found clear of pregnancy, is she lawful to him?

570. He replied: Yes.

571. [Shāfi'ī] asked: after he had gone into her and she had given children, he discovered that she was his sister. What is [your] opinion about such [a situation]?

572. He replied: His [intercourse with her] was lawful until he found out about her [that she was his sister]; but once he knew it she was no longer lawful to him.

573. [Shāfi'ī] asked: So one may hold that the same woman was both lawful and unlawful to one man, although neither he nor she was responsible for the [wrong] act?

574. He replied: In the implicit sense she was his sister from the beginning to the last; but in the explicit sense she was lawful to him so long as he did not know she was his sister, and unlawful after he became aware of it. Other¹⁴ scholars might hold that he committed an offence, but the punishment would be waived.

575. [Shāfi'ī] said: Whatever [the scholars] hold, they have distinguished between the explicit and the implicit [meanings of] decisions, waiving the penalty for him who exercises ijtihād on the strength of an explicit decision—despite the fact that he committed an error—but they do not waive it in the case of an intentional offence.

576. He replied: That is correct.

577. [Shāfi'ī] said: Similarly, a man might marry an unlawful woman unknowingly or take a fifth [wife] who turned out to be his [former] wife, after the death of one of the four; and so forth. § 500

578. He said: Yes, there are many other similar situations. But ¹⁵ it is clear to those of you who are certain of truthful information that ijtihād should never be resorted to except in seeking an unknown object by means of certain indications, although it is permissible to those who exercise ijtihād to disagree [in their decisions].

And he asked: How is ijtihād [to be exercised]?

579. [Shāfi'ī] replied: God, Glorified and Praised be He, has endowed men with reason by which they can distinguish between differing viewpoints, and He guides them to the truth either by [explicit] texts or by indications [on the strength of which they exercise ijtihād].

580. He asked: Will you give an example?

581. [Shāfi'ī] replied: God erected the Sacred House and ordered men to face it [in prayer], when it is in sight, and to seek its direction [by ijtihād] when they are at a distance from it. And He created for them the heaven and the earth and the sun and the moon and the stars and the seas and the mountains and the wind [as guiding indications by which § 501 they can exercise ijtihād]. For God said:

It is He who has appointed for you the stars, that by them you might be guided in the darkness of land and sea [Q. VI, 97].

And He said:

And landmarks and by the stars they might be guided [Q. XVI, 16].

Thus [God] instructed men to be guided by the stars and [other] indicators, and by His blessing and help they know the direction of the Sacred House. So those who can see it from their places [may perform the prayer] and those who cannot see it should either be informed by those who have seen it or seek guidance by means of certain indications such as a mountain, which might point to [the direction], or a star indicating the north and south, or the sun, whose rising and setting is known, pointing out the direction for him who performs the evening [prayer], or the seas [which might also be a guiding indication] and the like.

Thus men should seek, through the reasoning power which God has implanted in them, the direction in which He made it incumbent for them to face [during prayer]. If it is thus sought, through their reasoning power and their knowledge of the indications [pointing to it], men can fulfil their duty.

[God] has made it clear that the duty He imposed on them is [to pray in] the direction of the Sacred Mosque, not always to face the House [al-Ka'ba] itself. If the right direction is not known with the same certainty as is possessed by those who see it, it is not permissible to hold that one can face any direction one wishes without [a guiding] indication.

Chapter XIV

[ON JURISTIC PREFERENCE (ISTIḤSĀN)]¹

582. He said: I agree with you that ijtihād should not be exercised except for a specific object, and the object must be something definite that can be determined by means of evidence or resemblance to an established object. Thus, it should be clear that it is unlawful for anyone to exercise istiḥsān whenever it is not called for by a narrative, whether the narrative is a text of the Qur'ān or a sunna, by virtue of which an [unknown] object is sought,² just as when the Sacred House is out of sight it should be sought by analogy. So nobody is allowed to give an opinion save through ijtihād, and this, as you said, is seeking [to know] the right answer. Thus would you hold that it is permissible for anyone to exercise istiḥsān by means other than analogy?

S 503

583. [Shāfi'ī] replied: It is not permissible for everyone in my opinion, [to do so], for only the scholars—not others—may give an opinion, and the scholars hold that a narrative must be followed; if a narrative is not found, analogy might be applied on the strength of a narrative. For if analogy were abandoned, it would be permissible for any intelligent man, other than the scholars, to exercise istiḥsān in the absence of a narrative. But to give an opinion based neither on a narrative nor on analogy, as I have already stated in the discussion on the Qur'ān and the sunna, is not permissible according to [the rules of] analogy. § 504

² Literally: "an object is sought by the mujtahid" (i. e., the person who exercises the istiḥsān).

584. He asked: The Qur'ān and the sunna give, indeed, evidence in support [of ijtihād]. For since the Prophet gave an order to exercise ijtihād, it should not be exercised save to seek an [unknown] object, and the object cannot be sought except through certain evidences [on the strength of] which analogical deduction may be made. Will you point out what are the analogy and the evidences which you have explained?

585. [Shāfi'ī] replied: Do you not agree that if a man injured the slave of another the scholars would not ask a [third] man to fix the price of the slave, whether male or female, unless he were well informed about the market prices in order to estimate two prices [i. e. the market price and the estimated price] by which he would inform you of the price of a similar slave on that day? For such [pricing] cannot be done except on the basis of the [man's] knowledge of similar cases on the strength of which he applies analogy. So whoever deals with property should not be asked to estimate the price unless he is well informed [about the market price]. § 505

So it is not permissible to ask a jurist of just character who is not acquainted with the prices of slaves [the question]: "What is the price of this male or female slave?" or "What is the wage of this worker?" for if he estimates such prices without regard to similar prices, he is making his estimate wrongly. § 506

If that is the case in such matters as the pricing of property of little value, concerning which an error might easily be committed by one man against another, it is all the more necessary that God's orders as to what is right and wrong should not be applied by treating a case without due consideration or by dealing with it on the basis of istiḥsān. Istiḥsān is merely doing what is agreeable.

No one except a well-informed scholar fully acquainted with the [binding] narratives should exercise it [analogy]. And he who exercises it should do so only on the basis of [legal] knowledge, and legal knowledge consists of the binding narrative on the strength of which analogy may be applied by means of certain indications as to what is right. So the scholar should always follow a narrative or have recourse to analogical deduction on the strength of such a narrative, just as [in prayer] one should either face the Sacred House when it is in sight or seek the direction in which it lies by the exercise of ijtihād through certain landmarks [when it is out of sight].

If he [the scholar] were to give an opinion based neither on a binding narrative nor on analogy he is more liable to commit a sin than is an ignorant person, if it were permissible for the latter to give an opinion. For God has not permitted any person since the Prophet's time to give an opinion except on the strength of established [legal] knowledge. [Legal] knowledge [after the Prophet's death] includes the Qur'ān, the sunna, consensus, narrative, and analogy based on these [texts], as I have already explained.

§ 308

Nobody should apply analogy unless he is competent to do so through his knowledge of the commands of the Book of God: its prescribed duties and its ethical discipline, its abrogating and abrogated [communications], its general and particular [rules], and its [right] guidance. Its [ambiguous] communications should be interpreted by the sunna of the Prophet; if no sunna is found, then by the consensus of the Muslims; if no consensus is possible, then by analogical deduction.

No one is competent to apply analogy unless he is conversant with the established sunna, the opinions of [his] predecessors, the agreement (consensus) and disagreement of the people, and has [adequate] knowledge of the Arabic tongue. Nor is he regarded as competent in analogical [reasoning] unless he is sound in mind, able to distinguish between closely parallel precedents, and not hasty in expressing an opinion unless he is certain of its correctness. Nor shall he refrain from listening to the opinions of those who may disagree with him, for he might be warned against [possible] forgetfulness or be confirmed in his right [judgment]. In so doing he must exert his utmost power not to be misled by personal [bias], so that he knows on what ground he has given one opinion and on what ground he has rejected another. Nor should he be more preoccupied with the opinion he has given than with the one with which he disagrees, so that he knows the merits of what he accepts as compared with that which he rejects.

He who possesses a mature mind but lacks the other qualifications we have described should not be permitted to express an opinion based on analogy, for he might not know the precedent on which he applies analogy just as a jurist of sound mind should not be permitted to estimate what a dirham will buy if he lacks the information on market [prices]. And he who possesses the [legal] knowledge I have described [solely] through memory, and is uncertain of its correctness, should not be permitted to express an opinion based on analogy, for he may not comprehend the meaning [of that knowledge].

Moreover, if he were good in memory but were lacking either in comprehension or in knowledge of the Arab tongue, he should not be permitted to apply analogy, for he would be lacking in the tool by means of which he applies analogy. However, we do not maintain that it is permissible only to follow [precedents] and not to use analogy.* But God knows best!

586. Someone asked: Will you give some examples of [binding] narratives on the strength of which analogy might be applied, and how would you apply it?

587. [Shāfi'ī] replied: Every order laid down by God or by the Apostle for which there is evidence, either in itself or in some other of the orders of God or His Apostle, was laid down for some reason. If a case should arise for which there is no [specific] textual order, it should be decided on the strength of the case identical to it in reason for which a [specific] order was laid down.

Analogy is of various kinds, and all are included under the term "analogy." They differ from one another in the antecedence of the analogy of either one of them, or its source, or the source of both, or the circumstance that one is more clear than the other. The strongest kind [is the deduction] from an order of prohibition by God or the Apostle involving a small quantity, which makes equally strong or stronger an order of prohibition involving a great quantity, owing to the [compelling] reason in the greater quantity. Similarly the commendation of a small act of piety implies the presumably stronger commendation of a greater act of piety; and similarly an order of permission involving a great quantity would render permissible something involving a smaller quantity.⁴

588. Someone may say: Give an example of each one of these to explain their meaning.

§ 513

589. [Shāfiʿī] said: The Apostle said:

God has prohibited the shedding of the believer's blood and the taking away of his property, and [ordered] that only what is good should be thought of him.⁵

If [God] has made it unlawful for [the believer] to be thought of in any way contrary to the good which he manifests, then the thing greater than the thought implying in any way what is contrary to his good such as telling an untruth about him, should be all the more unlawful. The more this matter is indulged in, the stronger the order of prohibition becomes. [For] God said:

* Whoever has done a particle's weight of good, he shall see it; and whoever has done a particle's weight of evil, he shall see it [Q. XCIX, 7-8].

Thus what is greater than a particle's weight of good is a greater commendation [of an act of piety] and what is greater than a particle's weight of evil is a greater sin.⁶

He [God] has made lawful for us the life-blood and property

⁴ See Kitāb Ibtāl al-Istihsān (Kitāb al-Umm, Vol. VII, p. 274).

⁵ This is a muṣal tradition for which no authority is given, although its substance might be found in other traditions.

⁶ Bayḍāwī, p. 807.

of combatant unbelievers, excepting those who have made a compact [with us], prohibiting nothing that I remember. So whatever we take of their bodies, except their life-blood, and of their property, except the whole of it, is all the more lawful.

Some scholars refuse to call these [rulings] analogical deduction, for they hold that they fall within the meaning of what God has made either lawful or unlawful, and has either commended as an act of piety or repudiated; these things are included in the general order itself rather than an analogy based on another order. Similarly this is applicable to other matters: whatever is equivalent (fi ma'na) to something lawful is lawful and what is equivalent to something unlawful is unlawful. They refuse to call anything an analogy unless there is a parallel precedent which can be determined in one of two ways, one of them being chosen as the answer to the exclusion of the other. Other scholars hold that any [ruling] other than the [explicit] text of the Book and the sunna is analogy, provided it is in harmony with their meaning. But God knows best.⁷

590. Someone said: Give examples of analogy that illustrates its varieties of clarity and arguments and the proof for it, other than those already stated, which the public can understand.

591. [Shāfi'ī] replied: God said:

Mothers shall suckle their children two full years, for anyone who wishes the period of suckling to be complete. It is for the father to provide for his [daughters] and clothe them honorably [Q. II, 233].

And He said:

And if you desire to seek someone to suckle your children, it is no fault of yours when you hand over what you have given honorably (Ibid.).

And the Apostle ordered Hind, daughter of 'Atba, to take from her husband's—Abū Sufyān's—property what was needed for her and her children without asking his permission, since they were his children.⁸

592. [Shāfi'i] said: Thus the Book of God and the sunna of the Prophet indicate that it is [the duty] of the father to see to it that his children are suckled and that they are supported as long as they are young.

§ 517

Since the child is [an issue] of the father, he [the father] is under an obligation to provide for the child's support while [the child] is unable to do that for himself. So I hold by analogical deduction when the father becomes incapable of providing for himself by his earnings—or from what he owns—then it is an obligation on his children to support him by paying for his expenses and clothing. Since the child is from the father, he [the child] should not cause him from whom he comes to lose anything, just as the child should not lose anything belonging to his children,⁹ because the child is from the father. So the forefathers, even if they are distant, and the children, even if they are remote descendants, fall into this category. Thus I hold that [by analogy] he who is retired,¹⁰ and in need should be supported by him who is rich and [still] active.¹¹

The Prophet made a decision that a slave sold with a defect which became known only after he was employed could be returned, with the purchaser retaining the profit [derived from the slave's employment] on the ground that he was responsible for the slave [during the latter's employment].¹²

We conclude that if it were not stipulated in the sale transaction that the profit should be part of the price [the profit belongs to the purchaser], since the slave is a piece of property belonging to his owner, and if the slave should die, his price would be a loss to him who had purchased him. So the profit belongs to the purchaser because it was earned when the slave was in his possession and under his responsibility. We hold [by analogy] the same opinion about the fruit of palm trees; the milk, wool, and young of cattle; the children of a slave-woman; and anything that may be produced while in the possession and responsibility of the purchaser, including the [right of] intercourse with a slave-woman who is a thayyib, and the use of her service.

593. [Shāfi'ī] said: Some of our fellow jurists as well as others have disagreed with us on this matter.

One of them held: The profit, the service,¹³ and the property of male and female slaves, except the right of intercourse, belong to the purchaser, who has the right to return [the female slave] if he discovers any defect in her. He added: He has no right to return the female slave if he enters into sexual intercourse with her even if she were a thayyib. Nor is he entitled to the fruit of palm trees or the milk and wool of cattle, or the children of slave-women, for all of these—the cattle, the children of the slave-woman, the palm trees, and the profit—are not in the category of the slave.

594. Shāfi'ī said: ¹⁴ I asked one of those who held this opinion: Do you not agree that the two [i. e., the slave and the profit, etc.] belong together in that both were produced while in the possession of the purchaser and there was no stipulation concerning them in the sale transaction?

595. He replied: Yes, but the two must be distinguished because the fruit which the purchaser has received from the palm, the children he has received from the female slave, and the young he has gained from the cattle have been produced by them, while the slave's profit does not accrue [directly] from him but results from his employment.

596. [Shāfi'ī] asked: If a critic raises an objection in line with your reasoning and says: Since the Prophet decided that the profit belongs to him who bears responsibility, and since the profit cannot be earned except by employment and this might deprive the master of the slave's service, do you not agree that the master is entitled to the slave's profit in lieu of the service rendered [to the employer] and the expenses for the [slave's] subsistence? But if a gift is given to him [the slave], which cannot divert him from his master's service, it should not be given to the second but to the first owner.

¹³ Būlāq ed., p. 72.

¹⁴ Ibid., p. 72.

597. He replied: No, it should be to the second, in whose possession the slave was when the gift was given.

598. [Shāfi'ī] said: But [the gift] is not a profit, for it falls in a category other than that of profit.

599. He said: Although it is not, neither can it be considered [to have been produced] by the slave.

600. [Shāfi'ī] said: Its meaning must be distinguished from that of profit, for it belongs to a different category.

601. He said: Although it falls in a different category, it was given [to the slave] while he was in the possession of the purchaser.

602. [Shāfi'ī] said: The fruit and the other products were produced while their [sources] were in the possession of the purchaser. So if the fruit were picked from the palm tree it should no longer remain a part of the tree and might be sold without it just as the tree might be sold without the fruit. The same [reasoning] applies to the product of the cattle. However, the profit [from the slave] would more appropriately be returned with the slave, because sometimes it seems to acquire a quality which the fruit of the date palm has, if it were permissible that one of the two should be returned.

Some of our followers have agreed with us on [retention of] the profit and on the [permissibility of] sexual intercourse with the thayyib [slave-woman] and on keeping the fruit of the palm trees; but they have disagreed on [the right to retain] the children of the slave woman.

Since all of them have been produced while [the property was] in the possession of the purchaser, they fall in the same category and no other [opinion] is right; for the slave's master—the purchaser—can claim only the [slave's] profit and his service, but not what was given to him as a gift, nor what he may find, nor anything that he may obtain from a [hidden] treasure or the like—except in the form of profit or service rendered—nor the fruit of palm trees, nor the milk of the cattle nor anything else, for all of them do not fall in [the category of] profit.

603. Shāfi'ī said: ¹⁵ The Apostle of God has prohibited [the exchange of] gold for gold, date for date, wheat for wheat, and barley for barley unless in equal quantities and delivered immediately.¹⁶

Since the Prophet excluded (with regard to these kinds of edibles, concerning which men were so greedy that they sold them by measure) two categories: one, that a thing should be sold for an equal quantity with one a cash sale and the other with deferred payment; and the second, that one of the things might be more than the other when delivered by hand, so whatever is in these categories is unlawful, by analogy. Such kinds are all edibles when sold by weight, for all have the common attribute that they are edible and potable, since the latter's meaning falls within the former's. To the public, these materials [foodstuffs] are either basic food or plentiful or both. I have found that when such foodstuffs (as honey, clarified butter, olive oil, sugar, and other [foodstuffs] which are edible and potable) become scarce, men sell them by weight, for weighing is more accurate than measuring and its meaning is included in measuring.

604. Someone may ask: Is it possible that the thing sold by weight is analogous to the thing sold by gold and silver in weight, so that things exchangeable by weight would be more appropriate for analogy than things exchanged by measure?

§ 524

605. [Shāfi'ī said]: To this it may be replied: That which prevented us from taking the position you have described, which confines the analogy of things that are weighed to other things that are weighed, is that valid analogy occurs when you make one thing analogous to another in decisions in which one case would be the same as the other. If you were to make honey and clarified butter analogous to dirhams (gold coins) and dirhams (silver coins) and were only declaring the superiority of some things over others to be illegal when they are of one kind, on the analogy of gold and silver coins, then would it be proper for honey and clarified butter to be bought for cash with gold and silver coins on [the same basis as a transaction including] payment at an appointed time?

606. If he says: It [the sale] should be permitted in accordance with that which the Muslims permitted.

607. [Shāfi'ī said]: The reply to this may be: The permissibility of the Muslims indicated to me that they did not do so by analogy. If it were by analogy, the decision in one case would be the same as in the other. So it would not be legal unless [the thing] were sold for ready money, just as gold and silver coins may not be exchanged except for ready money.

608. Should he ask: If analogy were applied on the basis of measuring, would you apply the same rules?

609. [Shāfi'ī] replied: That is correct; I make no distinction under any circumstances.

610. He asked: Is it not permissible for you to purchase a mudd [a measure]¹⁷ of wheat, delivered on the spot, for three raṭls [measures]¹⁸ of olive oil to be delivered at an appointed time?

611. [Shāfi'ī] replied: This is not permissible, for nothing edible or potable can be [exchanged lawfully] for other kinds of things to be delivered at an appointed time.¹⁹ For the rule of [exchanging] foodstuffs by measure applies to [exchanging] foodstuffs by weight.

612. He asked: What is your opinion about the [exchange of gold] dīnārs for [silver] dirhams?

613. [Shāfi'ī] replied: That is unlawful in itself. Edible [things] are not analogous to it, for they are not in the same category. The [exchange of] measured edibles is not lawful ¹⁷ The mudd is a grain measure equivalent to $1\frac{1}{2}$ of a raṭl in the Hijaz and 2 in 'Irāq.

¹⁸ The raṭl is a measure of weight approximately equivalent to a pound (in Egypt).

¹⁹ This paragraph is written on the margin of al-Rabi' MS (Cf. Būlāq ed., p. 72).

in itself; only the analogy of what is equivalent in measure or weight applies to it, because they fall in the same category.

614. He asked: What is the difference between the [exchange of] dīnārs for dirhams?

615. [Shāfi'ī] replied: I know of no scholar who disagrees on the permissibility of exchanging foodstuffs by measure or by weight for dīnārs and dirhams to be delivered at an appointed time, but [such an exchange] would be unlawful if it is made by [gold] dīnārs for [silver] dirhams. Nor do I know any scholar who denies that if I discover a mine and pay the right [tax] on my profit from it, I should each year pay its zakāt (legal alms) if the silver or the gold from it remains a year [or more] with me. And if I were to harvest grain from my land, having paid its kharāj (land-tax), and it remained with me for a year, there would be no zakāt due from me for it. And if I were to destroy something belonging to a man, its value might be paid in gold or silver coins, because they are the [measure of] prices of all the property of a Muslim, except in cases of blood-money [which may be paid in camels].

616. He said: That is correct.

617. [Shāfi'ī] said: Thus things differ by [differentials] less than what I have described to you.

B 72

618. [Shāfi'ī] said: ²⁰ We have found that it was generally agreed among scholars that the Prophet decreed that [the diya] for unintentional homicide committed by a free Muslim against another shall be one hundred camels to be paid by the 'āqila.²¹ It is also generally agreed that the [diya] shall be [paid] within three years, one-third each year on the basis of specified years. Several meanings of analogical deduction are implied in this [decree]; some of them which I may remember are the following:

We have found that it was generally agreed among scholars that if a free Muslim commits an intentional offence against the life or limb of a person or destroys his property, the com-compensation shall be paid out of his own property; but if the offence were unintentional, it shall be paid by his 'āqila.

§ 528

We have found them [the scholars] agreed that the 'āqila pays one-third of the diya for an offence [in the category] of injuries and upwards. But they have disagreed on the payment of less than one-third [of the diya]. Some of our fellow jurists held: The 'āqila should pay compensation for al-muwaddiḥa²² and upwards, [equal to] half of the one-tenth [of the diya] and upwards; but he should not pay for injuries less than that.²³

I have said to some of those who stipulate the payment of half of the one-tenth but not anything less: Can analogy ever be sound on the basis of the sunna but in one of two forms?

619. He asked: What are they?

620. [Shāfi'i] replied: First, since the Prophet decreed that the diya shall be paid by the 'āqila, I should follow his ruling; anything less than the diya should be paid out of the offender's property. No other analogy can be applied on the basis of the diya, for in principle it should be more appropriate for the offender than for the others to pay the compensation for his offence, just as in the case of intentional injuries. Since God has decreed that whoever commits an unintentional killing shall pay the diya and set free one slave, I hold that the slave shall be paid out of the [offender's] property—since the offence is his—, but the diya would be excluded on the basis of the [Prophet's] ruling. On the basis of this ruling I hold that anything less than the diya should be paid out of the [offender's] property, since it is more appropriate for him to pay than for others, just as I hold that the wiping of the shoes is permitted on the strength of a tradition from the Prophet, without regarding it as a precedent for analogy. [Secondly], analogy may take another form.

621. He asked: What is it?

622. [Shāfi'i] replied: Since the Prophet has excluded unin-

²³ This is the doctrine of the Ḥanafī school of law.

tentional offence against life from offences other than those involving life [i. e., the limb] and from intentional offence against life, requiring the 'āqila to pay [the diya] for the unintentional offence because it is the greater amount, I hold that the 'āqila shall be liable to pay for what is less [than the diya] in an unintentional offence, since it is more appropriate for him to pay it than the greater amount or what falls in that category.

623. He said: This is the more appropriate meaning as a basis for analogy, but it is not a case parallel to the wiping of the shoes.

624. [Shāfi'ī] said: That is in agreement with your opinion, for the scholars are agreed that the 'āqila should pay one-third or more [of the diya]; and their agreement is an evidence that they applied the analogy of the payment of compensation of what is less than the diya on the [basis of the] payment of [full] diya.

625. He said: That is right.

626. [Shāfi'ī] said: Our master [Mālik b. Anas] said: "The best opinion that I have heard is that the 'āqila should pay one-third of the diya upward," and he said that this is the opinion acceptable to him.²⁴ Do you not agree that a critic might advance two points [against such an opinion]?

627. He asked: What are they?

628. [Shāfi'ī] replied: You and I are agreed that the 'āqila should pay one-third or more of the diya; but we are in disagreement on the payment of the smaller amount. So the proof is established by your agreement and mine on the payment of the one-third, but you are unable to produce a tradition in support of the payment of the smaller amount. What would be your answer?

629. He replied: I should say this: My agreement [with you] is based on a ground different from your agreement [with me], for my agreement is based on the analogy that since the 'āqila pays the greater amount [of the diya] he should also be responsible for a smaller amount. For who has limited the amount to one-third? Do you not agree that someone might argue: "The [ʿāqila] should pay nine-tenths [of the diya] rather than the smaller amount?"

630. [Shāfiʿī] said: If he holds that one-third [of the diya] is too much for whomever pays it, I hold [likewise] that it is too much and that it should be paid by some one jointly with him or on his behalf, but no one else should pay it if it were the smaller amount.

631. He said: Do you not agree that if someone possesses only two dirhams it would be too much for him to pay one-third [of the diya] and one dirham—since he would thus be deprived of his property—but that it would not be too much for one who possesses a fortune to pay one-third [of the diya]?

632. [Shāfiʿī] said: Do you not agree that he [Mālik] would not say, "This is our practice," unless the matter had been agreed upon among the scholars in Madīna?

633. He said: Is not an opinion agreed upon in Madīna stronger than a narrative related by one individual? For²⁵ why should he relate to us a weak narrative related by one individual and refrain from relating to us a stronger and binding matter agreed upon [among the scholars]?

634. [Shāfiʿī] asked: Supposing someone should tell you: It is because the narrative is rare and the agreement [about the matter] is too well known to be related; and should you yourself say: This is a matter agreed upon?

635. He replied: Neither I nor any of the scholars would say: "This is [a matter] agreed upon," unless it were [a matter] about which you would never find a scholar who would not repeat it to you and relate it from a predecessor, such as that the noon-prayer has four [cycles, rak'as] and that wine is forbidden, and the like. I sometimes find one who says: "The matter is agreed upon," but I often find scholars in Madīna who say the opposite, and I find that the majority [of scholars] of other cities oppose what is said to be "agreed upon."²⁶

²⁵ "He said" is omitted.

²⁶ On the controversy with Mālik and his followers, see Shāfiʿī, Kitāb al-Umm, Vol. VII, p. 188, and Ikhṭilāf al-Ḥadīth, ibid., pp. 147-48.

636. [Shāfi'ī] said: I pointed out to him that he [the critic] might object to your opinion: "No blood-money [should be paid] for less than al-muwaḍḍiḥa," just as he objected to the payment of the one-third [of the diya]. B 73

637. He replied: The evidence for that is that the Apostle made no decision on cases relating to [offences] less than al-muwaḍḍiḥa.

638. [Shāfi'ī] asked: Do you not agree that a critic may raise an objection by saying: "I will make no decision relating to injuries less than al-muwaḍḍiḥa, because the Apostle made no decisions on such matters."

639. He replied: He has no right to say so, for if [the Apostle] made no decision on such matters, it does not follow that he waived the payment of compensation for such injuries. S 535

640. [Shāfi'ī] said: He may also hold that if he [the Prophet] did not order the 'āqila to pay blood-money for offences less than al-muwaḍḍiḥa he did not prohibit the 'āqila from paying the blood-money for less than al-muwaḍḍiḥa; for if he had made a decision [relating to compensation paid by the 'āqila] for al-muwaḍḍiḥa, but not for offences less than that, it does not follow that the 'āqila should not pay compensation for offences less than al-muwaḍḍiḥa [on the ground] that if it pays the greater compensation it must pay the smaller one, just as you and I have already agreed on this matter when you raised an objection to us. If it is permissible for you to hold such an opinion, it would be permissible to hold it against you also.

If the Prophet made a decision that the 'āqila should pay half of the one-tenth [of the compensation for al-muwaḍḍiḥa], would it be permissible to hold that [the 'āqila] should pay either half of the one-tenth [of the diya] or the [full] diya, but not an amount between the two, for this should be paid by the offender! This is an opinion that it is not permissible for anyone to hold, nor should one hold that the 'āqila should pay compensation for all unintentional offences, even if it were only one dirham.

641. [Shāfi'ī] said: Some of our fellow jurists held: If a free man commits an unintentional offence against a slave resulting either in the latter's death or in an injury less than death, the [compensation] shall be paid out of the offender's property—not by the 'āqila—for the 'āqila is under no obligation to pay the compensation for a slave.

We maintain that this is an offence committed by a freeman. For since the Apostle decreed that the compensation paid by the 'āqila covers an offence committed by a freeman unintentionally, [the freeman's] offence against a slave, if it were unintentional, must be included [in the Prophet's decree]. But God knows best!

You [the interlocutor] have already agreed with us [on this matter], and have held that he who holds that the 'āqila is not liable to pay compensation for a slave holds that no compensation shall be paid by the 'āqila for an offence committed by the slave, for the slave himself should be responsible for it, not his master. Thus you have held an opinion similar to ours and have regarded our argument, based on the sunna, as valid.

642. He replied: That is right.

S 537

643. [Shāfi'i] said: I have added: Your fellow jurist[s] as well as some of our fellow jurists held: Compensation for an offence committed against a slave is [equal to] the slave's price just as the compensation for an offence committed by a freeman is [equal to] his diya. Thus [the compensation] for the loss of an eye is half of the slave's price and for al-muwaddiḥa half of the one-tenth of his price.²⁷ However, you have disagreed with us on this matter and have held that the [compensation] for the slave's offence is less than his price.

644. He replied: First, let me ask you to give the proof for the opinion that the [compensation] for the slave's offence is [analogous to] the diya. Is it based on a narrative or on an analogy?

645. [Shāfi'i] replied: It is on a narrative from Sa'id b. al-Musayyib.

646. He asked: Will you relate it?

647. [Shāfi'ī] replied: Sufyān [b. 'Uyayna] told us from Ibn Shihāb al-Zuhrī from Sa'īd b. al-Musayyib, who said: "The blood-money of the slave is [equal to] his price," and I have heard it repeated by him [al-Musayyib] several times. He may have added: "just as [the compensation] for an offence committed by a freeman is [equal to] the diya." Ibn Shihāb said: Others have added: "[The price of the slave] shall be estimated in the same manner as that of a commodity."²⁸

648. He asked: I have asked you to relate a [binding] narrative [i. e., a tradition] in support of your argument.

649. [Shāfi'ī] replied: I have already said that I know of no narrative from an authority earlier than Sa'īd b. al-Musayyib.

650. He said: His [Ibn al-Musayyib's] opinion is not a proof.

651. [Shāfi'ī] said:²⁹ I have not claimed that it is a proof to be rejected.

652. He asked: What is the proof?

653. [Shāfi'ī] replied: It is an analogy [based on the case] of the criminal offence committed by a freeman.

654. He said: [The compensation for the slave] differs from the diya of the freeman, because the latter is specified, while the former is equal to his price, just as commodities—such as camels, beasts and the like—are priced.

655. [Shāfi'ī] replied: This argument, in support of those who hold that the 'āqila should not pay compensation for the slave, is against you.

656. He asked: In what way?

657. [Shāfi'ī] replied: One may say to you: Why do you hold that the 'āqila pays the slave's price [as compensation], if the offence is committed by a freeman who is in possession of the price, while if the offence is committed against a camel, the compensation should be paid out of the offender's property?

658. He said: Because it is unlawful to take the [slave's] life.

²⁸ Cf. Būlāq ed., p. 74; and Shāfi'ī, Kitāb al-Umm, Vol. VI, pp. 90-91.

²⁹ Būlāq ed., p. 74.

659. [Shāfi'ī] asked: Is not the camel's life unlawful to the slayer?

660. He replied: Not in the same [degree] as that of a believer.

661. [Shāfi'ī] asked: One may argue that the slave's life is not of the same [degree of] unlawfulness as that of the free-man. He added: If it is, should the 'āqila pay the blood-money?

662. He replied: Yes.

663. [Shāfi'ī] asked: [Is not] God's judgment concerning the unintentional killing of a believer that a diya should be paid and a slave freed?

664. He replied: That is right.

665. [Shāfi'ī] asked: Do you not hold that [the compensation] for a slave is the freeing of [another] slave equal in price—as in the case of a freeman—and that the price is like a diya?

666. He replied: That is right.

667. [Shāfi'ī] asked: Do you not hold that you would kill a freeman [in retaliation] for the killing of a slave?

668. He replied: That is right.

8 341

669. [Shāfi'ī] said: Have we not both held that a slave shall be killed for the [killing of another] slave?

670. He said: I hold the opinion you hold.

671. [Shāfi'ī] said: It is your opinion and mine that [the slave] and the freeman are liable to the same penalty for whatever offense they may commit, and that the camel falls in the same category concerning the payment of compensation that is equal to its price? On what ground have you based your opinion that the [compensation for the slave's] offence should be equal to that for an offence against a camel, putting it in [the category of] the smaller amount rather than in the category of the diya of the freeman? [The slave] and the free man possess five things in common and differ in one. Would it not be more appropriate to apply analogy to the [situation in which the slave and the freeman possess] five points in common than to the situation in which they possess only one? In fact, the slave possesses further points in common with the freeman, [namely,] that whatever is unlawful for the one is unlawful for the other, and that both are liable to [the same] penalties and that they are under the [same] obligations concerning the performance of prayer and the observance of fasting as well as other duties, while animals are under no such obligations.

672. He said: I hold that the [slave's] diya should be equal to his price. § 542

673. [Shāfi'ī] asked: [Since] you hold that a woman's diya is equal to half that of a man, why should [the compensation for] offences against her not be equal to her diya, just as [the compensation for] an offence against a man is equal to his diya? [Shāfi'ī] added: If the diya consists of camels [to be paid] in three years, do you maintain that the camels would be regarded as a debt? If so, why do you object to the sale of camels by deferred delivery? And [if you apply analogy], why do you do so on the basis of diya rather than on the basis of either the sale agreement [of the slave], or the dowry,⁸⁰ while you permit the camel to be regarded in all these cases as a debt? Thus you have [taken a position] contradictory to analogy as well as to the text of a tradition from the Prophet to the effect that he had borrowed a camel [the price of which] was paid later as a debt? § 543

674. He replied: Ibn Mas'ūd has objected to this [kind of a transaction].

675. [Shāfi'ī] asked: Is there anyone whose authority is equal to that of the Prophet?

676. He replied: No, if [the tradition] from the Prophet is well authenticated.

677. [Shāfi'ī] said: It is well authenticated [by the Prophet's precedent] that he borrowed a camel which was later paid back—a case on diyas well known to you and to us. This [precedent] is a sunna.

678. He asked: What is the narrative for analogical deduction?

679. [Shāfi'ī] replied: Mālik [b. Anas] told us from Zayd b. Aslam from 'Aṭā' b. Yasār from Abū Rāfi', who said:

⁸⁰ Shāfi'ī, Kitāb al-Umm, Vol. III, p. 106.

The Prophet borrowed a camel from a certain man. Upon receiving several camels [later] he ordered me to pay back [the debt], but I told him: I find that every one of these camels is superior. 'Give it to him [the man from whom the camel was borrowed], for the best of men shall have the best in payment [of the debt].'⁸¹

680. He asked: What is the narrative which cannot be regarded as a basis for analogy?

681. [Shāfi'ī] replied: Whenever God has established a textual order for which a qualifying sunna is provided by the Apostle specifying a certain modifying permission to the exclusion of another, such an order of permission should be obeyed provided it is not regarded as a precedent for other orders of permission. The same [reasoning] applies to certain specifying sunnas which the Apostle may have laid down to qualify general rules.

682. He asked: For example?

683. [Shāfi'ī] replied: God has imposed [the duty of] ablution on all who rise up from sleep to perform the prayer and said:

When you stand up for the prayer wash your faces and your hands up to the elbows, and wipe your heads and your feet up to the ankles [Q. V, 8].

[God] meant that the washing of the feet is included [in the ablution], just as other limbs are included. But since the Apostle practised the wiping of the shoes, we should not wipe by analogy the turban, the veil, or the gloves. Thus the duty of washing the limbs is confirmed while the wiping of the shoes is permitted only by the Prophet's order to the exclusion of wiping other things.⁸²

⁸¹ Abū Dāwūd, Vol. III, pp. 247-48; and Shāfi'ī, Kitāb al-Umm, Vol. III, pp. 103, 106-108.

⁸² Some jurists maintain that there are traditions to the effect that the Prophet permitted the wiping of the turban. See Abū Dāwūd, Vol. I, p. 36; Tirmidhī, Vol. I, pp. 170-73; and Shawkānī, Nayl al-Awṭār, Vol. I, pp. 181-84.

684. He asked: Would you regard this [tradition] as contradictory to the Qur'ān?

685. [Shāfi'ī] replied: In no circumstance can the sunna contradict the Qur'ān.

686. He asked: What is the meaning [of this tradition] in your opinion?

687. [Shāfi'ī] replied: It means that one should [always] wash his feet if the shoes were not worn in cleanliness.

688. He asked: Is this [meaning] permissible in the [Arab] tongue?

689. [Shāfi'ī] replied: Yes, just as it is permissible for anyone who has [already] performed the ablution to stand up in prayer—for it is not the ablution that is desired—on the strength of the Apostle's [precedent] that he performed two or more prayers with one ablution.⁸³

Also, God said:

The thief, male and female, cut off their hands as a recompense for what they have earned: [an exemplary] chastisement from God. God is All-mighty, All-wise [Q. V, 42].

Just as the sunna indicated that God did not mean by "cutting off" [a penalty] for all kinds of thieves, so the Apostle's sunna indicated that he meant by the prescription of the wiping of the shoes that he who wears them need not wash his feet if they were clean.

690. He asked: What are the like examples in the sunna?

691. [Shāfi'ī] replied: The Apostle prohibited the exchange of dates for dates except in equal quantities. Asked about the exchange of fresh dates for dry dates, he inquired: "Will the dates lose weight when dry?" "Yes," he was answered; and he ordered the prohibition of such an exchange. He also prohibited muzābana, an exchange of a known quantity for an unknown which may include riba. These are examples which fall in one category. However, [the Prophet] permitted the sale of 'arāya for dry dates.⁸⁴ So we have permitted [the sale of] 'arāya on the strength of the [Prophet's] permission, although it is the exchange of fresh dates for dry dates, and it falls in the category of muzābana with its conjecturing. Thus we confirm all prohibited foodstuffs that are in the same category as muzābana, whether [sold] by measure or by estimate; but we have permitted [the sale of] 'arāya as an exception on the basis of his permission, qualifying the general rule of prohibition. Thus neither one of the two traditions is invalidated by the other, nor are they invalid as a precedent for analogy.

692. He asked: What [possible] explanation would you give for that?

693. [Shāfi'ī] replied: There are two possible explanations. One, is that what [the Prophet] prohibited as a general rule did not include 'arāya; the other is that he may have given his order of permission after he had given the general rule of prohibition. In either case we have to obey his orders, by accepting as lawful what he regarded as lawful, and as unlawful what he regarded as unlawful.

S 548

694. [Shāfi'ī] said: ⁸⁵ The Apostle decreed that the diya for the unintentional killing of a believer is one hundred camels, to be paid by the 'āqila. The compensation for intentional injuries must be distinguished from that for unintentional, and from wrongs, but the common factor is that a diya shall be paid.

B 75

Since the Prophet decreed that each person must pay compensation out of his own property, not from that of another, except in case the free Muslim is killed unintentionally, we hold that the 'āqila should pay [the diya] for the unintentional killing of a freeman in accordance with the Prophet's decree, and that for the intentional killing of a freeman a diya must be paid by the offender out of his own property just as the penalty for any other offence committed intentionally should be paid out of his own property. However, the analogy of compensation for an unintentional offence should not be applied to compensation for intentional killing.⁸⁶

⁸⁵ Būlāq ed., p. 75.

⁸⁶ See paragraphs 618 ff., above.

695. Someone may ask: What should be the compensation paid for offences committed intentionally?

696. [Shāfi'ī] replied: God said:

And give the women their dowries as a gift [Q. IV, 3].

And He said:

Observe the prayer and pay the zakāt [Q. II, 40].

And He said:

But if you are prevented, then such offering as may be feasible [Q. II, 192].

And He said:

For those who say, regarding their wives, 'Be as my mother's back,' and then retract what they have said, they shall set free a slave, before they touch each other [Q. LVIII, 4].

And He said:

If any of you kill it intentionally, let there be compensation, equal to what he has killed, from his flocks, as two persons of just character among you shall decide—an offering to be delivered at the Ka'ba; or let there be an expiation, the feeding of poor people, or its equivalent in fasting, so that he may taste the mischief of his action. God has pardoned what is past, but if anyone repeats the offence God will take vengeance on him. God is mighty, taking vengeance [Q. V, 96].

And He said:

The expiation of it [the broken oath] is to feed ten poor persons with the food you ordinarily serve to your families, or to clothe them, or to set free a slave; but if anyone finds not the means let him fast for three days [Q. V, 91].

The Apostle decreed that the owners of property are responsible for its protection during the day [from damage by the flocks], but that the responsibility for any damage done [to the property] during the night rests with the flock's owners.²⁷

²⁷ Mālik, Vol. II, pp. 747-48; Abū Dāwūd, Vol. III, p. 298; Shawkānī, Nayl al-Awṭār, Vol. V, pp. 342-44.

The Book and the sunna—as well as the absence of disagreement among the Muslims—indicate that [compensation] must be paid by the person [responsible for the damage] in accordance with the due owing to God which God imposed on men in ways that bind them, and that no one is responsible for a damage done by another. Nor is it permissible for a person to commit an offence for which another would be held liable, except in the particular case for which the Prophet laid down a sunna, such as unintentional homicide and unintentional offences against other men.

§ 551

The analogy of offence against an animal or damage to a property or the like, which I have already described, indicates that [compensation] should be paid by the offender, and it is commonly accepted that the greater [the amount of compensation] the greater the reason that it should be paid by the offender. So analogical deduction should not be applied to cases of the smaller [amount of compensation] while the greater and the [more] reasonable is abandoned. The compensation for an unintentional killing committed by a free-man against another, or any other unintentional killing or offence, should be paid by the 'āqila on the basis of both tradition and analogy.

697. Shāfi'ī said:³⁸ The Apostle decreed that the compensation for foeticide is a ghurra (a male or female slave). Scholars have estimated the price of the ghurra to be five camels.³⁹

698. [Shāfi'ī] said: Since nothing has been related from the Apostle distinguishing between the compensation for male and female foeticide, it is taken for granted that he had put them on an equal footing; if the foetus dies after abortion the compensation for the male is one hundred camels, and for the female fifty.

But it is not permissible to apply the analogy of foeticide to other cases [the compensation for which is] specific and in which a distinction is made between the female and male.

³⁸ Būlāq ed., p. 76.

³⁹ See paragraph 427; above.

Men do not disagree that if the foetus dies after abortion compensation must be full, namely, that it should be one hundred camels for the male and fifty for the female. The Muslims are agreed—as far as I know—that if a man causes the death of another none of them should be held liable to pay any diya or fine, and the [compensation for] foeticide should be paid [in like manner], whether dead or alive.

Since the Apostle made a distinction in his decision between the dead and the living, which was unknown before, other decisions should be taken on the strength of, and in obedience to, the Apostle's order.

699. He asked: Do you know of any possible explanation for that? 8 553

700. [Shāfi'ī] replied: I know of one, but God knows best!

701. He asked: What is it?

702. [Shāfi'ī] replied: If [the child] were not known to be alive—thus it would be neither necessary to pray for it nor could one inherit from it—the offence would be regarded as being against its mother and the Apostle specified [a compensation] the price of which the Muslims fixed, just as he specified [the compensation] for al-muwaddīha.

703. He said: That is one explanation.

704. [Shāfi'ī] said: Another one is that the tradition does not make it clear that the decision was made in favor [of the plaintiff]; therefore it would not be right to hold that such a decision was made [in favor of the plaintiff]. But if one holds that a decision was taken, it must be in favor of the wife not the husband (i. e., the mother, not the father) since if any offence was committed, it was against her. However, there is no decision to the effect that the child can be inherited from, for he who does not inherit cannot be inherited from.

705. He said: This is a sound opinion. 8 554

706. [Shāfi'ī] said: God knows best!

707. He asked: If this is not the [right] explanation what else should the decree mean?

708. [Shāfi'ī] replied: It is a sunna binding on men on the strength of which they should make decisions.

709. [He asked]: What should the other [i. e., analogy] be which the narrative indicates is a reason on the strength of which a decision may be made?

710. [Shāfi'i] replied: It is the binding decision of a sunna the meaning of which is known and on the strength of which analogy may be applied in like situations.

711. He asked: Give an example other than what you stated, which you may remember, illustrating how analogy may or may not be applied.

712. [Shāfi'i] replied: The Apostle decreed in [the case of] the muṣarrāt⁴⁰—the she-camel and sheep and goats which the buyer has milked after the purchase—that he can either keep it or return it with one ṣā' (a measure) of dates.⁴¹ He also decreed that "the profit (al-kharāj) belongs to him who bears responsibility."⁴²

As to "the profit belongs to him who bears responsibility," in the event a slave is bought⁴³ and a profit is derived from his employment, it would be reasonable that when a defect is discovered [the buyer] has the right to return the slave without the profit for two reasons. First, since [the slave] was not in the possession of the seller, he [the latter] should not have a share in the profit. Second, [the slave] was in my possession and the responsibility was transferred from the seller to me, so that if the slave died the loss would be borne by me. Thus if I decide to keep the slave, the profit belongs to me.

On the strength of the tradition "the profit belongs to him who bears responsibility" I hold that anything accruing from the fruits of an estate that I have purchased, the young produced by the flock and the children of a slave-woman born ⁴⁰ Al-muṣarrāt is the animal which the vendor consciously does not milk for some time before the sale so that its yield of milk will be greater after the sale. The buyer soon discovers the trick of the vendor. See Muzani, quoting Shāfi'i on the meaning of al-muṣarrāt, in Mukhtaṣar (Kitāb al-Umm), Vol. II, pp. 184-85, margin).

⁴¹ Bukhārī, Vol. II, pp. 26-27; Abū Dāwūd, Vol. III, p. 270; Shawkānī, Nayl al-Awṭār, Vol. V, pp. 226-27.

⁴³ Literally: "by me."

after her purchase, should be regarded as a profit, because all of them were produced or born after they have become the possession of the buyer, not the vendor.

Our opinion concerning the muṣarrāt is based on the Apostle's order, but this case should not be [a precedent] for analogy, because the sale transaction was made for a specific sheep carrying an unknown quantity of milk and at a specific price, and we know that [the prices of] the milk of the sheep and the she-camel vary. However, since the Apostle fixed [the price of] the unknown quantity of the milk to be one ṣā' of dates, we accept his decision [as an exceptional order].

713. [Shāfi'ī] said: If a man buys a sheep which he, after milking her, decides to keep even though it turns out to be a muṣarrāt, but after a month he finds another hidden defect in addition to the taṣriya [for which he decides to return her], he has the right to do so, and the milk belongs to him, because it is in the category of profit (kharāj) and was not included in the sale transaction, but was produced when the animal was in the possession of the purchaser; but he must give one ṣā' of dates for the milk which was in the muṣarrāt [at the time of the sale], on the strength of the Prophet's decision. Thus our opinion on [the price of] the milk of the muṣarrāt is based on a tradition, but the ownership of the milk accruing after taṣriya is determined by an analogy based on [the Prophet's ruling]: "The profit belongs to him who bears responsibility." For the taṣriya milk must be distinguished from the milk that accrued later, since the former was included in the sale transaction, while the latter accrued after the buyer had taken possession [of the sheep]; it should not [therefore] be included in the sale transaction.⁴⁴

714. Someone may ask: Is it possible that for one question two answers might be given?

715. [Shāfi'ī] replied: Yes, if it includes two or more different reasons.

S 558

716. He asked: Will you give another example?

⁴⁴ Paragraphs 715-716 are summarized in J. Schacht, Origins of Muhammadan Jurisprudence, p. 123.

717. [Shāfi'ī] replied: A woman, upon hearing of the death of her husband waits for the period of the 'idda and marries another man, but her [former] husband returns.⁴⁵ Separation [between the woman and her second husband] shall take place on the basis of the cancellation of the second marriage without resort to divorce and neither one shall be held liable for punishment. The woman has the right to keep the bride-price, but she has to wait for the period of the 'idda [before she joins her former husband]. The child [if any] belongs to his father. Neither the woman nor the [second] husband can inherit from one another.

A decision in his [the second husband's] favor—since in the explicit sense [the marriage] is lawful—gives the woman the right to keep the bride-price, to wait for the 'idda, the child [the right] to belong to his father, and waives the punishment. A decision against him [the second husband]—since in the implicit sense it is unlawful—invalidates the marriage [contract]; forbids intercourse with her after [the two spouses] have known [about the first husband], prohibits inheritance between them, and separation takes place without divorce since she was not a lawful wife.

There are many other parallel situations, such as the marriage of the woman during the period of her 'idda.

Chapter XV

[ON DISAGREEMENT (IKHTILĀF)]¹

718. He asked: I have found the scholars, in former and present times, in disagreement on certain [legal] matters. Is it permissible for them to do so?

719. [Shāfi'ī] replied: Disagreement is of two kinds: one of them is prohibited, but I would not say the same regarding the other.

720. He asked: What is prohibited disagreement?

721. [Shāfi'ī] replied: On all matters concerning which God provided clear textual evidence in His Book or [a sunna] uttered by the Prophet's tongue, disagreement among those to whom these [texts] are known is unlawful. As to matters that are liable to different interpretations or derived from analogy, so that he who interprets or applies analogy arrives at a decision different from that arrived at by another, I do not hold that [disagreement] of this kind constitutes such strictness as that arising from textual [evidence].

722. He asked: Is there any evidence which demonstrates your distinction between the two [kinds of] disagreement?

723. [Shāfi'ī] replied: Concerning [His] disapproval of disagreement,² God said:

Those who have been given the Book did not become disunited until there had come to them the Evidence [Q. XCVIII, 3].

² Būlāq ed., p. 77.

And He said:

Be not like those who became disunited and went different ways after the Evidences had come to them [Q. III, 101].

Thus [God] disapproved of [people's] disagreeing on matters concerning which they have been provided with clear [textual] evidence. As to matters which shall be decided by ijtihād, I have already given you examples such as the qibla, testimony, and the like.

724. He said: Give me some examples of matters concerning which our predecessors have disagreed in their transmission and concerning which God has provided a textual command [in His Book] liable to different interpretations. Is there any indication [in that text] as to the correct interpretation?

725. [Shāfi'i] replied: Few are the matters on which they have disagreed and concerning which we have found no evidence in the Book of God or the sunna of His Apostle, or an analogical deduction based on both or on one of them.

726. He said: Give some examples.

727. [Shāfi'i] replied: God said:

Divorced women shall keep to themselves for three [menstrual] periods (qurū') [Q. II, 228].

ʿĀ'isha said: The [term] aqrā' or "periods" [means] purity; those who agreed with her in this meaning include Zayd b. Thābit, Ibn ʿUmar and others.³ However, some of the Companions of the Prophet held that aqrā' [means] menstruation, so that the divorced woman cannot lawfully [remarry] until she performs the washing after the third menstruation.⁴

728. He said: On what ground has each based his opinion?

729. [Shāfi'i] replied: The common meaning of aqrā' [in the foregoing narratives] is periods, and the periods in this case are signs indicating to the divorced women that they are not allowed to remarry until these periods have been completed. But, in our opinion, those who held that aqrā' means menstruation believe that [God] said that these periods constitute the minimum [time-limits], because such periods separate one [menstruation] from another, just as limits are the minimums that separate things from each other. Since [the period of] menstruation is shorter than that of purity, it is more appropriate to speak of it as a period, just as the new moon marks the period of division between one month and another. He [who held this opinion] has perhaps based it on the Prophet's order that the women taken captives at *Awṭās*⁵ should wait one menstrual period before indulging in intercourse.⁶ So he concluded that the 'idda constituted an istibrā',⁷ and that the istibrā' was one menstrual period. He also made a distinction between the istibrā' of slave and free women and held that the istibrā' of the free woman followed three full menstrual periods after which she attains the state of purity, while the istibrā' of the slave-woman was achieved after one full menstrual period after which she attained purity.

730. He said: This is one school of thought; but why have you accepted a different one, since you hold that the Quranic communication is capable of two interpretations?

§ 564

731. [Shāfi'ī] replied: The new moon, which marks [the beginning of] a period of time, is a sign provided by God to indicate the months; but the period marked by the new moon is different from the [time defined by the] day and the night, since it is the sum of either twenty-nine or thirty just as the numbers thirty or twenty are totals of other numbers and have no other meaning.⁸ So if the [term] "period" (qur) means time, it consists of a number of nights and days just as the 'idda consists of a number of nights and days of menstruation and purity. Thus a period resembles limits, which may or may not be included within the thing bounded by the limits and not clearly distinguished. So [qur'] means period in a [special] sense.

732. He asked: What is that sense?

733. [Shāfi'i] replied: Menstruation means the visible discharge of blood by the womb, while purity means that the womb retains the blood so that it is no longer apparent. [Both] purity and qur' refer to the retention—not the discharge—of blood; therefore, since purity might refer to a period of time, it is more appropriate to use it in the meaning of qur'; because it refers to the retention of the blood. Thus when 'Abd-Allāh b. 'Umar divorced his wife during her menstruation, the Apostle commanded 'Umar b. al-Khaṭṭāb to order him to keep her until she achieved her state of purity, after which he could divorce her while she was in that state without entering into sexual intercourse with her. "This is the [period of the] 'idda, during which God has decreed that woman can be divorced," said the Apostle.⁹

734. Shāfi'i said: ¹⁰ This means that God said: "When you divorce women, divorce them during their 'idda" [Q. LXV, 1].

The Apostle handed down God's word that the [term] 'idda refers to [the state of] purity, not menstruation.¹¹ For God said: "[Women should wait for] three periods." So a divorced woman must wait for three periods; if the third period is prolonged, it is not lawful [for her to remarry] until she has menstruated again. If it is feared that she might not [menstruate] again, she must wait for [the prescribed] months of the 'idda. Thus the washing [after the third menstruation] has no significance, since it is a fourth consideration apart from the other three. He who holds that it is obligatory for her would be holding that if a woman remained a year or more without washing it would not be lawful for her to remarry.

Thus the opinion of him who holds that aqrā' means [periods of] purity, is closer to the meaning of the Book of God, and the language is clear as to the meanings of these words. But God knows best! S 569

735. Shāfi'ī said: ¹² 'The Prophet's order that the istibrā' of the female captive should be one menstrual period means just what it says [i. e., in the literal sense]; for if a slave woman completed a full and genuine menstrual period following a state of purity, she obviously is not pregnant. Even though blood might appear, it would not [necessarily] constitute a true menstrual period, for the latter is valid [only] when it has been completed. Therefore any period of purity that has preceded the full and valid menstruation is to be regarded as free of pregnancy in the literal sense.

Women who are observing the 'idda do so for two reasons: To accomplish the istibrā' [in the sense of clearance from pregnancy] and for a purpose other than this. When she accomplishes [in the sense of fulfilling the waiting period], she fulfils two menstrual periods and two [periods of] purity and [ends with] a third [period of] purity. If the purpose were [merely] istibrā' [in the sense of clearance from pregnancy] she would have repeated the performance of this istibrā' twice; but in addition to clearance from pregnancy there is also an obligatory [istibrā', i. e., that provided in the Book of God]. S 570-571

736. He asked: Will you cite for me other similar [cases] in which scholars have disagreed?

737. [Shāfi'ī] replied: Yes, and perhaps we can give some clearer examples. We have already partially adumbrated this subject in our discussion of the sunnas concerning which transmitters disagree, which has a bearing on the questions you have asked as well as similar matters.¹³

738. Shāfi'ī said: ¹⁴ God said:

Divorced women shall wait by themselves for three periods [Q. II, 228].

¹² Būlāq ed., p. 78.

¹⁴ Būlāq ed., p. 78.

And He said:

As for your women who have despaired of [further] menstruation, if you are in doubt, their period shall be three months, and those who have not menstruated as yet. And those who are pregnant, their term is when they are delivered of what they bear [Q. LXV, 4]:

S 572

And He said:

Those of you who die, leaving wives, they shall wait by themselves four months and ten [days] [Q. II, 234].

Some of the Companions of the Apostle said: Concerning divorced women, God prescribed that the [period of the] 'idda of those who are pregnant should be [until] they are delivered; but those whose husbands have died should observe an 'idda of four months and ten [days]. So the 'idda of the widow who is pregnant must be four months and ten [days], even if she has been delivered, so that she fulfils two 'iddas, since delivery itself does not mean the termination of the prescribed 'idda save in the case of divorce.¹⁵ They hold in effect that delivery is acquittance, while the [waiting for] four months and ten [days] is obligatory, and that the widow cannot [lawfully] remarry until the four months and ten days are completed.¹⁶ They believe that she is under obligation in two senses, and that neither one can be waived. It is as if she were subject to the claims of two men, neither one of whom invalidated the other, or if she married [one of them] during the 'idda and had intercourse with him, she would have to fulfil an 'idda before she could marry the other one.

Other¹⁷ Companions of the Apostle have held that if she [the widow] has been delivered, it is lawful for her to remarry even if her [dead] husband is not yet buried.¹⁸

¹⁵ Mālik, Vol. II, pp. 589; Bukhārī, Vol. III, p. 478; Shawkānī, Nayl al-Awṭār, Vol. VI, p. 304. See also Shāfi'ī, Kitāb al-Ummī, Vol. V, pp. 205-206.

¹⁷ "He said," is omitted.

¹⁸ Mālik, Vol. II, p. 590.

739. Shāfi'ī said: Thus the Quranic communication can be interpreted in two ways at the same time, but the most reasonable literal one is that a state of pregnancy puts an end to the 'idda.

740. [Shāfi'ī] said: The sunna of the Apostle indicates that delivery marks the end of the 'idda in the event of the death [of the husband], just as in the case of divorce. [For] Sufyān [b. 'Uyayna] has told us from al-Zuhrī from 'Ubayd-Allāh b. 'Abd-Allāh [b. 'Utba] from his father, [who related] that a few nights after the death of Subay'a al-Aslamiyā's husband, she was delivered. When Abū al-Sanābil b. Ba'kak, who was passing by, saw her, he remarked: "You have already prepared yourself for remarriage! You still have four months and ten [days] to wait." So Subay'a reported this to the Apostle, who said: "Abū al-Sanābil is not telling the truth" (or it is not as Abū al-Sanābil said) "You are already lawful, so remarry."¹⁹

741. He said: A person whose words are in conflict with the sunna has no proof. So give examples of disagreement concerning which no sunna is to be found, but concerning which there may be either textual or inferred evidence in the Qur'ān, or evidence based on analogical deduction.

742. [Shāfi'ī] replied: God said:

For those who set aside their women, their women must wait four months; if they revert, God is All-forgiving, All-compassionate. But if they resolve on divorce, then verily God is All-hearing, All-knowing [Q. II, 226-227].

The majority of the Companions of the Prophet who related from him have said that they believed that when the [period of] four months has expired, he who has set aside his wife must make a decision either to go back to her or to divorce her.²⁰ Other Companions are reported to have said that the intent to divorce [the wife] is indicated by the expiration of the four months.²¹ However, we do not possess anything on this matter from the Apostle of God. 8577

743. He asked: Which of the two opinions have you accepted?

744. [Shāfi'ī] replied: I hold that the divorce is not binding on him who has put his wife aside, and that if his wife claims her due [i. e., payment of the deferred bride-price] from him, I should not hold him liable for it until the four months had expired. When the four months had expired, I should tell him either to take her back or to divorce her. His taking her back is [indicated] by intercourse.

745. He asked: Why do you prefer this opinion over the opposite one?

746. [Shāfi'ī] replied: Because I consider it more consistent with the meaning of the Book of God and with what is reasonable.

747. He asked: Where is the evidence for it in the Book of God? 8578

748. [Shāfi'ī] replied: In God's saying: "For those who set their women aside is a wait of four months" [Q. II, 226], the literal meaning is that he upon whom God for some reason has imposed [the obligation] to wait for four months is bound to wait until the four months expire.

749. He said: It is possible that God may have given him four months in which to take her back, just as you may say [to someone]: "I have given you four more months in which to finish building this house."

750. [Shāfi'ī] replied: No one to whom this statement had been made would imagine that it meant such a thing unless it had been stipulated during the course of the conversation, for if he [the owner of the house] says: "I have given you four months," it means that he has given him four additional months and that he has no claim against him unless the four months have elapsed and the house still is not finished. He ²¹ Tirmidhī, Vol. II, p. 222; and Ibn Rushd, Bidāyat al-Mujtahid (Istanbul, 1333/1915), Vol. II, p. 83. The Hanafi school supports this point of view. Cf. Ṭabarī, Tafsīr, Vol. IV, pp. 456-99.

[the builder] cannot be accused of failing to complete the house, or of being late in completing it so long as any part of the four months remains unexpired. If the four months have completely expired [and the builder has not completed the house], he can be charged with being in default, and there may well be an indication before the expiration of the four months that the house cannot be completed by the time the four months are over.

However, there is no indication in the [act of] taking a wife back that one cannot do so before the expiration of the four months, because the performance of intercourse may take only a twinkling of an eye. So if the person, as I have explained, keeps himself apart from his wife until the four months expire, and then continues to keep himself apart, then he is answerable to God, for he should either take her back or divorce her. If there had not been any indication in the latter part of the communication that its meaning never differed from what you held, we should have preferred the first interpretation for reasons we have described, since that is the literal meaning. The Qur'ān is to be taken at its literal meaning, unless there is an indication either in the Qur'ān itself, the sunna, or the ijmā', that the true meaning is a hidden one, and not the literal meaning.

751. He asked: What is there in the tenor of the communication that supports what you have said?

752. [Shāfi'ī] replied: When God, Glorious and Mighty, said that those who put their wives aside will have four months, He added:

If they take them back, God is All-Forgiving, All-Compassionate. But if they resolve on divorce, then verily God is All-Hearing, All-Knowing [Q. II, 226-227].

So [God] laid down two rulings conjointly and without separating them; they must both take effect after the expiration of the four months, for He gave the husband the choice of either taking her back or divorce; the choice is simultaneous, neither one precedes the other. He said that the choice must be made at one time, just as in the case of something pawned [the lender would say to the owner]: "Redeem it or else I shall sell it." The two are inseparable, for in all cases [where there is a choice] between good actions one has either to choose one or the other without separating [the two alternatives].

[As for the contention that] the two alternatives should have been stated separately [on the ground that] the decision to take the wife back can be taken during the four months while the decision to divorce her [has to be made] at the end of the four months, [I should reply that] they are two judgments that have to be envisaged at the same time, and that one has plenty of time in which to take one of them but little time in which to decide on the other.

753. He asked: If he takes her back before the expiration of the four months, do you hold that it is [a valid act]?

754. [Shāfi'ī] replied: Yes, it is, just as you would say that if you paid a debt before, it was due, you would be quit of it, and you would be doing a good act in paying it of your own free will before you were required to.

755. [Shāfi'ī] asked: Do you hold that it would be wrong if every day he resolved to take her back but did not have intercourse with her until the four months had expired?

756. He replied: The determination to take her back is not consequential until he actually does so, and his taking her back is [accomplished only by the performance of] intercourse, if he is capable of it.

757. [Shāfi'ī] asked: If he performs intercourse without the intent to take her back, is he thereby freed from the obligation to divorce her, since that is the significance of intercourse?

758. He said: Yes.

S 582

759. [Shāfi'ī] asked: Likewise, if he were determined not to take her back and swore daily that he would not take her back, but then had intercourse with her for a moment before the expiration of the four months, would he no longer be bound to divorce her, even though the intercourse did mean that he intended to take her back?

760. He replied: Yes.

761. [Shāfi'ī] asked: Is not his resolve not to take her back thereby invalidated? And if he has intercourse with her for pleasure and not because he intends to take her back, does this not, in our opinion and yours, prevent him from escaping from his obligation to divorce her?

762. He replied: It is as you said, for by having intercourse with her he gives up the right to divorce her, regardless of the reason for the performance of the intercourse.

763. [Shāfi'ī] asked: How could he resolve daily to take her back and then at the end of the fourth month be obliged to divorce her, even though he had not determined to do so and had not spoken of it? Do you consider that such an opinion would be regarded as reasonable by anyone?

764. He replied: What makes it lacking in reasonableness?

765. [Shāfi'ī] asked: If a man says to his wife "By God I shall never approach you," do you think that it is as if he says: "You are divorced for four months?"

766. He replied: Supposing I should say yes?

767. [Shāfi'ī] asked: What if he had intercourse with her before [the end of] the four months?

768. He replied: No, it would not be the same as saying: "You are divorced for four months."

769. [Shāfi'ī] said: Thus the pronouncement of the oath of putting aside is not a [pronouncement of] divorce, but merely an oath that is transformed into divorce after a certain period of time. Is it permissible for any person who comprehends what he is talking about to say such a thing, unless it is based on a binding narrative?

§ 584

770. He replied: Such an argument is against you.

771. [Shāfi'ī] asked: How?

772. He replied: You hold that if the period of four months expires, he [who has put his wife aside] has either to take her back or is compelled to divorce her.

773. [Shāfi'ī] said: The oath of putting her aside does not constitute divorce, but is an oath for which God specified a period during which He forbade the husband to harm her. He imposed on him the obligation either to take her back or to divorce her, and the decision had to be made after the expiration of four months from the time he put her aside. But the period of the effectiveness of this injunction is temporary, for it compels the person concerned whichever of the two alternatives he wishes—to take her back or to divorce her. If he refuses to do either, he who has the power to do so is to take from what he can; i. e., he shall be divorced from her since it is not lawful for him to cohabit with her.

774. Shāfi'i said: ²² They [the scholars] are disagreed on [the distribution] of inheritance. Zayd b. Thābit and his followers held that each heir should be given his designated share; if any surplus remains and the deceased has no agnate ('aṣaba) ²³ relative or patron,²⁴ it goes to the Muslim community. Others have held that the residue should be given to the uterine relatives (dhawī al-arḥām). If a man is survived by [only] one sister, she inherits half of his estate and the other half is to be given to her.

§ 586

775. Someone has asked: Why would you not give the residue of the estate [to the survivors]?

776. [Shāfi'i] replied: Because of certain indications in the Book of God.

777. He asked: Where is the indication in the Book of God in support of your opinion?

778. [Shāfi'i] replied: God said:

If a man passes away and has no children, but he has a sister, she shall receive a half of what he leaves, and he is her heir if she has no children [Q. IV, 175].

And He said:

If there be both brothers and sisters, the male shall receive the portion of two females [ibid.].

Thus [God] prescribed that if the sister is the only survivor, ²² Būlāq ed., p. 80.

²³ An 'aṣaba (pl. 'aṣabāt) is a male relative of the father.

she is to receive half [of the estate of the deceased person]; if the brother is the only survivor, he is to receive the entire estate. And He prescribed that if both brothers and sisters survive the deceased, the sister's portion shall be half the brother's. His [God's] decree concerning the sister's portion, whether she is the sole survivor or survivor with a brother, is the same, [namely] that she is not on an equal footing with the brother, but receives only half of what he is entitled to receive of the inheritance. Thus if you hold that [in the event] a man dies leaving a sister as [the sole] survivor and she receives half the estate by inheritance and the other half as a residue, have you not given her the entire estate as a sole survivor, while God prescribed for her only half of it whether she was alone or with others?

779. He replied: I should not give her the other half as an inheritance but as a residue [in the absence of other survivors].

780. [Shāfi'ī] said: What is the meaning of giving her [a residue]? Is this a matter on which you can exercise istiḥsān (discretion) and give it to whomever you wish so that you may give it to the [deceased's] neighbors or to one of his distant relatives? Is that for you to decide?

781. He replied: No, that is not for the discretion of the judge, but I would give it to her [as a residue] on the grounds of her uterine relationship.

782. [Shāfi'ī asked]: Would it be as an inheritance?

783. He replied: Supposing I should say yes?

784. [Shāfi'ī] said: You would then have let her inherit what God did not.²⁵

8 598

785. He said: I hold such an opinion on the strength of God's saying:

Those who are uterine relatives are nearer to each other in the view of the Book of God [Q. VIII, 76].

786. [Shāfi'ī] said: [The Quranic communication]: "Those who are uterine relatives are nearer to one another" was revealed at a time when men were [first] entitled to inherit from one another on the basis of succession by contract, then on the basis of the Islamic faith and the hijra [emigration] so that one emigrant was entitled to inherit from another while his heirs who did not emigrate [to Madīna], notwithstanding their closer blood relationship, could not inherit. So the communication: "Those who are related, etc." was revealed [to regulate inheritance] in accordance with what [God] prescribed for them.²⁶

787. He asked, What is the evidence for that?

788. [Shāfi'ī] replied: [The communication]: "Those who are uterine relatives are nearer to one another" is the rule [of inheritance] in accordance with what [God] prescribed. Do you not agree that some of "those who are uterine relatives" inherit while others do not? The husband [who is not related in blood] receives a larger share than most of those who are uterine relatives. So if you permit people to inherit according to uterine relationship, the daughter would be on an equal footing with the brother, and all the uterine heirs would be entitled to inherit and would have a greater claim than the husband, who enjoys no uterine relationship. If the meaning of the communication were as you have described it, you would have objected to our position with respect to it, namely, that neither his sister, who is more closely related to him, nor his mawlas get all of the estate; half is given to his sister and half to his mawlas, even though they are not uterine relatives and the Book of God does not prescribe any share for them.²⁷

789. Shāfi'ī said: ²⁸ They [the scholars] have also disagreed on the grandfather's [share of inheritance]. Zayd b. Thābit, supported by 'Umar [b. al-Khaṭṭāb], 'Uthmān [b. 'Affān], 'Alī [b. Abī Ṭālib] and Ibn Mas'ūd, held that the [deceased's] brothers can inherit along with his grandfather. Abū Bakr and Ibn 'Abbās, supported by 'Ā'isha, Ibn al-Zubayr and 'Abd-

²⁶ See Ṭabarī, Tafsīr, Vol. IV, pp. 90-91; Suyūṭī, Libāb al-Nuqūl (Cairo, 1373/1954), p. 114.

Allāh b. 'Utba, hold that the grandfather is on an equal footing with the father, and they eliminate the brothers.²⁹

790. He asked: On what ground have you fixed the inheritance of the brothers on the same level with that of the grandfather? Is it on the strength of the Book of God or the sunna?

791. [Shāfi'ī] replied: I do not know of any explicit text in the Book of God or the sunna.

792. He said: The narratives are equally divided on the subject and the evidence of analogy supports those who held that [the grandfather] is on an equal footing with the father and that the brothers are debarred.³⁰

793. [Shāfi'ī] asked: What is the evidence?

794. He replied: I consider it to lie in the binding title of "fatherhood," in your [the scholars'] agreement that because of it you debar the mother's near relatives, and in your agreement that his [minimum share] is one-sixth; all of this is the ruling that applies to the father.

795. [Shāfi'ī] said: We do not believe that he should inherit only on the ground of his fatherhood.

796. He asked: Why?

797. [Shāfi'ī] replied: Because I might find that although the title of fatherhood applies [in his case] he could not inherit.

798. He asked: In what instance?

799. [Shāfi'ī] replied: If there were another father surviving—and the title of fatherhood applies to him [the grandfather] and so on back to Adam—the grandfather could not inherit. Moreover, if he were a slave, a disbeliever, or a murderer, he could not inherit. Thus, if it were only on the ground of fatherhood, he would inherit in all these instances. Our opinion that the grandfather debar the mother's near relatives is based on a narrative, not on the title of fatherhood. For we hold that the son's female descendants in the male line, no matter how small the share to which they are entitled, debar the mother's near relatives. As to [your argument that] the grandfather's share cannot be less than one-sixth, we hold that this is applicable to the grandmother also.⁸¹ In doing so we have followed a [logical] sequence, and we do not believe that if the rule applicable to the grandfather resembles that applicable to the father in certain respects, it does so in all respects. For if the latter were true, similar to those of the grandfather, the son's female descendants would enjoy rights and they would debar the mother's near relatives. The rule applicable to the grandmother is similar to that governing the grandfather in that we should not make her share less than one-sixth. § 593

²⁹ Cf. Mālik, Vol. II, pp. 510-12.

³⁰ It is the Ḥanafī's opinion which the interlocutor supports.

800. He asked: What is your argument for rejecting our opinion that the grandfather debars the [deceased's] brothers from inheritance?

801. [Shāfi'i] replied: Because it is far removed from analogical deduction.

802. He said: We thought that it was indeed [a valid] analogical deduction.

803. [Shāfi'i] replied: Do you think that the grandfather and the brother each claims to be related to the deceased or is it to someone else?

804. He asked: What do you mean?

805. [Shāfi'i] replied: Is the grandfather's [relationship] not based on his claim: "I am the father of the father of the deceased person" while the brother says: "I am the son of the deceased's father."

806. He said: That is right.

807. [Shāfi'i] asked: Does not each claim his relationship to the father in accordance with his own position in that relationship?

808. He replied: Yes. § 594

809. [Shāfi'i] asked: Supposing that the deceased person were the father, and his successors were his son and his father; what would each inherit from him?

810. He replied: The son's share would be five-sixths [of the estate] and the father's one-sixth.

811. [Shāfi'i] replied: If, as you said, the son of the deceased is entitled to inherit a greater portion of the estate than is the father of the deceased and since the claim of the deceased's brother is based on his relationship through the deceased's father, [just as] the deceased's grandfather's claim is based on his relationship through the [deceased's] father, then why do you hold that the brother is debarred by the grandfather? If one of the two is to be debarred by the other, it is the grandfather who should be debarred by the brother, since the latter is entitled to a greater portion of the estate than is he [the grandfather] to whom the two [the father and the brother] both claim to be related? Otherwise, we should never allot the brother five-sixths [of the estate] and the grandfather one-sixth.

812. He asked: What prevents you from holding such an opinion?

813. [Shāfi'ī] replied: All those [scholars] who disagree [on matters concerning inheritance] are in agreement that the grandfather [as a joint successor] with the brother is entitled to an equal or greater share than the brother. On this matter I am in full agreement with them without having recourse to analogy, since analogy is the common basis of all their rulings. § 595

I have taken the position that the brothers' right to inherit on a par with the grandfather is the more appropriate ruling in view of the evidence provided by analogy, which I have explained, as well as the opinion of the majority of jurists, ancient and modern. In addition, the brother's inheritance is firmly fixed by the [text of the] Book, while that of the grandfather is not. Furthermore, the sunna establishes the brother's inheritance more [clearly] than the grandfather's. B 51

814. He asked: I have heard your views on consensus and analogy, in addition to your opinions concerning the decrees of the Book of God and the sunna of the Apostle. What is your position concerning the opinions of the Apostle's Companions, if they disagree?

815. [Shāfi'ī] replied: We accept those which agree with the Book, the sunna, consensus, or which is soundest according to [the rules of] analogy. § 596

816. He asked: What of the opinions of a single Companion, on which neither the agreement nor the disagreement of others is known: Would you seek evidence for accepting it in the Book, or a sunna, or a ruling that people in general have accepted so that such evidence constitutes what you call a narrative?

817. [Shāfi'ī] replied: We have not found anything concerning this matter in the Book or in any established sunna, but we have found that scholars accept the opinion of one of their number at one occasion and reject it on another. They also differ concerning some of the opinions which they accept from such a person.

818. He asked: Which one would you accept?

819. [Shāfi'ī] replied: I would accept the opinion [of a Companion] if I did not find anything about it in the Book, or established sunna or consensus, or anything of similar meaning that would decisively support it, or any analogical deduction. But one seldom finds an opinion of one Companion that is not contradicted by another.³²

820. He asked: You have [rightly] made decisions on the basis of the Book and the sunna; on what ground have you made decisions on the basis of consensus and analogy, placing them on an equal footing with a [text in the] Book and a sunna?

821. [Shāfi'ī] replied: Although I have made decisions [on the basis of consensus and analogy] just as I have made decisions on the basis of the Book and the sunna, [in the case of consensus and analogy] the principle on which I made my decision varies.

822. He asked: Can there be different bases for the same decision?

823. [Shāfi'ī] replied: Yes; we make decisions on the basis of the [text of the] Book and the generally accepted sunna, concerning which there is no disagreement, and we maintain that therefore such decisions are right according to both the explicit and the implicit [meaning of these sources]. We also make decisions on the basis of a single-individual tradition on which there is no general agreement, and we hold that we have made the decision correctly according to its explicit meaning, since it is possible that he who related the tradition may have made an error in it.

We also make decisions on the basis of consensus and analogy, although the latter is the weaker of the two instruments.⁸³ Analogy is used only in case of necessity, since it is not lawful if a tradition exists, just as performing the ritual ablution with sand⁸⁴ renders one pure when one is travelling and there is no water; but it does not render one pure if water is available. It produces a state of purity only if water is not at hand. Similarly, a source other than the sunna can be used as the basis for a decision if there is no sunna. However, I have already discussed analogy and other sources [of the law].⁸⁵

824. He asked: Will you give an example?

825. [Shāfi'ī] replied: I should make a decision against a person either on the basis of my knowledge that the accusation made against him was right, or on his [own] admission. If I neither had the knowledge or if he did not confess, I should decide against him on the basis of [the testimony of] two witnesses [of just character]. Since witnesses may make mistakes or be confused, my knowledge and the [defendant's] admission would be stronger [evidence] against him than the [testimony of] two witnesses. I should [also] decide against him on the strength of [the testimony of] one witness and the [plaintiff's] oath; but [such evidence] is weaker than the [testimony of] two witnesses. I should also decide against him if he refused to take an oath whereas the plaintiff did take an oath; but [such evidence] is weaker than the [testimony of]

⁸³ Shaykh Shākir maintains that the word "weak" qualifies both consensus and analogy—which is unlikely—and argues that since Shāfi'ī held that the consensus of the people is authoritative, his reference must be to the consensus of the scholars. Cf. Shākir's ed., p. 599, note 10.

⁸⁴ Tayammum is ablution by sand during travel instead of by water. Sand as a substitute for water is lawful for fulfilling the duty of ablution if water is scarce or unavailable during travel.

one witness and the oath, since the accused's refusal might have been the result of his fear for his reputation or his feeling that the matter was too insignificant for an oath, whereas he who did swear an oath on his own behalf might be a covetous or debauched person.

SELECT BIBLIOGRAPHY

It is the purpose of this bibliography neither to compile and set forth a complete list of works on Islamic jurisprudence nor to reproduce all those cited in the footnotes, but rather to provide the fundamental primary and modern works on the life and jurisprudence of Shāfi'i and those that have a bearing on the substance of the Risāla in particular. Fairly exhaustive bibliographies of classical works can be found in Ḥajjī Khalifa's Kashf al-Zunūn, ed. G. L. Flügel (Leipzig and London, 1835-58); Ibn al-Nadīm's Kitāb al-Fihrist, ed. G. L. Flügel (Leipzig, 1871); and C. Brockelmann's Geschichte der arabischen Literatur (Leiden, 2nd ed., 1944-49). For a modern critical study of the historical origins of Islamic jurisprudence, the reader may refer to J. Schacht's Origins of Muhammadan Jurisprudence (Oxford, 1950) and Law in the Middle East, eds. M. Khadduri and H. J. Liebesny (Washington, D. C., 1955). For an exposition of Islamic law in general, and the Shāfi'i system in particular, there are available David Santillana's Istituzioni di diritto musulmano malichita, con riguardo anche al sistema schiafi'ta (2 vols.; Roma, 1938) and Theodor W. Juynboll's, Handbuch des islamischen Gesetzes nach der lehre der Schafi'itischen Schule (Leiden, 1910). The reader may also refer to the relevant articles in the Encyclopaedia of Islam (old and new editions) and the Shorter Encyclopaedia of Islam.

PREFATORY NOTE

IN the preface to his edition of the Fath el Karib in 1894, Mr. L. W. C. Van den Berg remarked that "from year to year European control over Moslem peoples is extending, so that it is unnecessary to insist upon the importance of rendering the two works that form the basis of the legal literature of the School of Shafii accessible, not only to a small number of Arabic scholars, but also to magistrates and political agents" to whom that language is for the most part unfamiliar. This being as true now as it was twenty years ago it is thought advisable to publish an English translation of the other and larger work referred to, the Minhaj et Talibin, which "occupies the first rank for deciding legal cases." In the preface to his edition of this treatise, published in 1882 at Batavia by the Government of the Netherlands Indies, Mr. Van den Berg explained that the French version, of which this book is a rendering into English, was not a mere literal translation of the concise Arabic text, which would have been unintelligible, but a paraphrase, based partly upon the Moharrer and the Commentary of Mehalli, and partly upon the two principal sixteenth-century commentaries on the Minhaj et Talibin—that is to say, the Tohfah-el-Mohtaj and the Nihayat el Mohtaj. It is not always possible to decide a question by reference to the Minhaj alone; and in such a case a Muhammadan jurist—alim, fakih, mufti or kadi, as it may be—has recourse principally to the Tohfa and the Nihaya, which Dr. Th. Juynboll, in his Handbuch des islamischen Gesetzes, 1910, calls "the two standard works in the whole modern Fikh-literature of the School of Shafii." It is hoped, therefore, that the present publication may be of some practical utility in the direction above indicated, and at the same time not without interest to the student of comparative jurisprudence.

INTRODUCTION

IN THE NAME OF GOD, THE MERCIFUL, THE COMPASSIONATE

GLORY to God, the good, the generous, whose blessings are too manifold to be numbered ; who poureth forth abundantly His grace and His justice, Who leadeth us in the right way ; Who maketh to profit in the study of the divine law those His servants towards whom He showeth kindness, and whom He hath chosen.

To Him I offer praise the most high, the most perfect, the most pure, the most complete. I bear witness that there is none other god but He alone, whose power none shareth ; that He is the One that loveth to pardon. And I bear witness that Muhammad is His servant and His preferred and chosen Apostle. God grant him His grace and His blessing, and crown him in heaven with favour and honour.

Now, the best way to manifest obedience towards God and make right use of precious time is assuredly to devote oneself to the study of the law. And many of our learned men of blessed memory have already published with this object concise but exhaustive works, of which in my opinion the best is the Moharrar of the imam Abu Kasim er Rafii, an authority whose accuracy is beyond question. It is a book of the very greatest usefulness, upon whose authority may rely not only the jurist anxious to ascertain the veritable doctrine of our school, but also any other person who seeks to instruct himself by obtaining information from it. Rafii intended to include in his work nothing which had not already been established by the majority of authorities, and he may be said to have remained faithful to this programme, in spite of the great difficulty of carrying it out.

Its prolixity, however, is an obstacle to this work being learnt by heart, except perhaps by some persons who devote themselves exclusively to the study of law, and consequently it appeared to me to be useful to compose an abridgment of it, in length not more than about half of the original volume, but introducing—if God will—some improvements.

In the number of these improvements should principally be mentioned the four following : In the first place, I have everywhere indicated the reservations, that are sometimes not indicated in the Moharrar. Secondly, it will be easy for me to quote from the Moharrar several passages in manifest opposition to the doctrine preferred in our school, as the reader will see, if it please God. In the third place, I shall replace by others clearer and more correct all the little used expressions employed by Rafii, as well as those that might suggest erroneous ideas, either because he wished to be too explicit, or because he was not sufficiently so. Finally, in cases where there is divergence of opinion among authorities I shall give an impartial exposition of the two opposing theories, the two sides from which one may consider the question in dispute, and the two methods of reasoning adopted in order to solve it ; and then I will also, where there is occasion for it, quote separately the decisions of our imam Shafii, and note the relative value of the different appreciations.

In order to avoid any subsequent misunderstanding I hereby notify the reader that in the course of the work I shall employ the words el adhhar and el mashur to designate the doctrine which appears to me preferable, with this difference that I shall use el adhhar wherever the doctrine I reject is widely accepted, but otherwise el mashur. Similarly the words el asahh and es sahih will indicate what, in my opinion, is the better way of regarding and resolving a question ; with this difference that where there are to be found authorities of repute who incline to the contrary opinion, I shall use the word el asahh, but otherwise es sahih. The word el mazhab will indicate the system which merits the preference in our school ; while en nass will denote the personal opinion of our imam Shafii, even where his reasoning may appear to me to be weak, or in the case of an isolated decision. The word el-jedid means that in his first period, i.e. during his stay in Irak, Shafii was of the contrary opinion ; and the words el-kadim and fi kawl kadim indicate that the theory quoted was abandoned by that imam in his second period, i.e. during his stay in Egypt. The expression kil kaza denotes that this way of regarding and resolving a question is not to be recommended, and that most authorities come to another conclusion, whether the method I disapprove is or is not defended by authorities of repute ; and I employ the words fi kawl to mean that nearly all authorities have expressed the contrary opinion. And lastly, I must warn the reader that I begin all insertions of my own by the word kultu, and terminate them by the phrase wallahu aalam.

In case of words or orthographic signs that have been added or intercalated, the reader may rely upon it that the matter was incontestable and the insertion absolutely necessary. Similarly, wherever he may meet with a form of glorifying God differing from that in the Moharrar or other books upon jurisprudence, he may rest assured that I have verified it from the most authoritative collections of traditions.

And, finally, to some questions I have assigned another place in their section, without keeping to the order in the Moharrar, either because I thought them better placed so, or because I wished to be more concise. I have even taken the liberty to invert the order of whole sections, in order to improve the general arrangement.

In consequence of what I have said I hope that this abstract will be at the same time a veritable commentary upon the Moharrar ; for, on the one hand, I have omitted absolutely none of the rules and controversies discussed in that work, however small their importance, and, on the other hand, I believe that I have considerably improved it.

Moreover, I have already begun a work which will contain a discussion of all the debatable points in this abstract, a work in which I explain why I have sometimes had to depart from the text of the Moharrar, and sometimes added a reservation or a conditional modification, etc. But in almost all cases these changes were absolutely necessary and indisputable.

God, the generous, is my sole helper ; in Him I put my trust ; upon Him I lean. To Him I address my prayer, that He may cause to grow from my labour some benefit to myself and to all other believers ; that He may be satisfied with me, my friends, and all the faithful.

NOTE

(SEE INTRODUCTION, PAGE xii)

THE following four signs indicate doctrines considered by Nawawi to be preferable to the contrary opinion.

* = adhhar (clearer), where the doctrine rejected is widely accepted.

 = mashhur (well known), where this is not the case.

† = asahl (surer), where the contrary is maintained by authorities of repute.

†† = sahih (authentic), where this is not so.

(The signs immediately precede the passages to which they relate.)

The personal opinions of Nawawi are inclosed in square brackets [].

MINHAJ ET TALIBIN: A MANUAL OF MUHAMMADAN LAW

BOOK I.—LEGAL PURITY

CHAPTER I.—GENERAL PROVISIONS

GOD has said in the Koran—"We make clear water for cleansing come down from heaven." Thus to remove any impurity, whether slight or serious, it is necessary to make use of "water" in the proper sense of the word, a liquid that can be described as "water" without modification. Water whose nature has been altered by the addition of some foreign substance, such as saffron, loses its purifying quality, for the alteration prevents its being any longer described simply as "water." On the other hand a modification that does not prevent a liquid being still called "water" does not affect its purifying quality; and consequently mere stagnancy, or mud, or moss, or some accidental object in a basin or a pipe, are of no consequence. And in the same way the introduction of substances that do not dissolve, such as aloes or grease or sand, cannot be regarded as modifying the nature of water.

It is blamable to proceed to purification with water heated by the sun, or with water that has already been used for an obligatory purification. According to some authors Shafii, in his Egyptian period, sustained that even water used for a purification not legally prescribed must on that account be considered improper for any ritual use, if the quantity does not amount to two kollah. So considerable a quantity cannot itself become impure by contact with impure substances, unless its nature is thereby modified.

The impurity of water ceases with the adulteration that causes it, whether it regains its original quality of itself, or by an increase in the quantity of liquid; but if the impurity has merely been rendered imperceptible by the addition of musk, saffron, sand, or plaster, the water continues to be unsuitable for purification, as the impurity itself has not been removed.

A quantity of less than two kollah becomes impure by contact, but as soon as the amount is increased to this minimum the water becomes suitable for purification, if the impurity was unaccompanied by any adulteration of the quality. On the other hand, impure water, to which water suitable for purification has been added, remains impure until the minimum has been reached; but according to some jurists the mixture should be considered pure, though unsuitable for purification, if the quantity of impure is less than that of pure water.

As an exception to the foregoing rules the body of a bloodless insect does not render a liquid impure. And one jurist is of opinion that nothing we have just said applies to impurity so slight as to be inappreciable.

[*In this latter opinion I concur.]

Running water is subject to the same rules as stagnant water, at least this is so according to the opinion expressed by Shafii in his second period, though that Imam at first admitted that running water can never become impure, unless by adulteration, however small the quantity of liquid.

†Two kollah are equal to about five hundred ratal of Baghdad.

The adulteration of water due to a change from a state of purity to one of impurity is shown by taste, colour, and smell; and when it is at first impossible to distinguish the pure from the impure, one must decide as best one can which of the two one ought to use, and then purify oneself with that one believed to be pure. This course, however, according to some jurists, is not lawful if other water can be procured whose purity is not subject to doubt. *A blind man is subject to these rules relating to the examination of the liquid. If of two liquids that resemble one another one is water and the other urine††, it is of no use attempting an examination, and recourse must be had to purification by sand, after mixing the contents of the two vessels. And finally if it is a question of water and rose-water, both pure, one washes first with one and then with the other; though some authors maintain that even in such a case one should first carefully ascertain the nature of the liquid to be used.

When one of two similar liquids has been chosen and used, the other must be thrown away, in order that no other believer, coming in his turn to perform his ablutions, may be assailed by the same doubts. Should this not have been done, and should a mistaken choice be believed to have been made, still the purification should not be repeated with the other liquid—such at least is Shafii's personal opinion. †But in such a case purification by sand also should be performed. A warning that a liquid is impure should be accepted, if grounds are given for it and it comes from a person worthy of confidence, and even without grounds if coming from a jurist of the school of which one is a follower.

Any sort of vessel may be used for the purpose of ablution so long as it is clean, except vessels of gold and silver, †of which the very acquisition is forbidden. †This prohibition does not include vessels merely gilt or silvered *or of valuable material or adorned with jewels, but does include such as are mounted or inlaid with gold or silver, if the precious metal is in great quantity and solely for ornament. †Thus it does not apply to the three following cases :—(1) if the gold or silver forms only a small part of the vessel and is of some use ; (2) †if the quantity is very small, even when solely for ornament ; (3) †if the quantity is considerable, provided it is of some use. †The position of the gold or silver is immaterial.

[The use of vessels mounted or inlaid with gold is totally forbidden by our school.]

CHAPTER II.—CAUSES OF SLIGHT CORPORAL IMPURITY

SECTION 1

THERE are four of these causes.

1. The issue from the body, by the urinary or stercorary passage, of any substance except sperm. As to matter from a wound, a fistula, an incision or any other opening in the proximity of the stomach, the following distinctions have been established :—(a) when either passage is obstructed and the opening is below the stomach, any issue—*even if accidental, e.g. a tænia—impairs the purity of the body ; (b) when either passage is obstructed and the opening is above the stomach, or (c) when neither is obstructed and the opening is below, *the purity of the body is unaffected.

2. Loss of consciousness, except by sleep in a sitting posture.

3. Contact between a man and a woman, *except when marriage between them would be prohibited on account of relationship, etc. *The impurity affects the person touching as much as the person touched. †Contact with a girl under age, and in general a very slight touch, as of hair, teeth, or nails, cause no impurity.

4. Touching with the palm of the hand the private parts of any human being, including oneself, or even, according to the opinion of Shafii in his second period, the anus ; but not including the parts of an animal. Touching the private parts of a corpse, of a child under age, or of a eunuch or mutilated person, cause impurity ; †as does also a touch with a mutilated hand. †But touching with the finger tips, and taking the parts between the fingers, do not cause impurity.

All persons in a state of impurity are forbidden—

1. To pray.

2. To walk round the holy temple at Mecca.

3. To carry the Koran, or touch its leaves, ††for binding. Such persons may not even touch a bag or box containing the sacred volume, †for a slate upon which any text has been written as an exercise. †They may carry the Koran among and at the same time with other objects, or carry a commentary, or gold pieces engraved with texts ; but they may not turn over the leaves of a Koran, even with a piece of wood. †These provisions do not apply to a child under age.

[†It is permissible to turn over the pages of a Koran with a piece of wood ; at least it has been so decided by jurists of Irak.]

A person who was at first assured of his state of purity, but who afterwards suspects that he is affected by a slight impurity, should conform to what he considers to be certain, and not concern himself with ulterior doubts. This rule holds good also in the inverse case, i.e. when a person is at first assured of being affected by a slight impurity, but is afterwards attacked by doubts as to the result of his examination. Finally, where he perceives he has been alternately pure and impure, without remembering which state had the priority, he should first try to recollect the state he was in before the question arose, and then consider himself as being in the contrary condition.

SECTION 2

Latrines must be entered left foot first, and quitted right foot first. No object upon which the name of God is inscribed should be taken there. One should squat down leaning rather on the left foot, and if possible avoid turning either face or back in the direction of Mecca, either position being rigorously forbidden on a desert plain where it is possible to choose any direction. To relieve a want of nature one should retire and conceal oneself from the public view. It is forbidden to pass urine into stagnant water, or into a hole, or so that the liquid is dispersed by the wind, or at a meeting place, or on the public road, or under a fruit tree, or while speaking to any one. After evacuation one should not wash oneself at the same place. When passing water care should be taken that all the urine is passed out of the body.

The following words are used on entering latrines : “ In the name of God. O God, I seek refuge with Thee against male and female demons ” ; and on leaving, “ I beseech Thy forgiveness. Praise to God that has kept evil afar from me and preserved me.” Cleansing, after evacuation, can be effected either with water or with stones, but better with both. By "stone" is here understood any hard, clean object that can be used to remove filth and thrown away; *even a tanned piece of leather may lawfully be employed for this purpose. The use of stones alone suffices only when the excrement is not dry; but may be considered sufficient although extraordinary matters such as blood are excreted, or in spite of the excretion of an extraordinary quantity of matter, provided that the impurity does not extend beyond the sides of the orifice.

The rubbing with stones is three times repeated, either with three different stones, or with three sides of the same stone. A dirty stone must be cleansed before use. The Sonna insists upon each of the three cleansings being done separately. Each stone should be used in cleansing the whole of the part of the body requiring to be cleansed; though some jurists recommend apportioning the three stones, or three ends of the same stone, between the two sides and the middle. The Sonna requires the cleansing to be done with the left hand. *In the case of the excretion of a tænia, or of hard matters, a cleansing is not strictly necessary.

CHAPTER III.—ABLUTION

THE following things are necessary to constitute a valid ablution:—

1. The intention to remove an impurity; or the intention to enable oneself to accomplish an act, for the validity of which bodily purity is a requisite; or the intention to perform ablution as a duty prescribed by law.†† If a person is in a state of chronic impurity, e.g. a woman whose menses are prolonged beyond the legal term, there can of course be no intention to remove an impurity whose removal is an impossibility; but the intention to render licit the act one desires to accomplish suffices in all cases.†† An intention to cool oneself by washing may be combined with the religious purpose here treated of;† but it is illicit to combine the intention to accomplish an obligatory purification with a purpose to perform an ablution which is merely recommended, e.g. for the recitation of the Koran. The intention is formulated at the moment of proceeding to the ablution of the face; though some learned authors maintain that, following the example of the Prophet, it may be formulated before this.† It is not necessary that the intention should refer to the entire ablution, it may be formed at the washing of each separate member of the body.

2. The washing of the face, i.e. the part of the head comprised from top to bottom between the place where the hair usually begins and the extremity of the lower jaw-bones, and from right to left between the ears. This includes also the part of the forehead upon which the hair falls down, and the part of the head where the hair has been cut ; but does not include the temples, i.e. the two white spots to right and left of the forelocks.

[A part of the head where the hair has been cut is rightly considered by nearly all learned men as belonging to the top of the head and not to the face.]

It is necessary to wash eyelashes, eyebrows, whiskers, moustache and imperial, both the hair and the skin covered by it. Some jurists, however, contend that it is not obligatory to wash the skin covered by the imperial when the latter is thick ; and all agree that the beard need be washed like the eyelids, etc., only when it is thin, but, otherwise, merely on the surface. One learned author has even advanced the opinion that a special ablution of the beard, and in general of all the hair on the face, is not obligatory.

3. The washing of the hands and arms up to the elbows. If one has lost part of a hand, one should wash what remains. The stump should be washed, if an arm has been amputated below the elbow ; but if above, an ablution is not necessary, though always to be recommended.

4. The passing of the moistened hand over the skin of the top of the head, or if that be impossible over the hair covering it.† A proper washing, is of course, also quite licit ; and the head may also be moistened while keeping the hand closed, if necessary.

5. The washing of the feet, including the ankles.

6. The observing of the prescribed order.† If any one, instead of practising a mere ablution, prefers to take a bath, for the purpose of removing an impurity, this is permitted ; provided that the prescribed order is observed in plunging into the water, and one remains there some time, but not otherwise. [†Even a hurried bath is in all cases sufficient.]

The following practices have been introduced by the Sonna :—

1. The use of teeth-cleaners, or other hard substance capable of taking their place,† except fingers. This is particularly to be recommended before prayer and when the taste in the mouth is changed ; but it can be practised at any time, except when fasting in the afternoon.

2. Beginning ablution by pronouncing the formula, “In the name of God.” If neglected at the beginning the omission may be rectified by pronouncing the formula in the middle.

3. Washing the hands before commencing the ritual ablution. It is even considered blamable to dip the hands in a basin containing water for the ablution of several persons, without first washing them three times, unless one is sure they are quite clean.

4. Rinsing the mouth and cleansing the nostrils with water. *It is well to do these separately ; †first taking water three times in the hollow of the hand for rinsing, and then three times for the other purpose. Except in the case of persons fasting, these two practices are as a rule observed by every one. [*It is preferable to combine them, taking water in the palm of the hand three times for the two together.]

5. Repeating all ablutions and moistenings three times.

6. Resolving any doubt as to the validity or number of ablutions, by coming to a definite conclusion one way or the other.

7. The moistening of the whole head and ears ; though it is enough to moisten the turban if it is difficult to take off.

8. Separation of the hairs of the beard if it is very thick ; and even the fingers and toes.

9. The washing of the right side before the left.

10. Extending the ablution of the face upon the skin covered by hair ; as well as that of the arms and feet above the elbows and ankles.

11. Completion of the ablution without interruption, a precept which Shafii in his first period even called obligatory.

12. Performance of the ablution without the assistance of other persons.

13. Abstention from shaking the water off the body, †for removing it with a sponge or other similar object.

14. Terminating the ablution by pronouncing the following formula :—" I witness that there is no other god than God alone, whose power is shared by none. I witness that Muhammad is His servant and apostle. O God, receive me amongst them that repent, that keep themselves from sin, Thy holy servants. Glory to Thee, O God ! I praise Thee, and witness yet again that there is no other God but Thee. I implore Thy forgiveness. I turn again unto Thee."

[I intentionally omit the formulas given in the Muharrar for repetition by the believer during the ablution of the different parts of the body, as their authority has not been established.]

CHAPTER IV.—MOISTENING OF FOOT-GEAR

THE ablution of the feet may be replaced by that of the foot-gear, if not worn for more than a day and a night during a stay at a fixed abode, or more than three days and three nights when on a journey. This indulgence applies only to a case where the impurity has been incurred after the feet have been covered. When setting out on a journey after moistening the foot-gear at home, or vice versâ, the shorter interval of one day and one night must be observed. It is also necessary that the feet should be thoroughly cleansed before being covered ; that every part of the feet requiring ablution should be covered ; that the foot-gear should be quite clean when put on ; and that the same foot-gear should be able to last to the end of the way. It is also necessary that the march or journey should have some object ; and some jurists insist further that there must be a legal right to use the foot-gear worn.

†Permeable foot-gear, *e.g. the slippers called jermuk, cannot be moistened ; †but a torn sole is no objection, if properly fastened.

The Sonna insists on the foot-gear being moistened from top to bottom with the fingers, as if one were tracing lines on it ; but it is strictly sufficient to moisten the part of the foot-gear corresponding to that portion of the foot of which ablution is prescribed, except only the sole of the foot and heel which it is not the practice to moisten, at least according to the teaching of our school. [This rule applies to the edges, as well as to the sole.]

Moistening of the foot-gear is not permissible if there is any doubt as to the time not being yet passed ; nor in the case of grave impurity, where the clothes must be changed and a bath taken before the indulgence of moistening the foot-gear can again be had recourse to. And when foot-gear that has been moistened is changed, the feet must be washed ; and also the head and arms, according to one author.

CHAPTER V.—BATHING

BATHING, or general ablution of the body, is necessary on all occasions when a person is affected with grave impurity. These occasions are :—

1. Death.
2. Menstruation.
3. Lochia ; †and confinement in general, even when unaccompanied by evacuation.
4. Sexual penetration.
5. Any effusion of semen ; recognisable by emission, sensation, odour, or appearance. In the absence of these signs no bath is necessary.

In all that concerns grave impurity a woman is subject to the same rules as a man. In a state of grave impurity it is illicit to accomplish the three religious acts prohibited to persons affected by any impurity ; and in addition it is forbidden to remain in a mosque, though one may walk through ; and forbidden to recite the Koran, though one may pronounce a few words from the sacred volume, if solely to glorify God.

For the validity of the bath there must be :—

1. An intention to remove a grave impurity, or to enable oneself to accomplish an act requiring a previous bathing, or to take the bath as a duty prescribed by law. This intention must be formulated at the moment of entering the bath.

2. A washing of all parts of the body, both the skin and the hair covering it; but rinsing of the mouth and cleansing of the nostrils, acts required as we have seen by the Sonna in ordinary ablution, are unnecessary.

It may be added, however, that the best way of taking a bath is as follows :—

1. Begin by removing all filth from the body.
2. Then perform ablution; except that according to one author washing of the feet should be deferred until the end.
3. Wash carefully in all the folds of the skin, especially in places more liable to perspiration.
4. Pour water on the head.
5. Separate the hair of the head and beard, by passing the wet fingers through them.
6. Give priority to the right side.
7. Rub the whole body.
8. Repeat the whole three times.

A woman subject to menstruation should also rub with musk any parts of the body that bear traces of blood, or if she has no musk with any other perfume.

The Sonna does not insist on a fresh bath for each act requiring bodily purity, but does insist upon an ordinary ablution before performing such act, even when no impurity has knowingly been incurred since the last ablution. It has also ruled that the quantity of water for an ordinary ablution should not be less than one modd, and for a bath not less than one saa; in neither case is any maximum prescribed. A person affected with grave material impurity should first remove the filth from the part concerned, and then take a ritual bath as a mere bath does not suffice. Whether the impurity incurred is grave or slight, ritual ablution must be practised as well as a bath. [†The bath alone is always sufficient.]

A person wishing to take a bath for a grave impurity at the same time as the prescribed Friday's bath may lawfully perform these two duties simultaneously, provided that his intention applies to both.

[According to our school a bath alone is sufficient, even in the case of a person who has incurred both grave and slight impurity, irrespective of which has been first incurred.]

CHAPTER VI.—THINGS IMPURE IN THEMSELVES

THINGS not accidentally but essentially impure are :—

1. Every intoxicating liquid.
2. Dogs and pigs ; and any animal born of the copulation of a dog or a pig with any other—even a pure—animal.
3. Animals dead from natural causes, or killed otherwise than in accordance with the law relating to that matter. Only human corpses, and the bodies of fishes and locusts, remain pure, however death has been caused.
4. Blood, pus, vomit and droppings.
5. Urine and any other liquid issuing from the genitals of a living being ; †including sperm, except human sperm. [†The sperm of all living things is pure, except that of animals mentioned in 2.]
6. The milk of animals not eaten by man ; but not a woman's milk.

Everything that comes or has been cut from a living thing is considered, so far as regards its purity or impurity, as the body itself, after such thing has ceased to live ; except the hair of animals that may be eaten ; for these are considered pure, however the animal came by its death. †In the same way a clot of blood, a bit of chewed meat, or the natural moisture of a woman's private parts, are not impure.

Essential impurity cannot disappear in any way ; but it is otherwise with accidental impurity. An exception, however, is admitted in the case of wine that has changed into vinegar of itself, i.e. without the use of chemicals. †This is accepted as pure, even if the change is due to transference from a sunny to a shady place, or vice versâ. But if, on the contrary, wine changes to vinegar on the introduction of some substance producing that effect, it remains impure.

An animal's skin, rendered impure by its death, may be purified by tanning either outside or inside. By "tanning" is understood the removal of everything superfluous by corrosives, but not by sun-heat or sand. †The use of water is not necessary to insure the legal effect of tanning. Moreover leather soiled after tanning is in the same condition as a piece of cloth or other object become accidentally impure, that is to say that this impurity can be removed by a thorough cleaning ; it is only the impurity caused by contact with a dog, or with something that has come from a similar animal, that necessitates purification of a special kind. Now in this latter case the object must be washed seven times, and one of these seven ablutions must be performed with sand, *a substance specially prescribed for this purification. †Sand that is impure or has been mixed with liquid cannot be used for this purpose. *In reference to this matter contact with a pig is regarded in the same way as that with a dog. The impurity caused by the urine of a little boy not yet weaned can be removed by a mere washing of the soiled object ; but in cases of impurity other than the two we have just specified, if it has left no perceptible trace water must be passed over it, and if it has then purification must be continued until at least there remains no noticeable odour. Traces of colour or smell need not prevent use of the object, if it is impossible or difficult to remove them. One authority, however, insists that the odour should be entirely got rid off. [††When traces of impurity are left, both in colour and smell, the object cannot lawfully be used.]

†For an efficient washing it is enough to pour water on the object ; it is not always necessary to soak the object in water, or press it with the fingers or wring it out ; *while water flowing off an object washed without pressing, etc., remains pure after the impurity of the object has disappeared, provided there has been no modification of quality.

Purification of liquid matter is impossible, though some authors assert that grease is an exception to this rule, at least when of a nature to admit of washing.

CHAPTER VII.—ABLUTION WITH SAND

SECTION 1

RECOURSE may be had to ablution with sand, whether for slight or grave impurity, in the following cases :—

1. If there is no water. The traveller who is sure of this can at once have recourse to ablution with sand ; he need not first search the neighbourhood ; but if it is a mere supposition, he should first search his luggage, or make inquiries from his companions. If in a plain he should look around him ; and if the ground be hilly search the vicinity as far as the horizon. Only if all his efforts are without success, is he permitted—when uncertain of the absence of water—to practise ablution with sand. †When not on a journey, the absence of water at a place, once ascertained, does not dispense with the necessity of another search on a second ablution becoming requisite ; because water may in the interval have risen at a spot where previously there was none. If there is known to be water at so short a distance that a traveller in case of necessity would be willing to leave his route in order to reach it, then he must do so, unless he fear thereby to endanger his person or property, for in this latter case also ablution with sand is permitted. If the certainty of being able to obtain water is acquired only at the last moment before the time prescribed for prayer, it is better to defer the accomplishment of this religious duty and go and get the water, rather than to rest content with an ablution with sand. *On the other hand, if it is not a certainty but a mere supposition that is formed at the last moment, it is better to pay no heed to it and proceed at once to perform the ablution with sand. When there is some water, but in insufficient quantity for an ablution, still one should make use of it, rather than have recourse to ablution with sand ; and water should even be purchased if this can be done at a reasonable price, unless the money is needed to pay a debt that is due, or for travelling expenses, or for the keep of persons or animals in one's charge. †An offer of water, or of a bucket to draw it with, must be accepted ; but an offer of money with which to buy it need not. If one has forgotten to bring water with one, or left the skin containing it amongst one's luggage and cannot find it after a careful search, ablution with sand is lawful ; *but in that case the prayer or other act of devotion must be repeated when the liquid is found. This repetition is not necessary if it is the luggage itself that cannot be found amongst that of other travellers.

2. If the water one has is required for drinking by the persons and animals in one's charge, either immediately or in the near future.

3. In the case of an ill or wounded person, if it is feared the patient may die in consequence of an ablution with water, or may lose the use of a limb. *This rule even extends to the case where an ablution, by aggravating a malady or an injury, might retard the cure, or disfigure some part of the body ordinarily exposed like the face. For the purpose of ablution extreme cold is regarded in the same way as a malady. In all cases where the use of water is dispensed with, ablution with sand must be practised upon any diseased or injured limb not covered with a bandage ; and it still remains necessary, according to our school, to proceed to the ablution with water of all those parts of the body that are healthy or sound. In these circumstances a person who has incurred grave impurity has the option of beginning with sand or water as he pleases ; for these are a substitute for bathing, a religious duty that does not require the observance of any definite order in the purification of the parts of the body. †On the other hand, a person who has incurred a slight impurity must perform the ablution with sand, only at the proper moment at which the prescribed order requires the washing of the diseased or injured limb ; and so, should there be two injured limbs, they must be separately purified, carefully observing the prescribed order. If a part of the skin is covered over, as by splints that cannot be removed, the exposed part of the body must be washed, and the rest cleansed in the way we have explained. The splints, too, must be completely moistened and wiped ; though, according to some opinions, a part is enough. When it is necessary to proceed to a second ablution in order to prepare for the accomplishment of another religious obligation, where no impurity has intervened since the first ablution ; the sick person, if on the earlier occasion he had incurred grave impurity, and consequently performed ablution in place of a bath, need not wash the sound limbs when practising the second. But if, on the contrary, the sick person had on the first occasion incurred only slight impurity, he must, on the second, again wash those limbs which, in the prescribed order, have their turn after the diseased or injured limbs. Some authors support the view that in both cases the ablution of all sound limbs should be repeated ; others contend that the indulgence accorded to a sick person previously affected with grave impurity should be applied equally when the impurity is merely slight. [†I prefer the latter doctrine.]

SECTION 2

Any kind of sand can be used for ablution, even medical powder, or sand mixed with dust ; but not mineral powder, nor pounded pottery, nor sand mixed with flour, etc. Some, however, are of opinion that the use of sand mixed with other substances is licit, if they are present only in very small quantity. ††The use of sand that has already served for a previous ablution is illicit, whether it still adheres to the body †or not. It is necessary that the sand should be specially obtained for the purpose of ablution. Thus sand swept up by the wind and blown upon a person about to practise ablution cannot legally be utilised, even if it be shaken upon the member to be rubbed with the special intention of accomplishing that duty. It is, however, permissible to be assisted in the ablution by another person ; though some authorities admit this only if one is prevented from performing it oneself.

The essentials to a proper performance of ablution with sand are :—

1. An actual removal of the sand to the limbs ; †i.e. it must be carried from the face to the hand, or vice versâ.

2. An intention to prepare oneself for prayer. A mere intention to remove an impurity incurred, †or to practise ablution as a religious duty, is of no value. It is formulated at the moment of carrying the sand to the limbs, ††and should continue until some part of the face is rubbed. When the intention is directed both to an obligatory and also to an additional prayer, then both of these become licit by the fact of a single ablution. An ablution, practised with the intention of making an obligatory prayer, will serve either for this or for an additional (i.e. optional) prayer ; but if the intention refers only to an optional prayer, or even merely to a prayer in general, it can in that case be succeeded only by an optional and not by an obligatory prayer—at least according to our school.

3. A rubbing, first of the face and then of the hands and forearms with the elbows. The law does not insist on the sand reaching the roots of the small hairs that cover these parts of the body.

†When carrying the sand to the limbs it is not necessary to observe any order of succession among the different parts of the body ; and this principle even goes so far that it is quite permissible to plunge both hands at the same time in the sand, and to rub the face with the right hand, and then the right hand with the left hand.

In ablution by sand the following acts are considered recommendable :

1. Beginning by uttering the words “ In the name of God.”

2. Rubbing both face and hands twice. [†It was the personal opinion of Shaffi that this repetition is obligatory, even when a rag or something similar is used to rub with.]

3. Always giving priority to the right side of the body over the left.

4. Rubbing the face from above downwards.

5. Using no more than the necessary amount of sand, and throwing away the rest.

6. Completing the ablution without interruption, as is the case for a ritual ablution. [This rule applies also to the bath, where it is considered recommendable to begin by separating the fingers. When rubbing the hands for the second time a ring must be laid aside.]

When a person finds water, after having had recourse to ablution by sand because he thought there was none, the two following cases must be distinguished.

1. If the water is found before beginning the prayer, the ablution by sand is annulled, and one proceeds to the ritual ablution, if there be no obstacle to such use of the water found, e.g. if it be not required for drinking.

2. If the water is not perceived until after the prayer is begun. Here it is necessary again to distinguish two possibilities :—(a) if the time legally allowed for the prayer in question permits of completing the ablution and after it another prayer, then these should be undertaken, and the ablution by sand is annulled ; and (b) if it is impossible to do this within the prescribed time, in which case the ablution by sand is valid, and the prayer may be continued.

According to some opinions an optional prayer is always annulled by the fact of finding water afterwards. †And if possible it is always better to interrupt an obligatory prayer in which one is engaged, and continue it after ablution, even if time does not permit of concluding an entirely new prayer, and where in consequence the finding of the water does not absolutely nullify the ablution with sand. †Those, however, who admit that an optional prayer, preceded only by ablution with sand, is not in all cases annulled by the fact of finding water, contend that in these circumstances the prayer must not exceed two raka, unless the previous intention has been formulated of accomplishing a greater number.

A single ablution with sand can never serve for more than one obligatory prayer; though it suffices for as many optional prayers as may be desired. *But a supererogatory prayer which is the consequence of a vow comes under the same rule as an obligatory prayer. An ablution for the prayer for the dead may be combined with that for an obligatory prayer.

†If one has neglected to accomplish one of the five obligatory prayers, and one cannot remember precisely which, the oversight may be repaired by performing one ablution followed by the five prayers. If an uncertain two of the five have been omitted, all five must be repeated, each with its separate ablution; or one may perform two ablutions each followed by four prayers, omitting from the second four the one that began the first. And if the same obligatory prayer has been twice omitted, there must be two ablutions, each followed by all five prayers.

Ablution by sand is not permitted before the hour prescribed for each prayer; and this prohibition applies not only to obligatory prayers, †but also to those additional ones that are made at fixed times.

Notwithstanding that neither water nor sand can be procured for ablution, one should still, according to the view supported by Shafii in his second period, perform the obligatory prayers at their legal time, repeating them when one or other has been found. Moreover a person living at a fixed place who has recourse to ablution with sand in consequence of a want of water, must again acquit himself of his religious duty after finding it; but no such obligation lies on a traveller, †unless his journey has been undertaken for an illicit end. *Similarly, if one has had recourse to ablution with sand on account of the cold, the prayer must be subsequently repeated and preceded by a regular ablution; but this repetition is not strictly necessary if the use of sand was caused by a sickness which prevented the use of water in general or its application to a part of the body not covered by a splint, except only in the case of a wound that bleeds profusely. But if it is a question of a part of the body covered by a splint, a distinction must be made. If the part of the body to which the splint has been attached has incurred only a slight impurity a repetition is necessary—if the splint was not removed before the ablution with sand ; * but this is not so in the case of a grave impurity.

CHAPTER VIII.—MENSTRUATION

SECTION 1

THE age at which a woman can begin to have menses is nine years. The shortest period of continuance of one menstruation is one day and one night ; and the longest fifteen days and fifteen nights. The shortest interval of purity between two menstruations is fifteen days ; there is no legal limit for the longest period.

The legal consequence of menses is that the woman undergoing them is regarded as a person who has incurred a grave impurity. Besides this the law forbids her—

1. To pass through a mosque, if she fears she may soil the building ;
2. To fast,—though she must perform an obligatory fast on recovering her normal condition. On the other hand, prayers omitted on account of menstruation need not be accomplished ;
3. To be touched by a man on the part of the body between the navel and the knees, though according to some authorities this prohibition refers only to the act of coition.

When the discharge stops, acts that are illicit during menstruation remain so until the woman has taken a bath ; with the exception of fasting and repudiation, which become licit at the moment of stoppage.

A hæmorrhage that continues after the legal term of the menstruation is a perpetual cause of slight impurity, as is also an unhealthy discharge of urine or semen ; though they do not prevent fasting or prayer. Before, however, proceeding to these latter acts of devotion, the person subject to the infirmities mentioned, should wash the affected part and apply a bandage. After this, as soon as the hour of prayer has sounded, ritual ablution should be practised, and the prayer accomplished as soon as possible. ††What the law forbids here is any capricious delay. A delay rendered necessary for the regularity of the prayer is permitted. Thus, after ablution, the prayer may be deferred until one is suitably dressed ; or until the congregation has assembled, if it is a public act of devotion. A person subject to irregular discharges such as we have just spoken of, must repeat a ritual ablution for each obligatory prayer, even when no fresh impurity has elapsed, †and renew the bandage each time. And, finally, a person whose discharges cease after ritual ablution must repeat it immediately, even if she is not usually subject to a return of her infirmity after it has ceased, or if while subject to returns she usually has an interval of purity sufficiently long to admit of an ablution and prayer.

SECTION 2

When a woman has reached the age of puberty all matter coming out of the womb constitutes menstruation, at least during the legal period. †Even yellow or colourless fluids are regarded as menstruous. As to irregular discharges that occur after the legal period of menstruation, it is necessary to distinguish the two following varieties :—

1. Discharges occurring for the first time. This category is subdivided into two kinds : (a) if the discharges are of distinct nature, e.g. plentiful and slight, the latter are considered as hæmorrhages and the former as true menses if continuing for not less than the minimum and not more than the maximum legal period, provided that the slight discharges continue at least for the minimum legal state of purity ; and (b) if the discharges cannot be regarded as distinct, either because they are similar or because their precise periods cannot be determined ; they are then looked upon as menses for one day and one night, and as a hæmorrhage for the rest of the month, i.e. for the 29 following days.

2. Discharges constituting a chronic infirmity, in such a way that the person in question is habitually subject to intermittent intervals of purity. This category also admits of two subdivisions : (a) if the person understands the ordinary course of her infirmity, and can rely upon her experience of the length of the periods observed, even once ; †any new indications being duly conformed to ; and (b) if the person has doubts upon the subject ; she should then scrupulously observe the phases of her infirmity and act accordingly ; at least this is the opinion of all jurists except one, who considers such person to come under rule 1.

It is forbidden to persons subject to irregular discharges coming under case 2 (b) to indulge in coition. They may not touch a Koran, nor may they recite passages from this sacred scripture, except in prayer,—for their infirmity does not prevent their performing the obligatory prayers. †They may only accomplish a supererogatory prayer after taking a bath. Similarly, a woman subject to irregular discharges must observe the fast of the month of Ramadan, i.e. she must fast for the whole of this month, and then for the whole of another month. Thus she will be regarded as having fasted for fourteen days in each of these two months. Finally she must fast six days out of eighteen in a third month, i.e. first three days, then, after an interval of twelve, three more days, to make up the two missing days of the fast. She may also substitute for any fasting day another fasting day, provided that in that case she fasts on the third and seventeenth days following.

A person subject to the chronic infirmity we are discussing, who has but a confused recollection of what happened previously, should be of strict observance where she is certain ; and, where doubtful, she should regard herself as impure concerning coition, but pure concerning the accomplishment of her religious duties. If there be uncertainty as to cessation of discharge, a bath should be taken before each obligatory prayer. †The hæmorrhage of a pregnant woman is regarded as a true menstruation ; as is also an interval of purity in any woman, during the legal period of her menses.

The shortest period of lochia is one instant and the longest sixty days ; the ordinary time is forty days. Their effect is to render illicit all acts forbidden in the period of menstruation. Lochia that continue for more than sixty days are subject to the same rules as menses that have exceeded the legal term.

BOOK 2.—PRAYER

CHAPTER I.—GENERAL PROVISIONS

SECTION 1

Five daily prayers are prescribed in the Book of God—

1. The midday prayer (dhohr). The legal time for this prayer commences at the moment when the sun begins to decline, and lasts until the shadows of objects equal their real height, plus the length of shadow cast at noon.

2. At this moment begins the legal time for the afternoon prayer (asr) ; it lasts until sunset. It is preferable, however, to accomplish this prayer before a shadow has become twice as long as the object causing it, plus the length cast at noon.

3. The evening prayer (maghrib) should be performed at the moment of sunset. In his first period Shafii admitted that the legal time for this duty extends until the red colour of the sky has disappeared ; but in his second period he contended that it lasts no longer than is necessary for practising ablution, dressing suitably, listening to the first and second call, and accomplishing the five rakas that form the act of devotion. ††These acts, however, may if necessary be prolonged until the red colour of the sky has disappeared, provided they began at the right moment. [*Shafii's first opinion is preferable.]

4. The prayer of the night (isha) can be said as soon as the red colour of the sky has disappeared ; and the legal time lasts till dawn. It is, however, preferable not to defer this prayer beyond the first third of the night ; or, according to one author, beyond midnight.

5. The morning prayer (sobh) ; for which the legal time begins with the appearance of dawn, i.e. when the light of day first appears on the horizon, and lasts until sunrise. It is preferable not to defer this prayer beyond the rising of the sun.

[The following practices are considered worthy of blame :—

1. To call the evening prayer isha instead of maghrib ; and to call the prayer of the night atama instead of isha ; as did the Beduin in the time of the Prophet.

2. To go to rest before accomplishing the prayer of the night.

3. To engage in conversation after having said the prayer of the night ; unless it is an edifying conversation.]

The following two practices have been introduced by the Sonna.

1. To finish a prayer as soon as the legal time permits ; although, according to one authority, it is to be recommended to defer the prayer of the night until one goes to rest.

2. For the midday prayer, to wait until the heat of the day begins to diminish, at least when it is very hot ; †a rule specially adapted to hot climates, and to public prayer if the mosque is situated at a great distance.

†A prayer not finished within the legal term is nevertheless regarded as performed with regularity and at the prescribed hour, if at least one raka is finished within the time ; otherwise it counts only as an act of devotion made too late. If one is uncertain as to the exact time of day, one should try to determine it approximately, for instance, by observing cattle that go down to drink at fixed hours. *If, however, one afterwards becomes aware of having thus said one's prayer too soon, one should repeat it by way of reparation ; but this is not necessary in the case where a prayer is discovered to have been made too late. A person who perceives that he has allowed the prescribed hour to pass should accomplish the omitted prayer as soon as possible, but the Sonna insists in this case that the proper order of daily prayers should be observed, and that the prayer of which the proper time is passed should be accomplished before the one next due after the time the error was discovered, provided that too long a delay would not thereby be caused.

It is blamable to pray—

1. At the moment the sun is on the meridian, except on Friday.

2. From the end of the time prescribed for the morning prayer, until the elevation of the sun has attained the height of a lance.

3. From the end of the time prescribed for the afternoon prayer, until the sun has set.

These rules, however, do not apply to—

1. Prayers made for a special reason : e.g. (a) a prayer said by way of reparation, when the legal time has been allowed to pass ; (b) public prayer on occasion of an eclipse ; (c) the salutation of a mosque ; (d) prostrations of thanksgiving ; (e) prostrations at the reading of the Koran.

2. Prayers performed in the holy land of Mecca.

SECTION 2

Prayer is obligatory only for an adult Moslem, sane and free from impurity. Thus an infidel who has been converted to Islam need not thereupon perform all the prayers which he would have said in his past life ; but this obligation does lie upon the apostate who repents of his errors. Similarly the adult need not perform prayers omitted during his minority. But minors should be exhorted to prayer from their seventh year, and from their tenth forced to it, even with blows. Prayer is not obligatory for a woman during her menses, nor for a lunatic, nor for a person in a faint ; but it is for a drunkard, i.e. such person must perform it after becoming sober.

When one of these causes of exemption from prayer ceases before the legal time has passed, the prayer must be performed, even if there be but time to pronounce the introductory formula " God is Great " ; or, according to the opinion of one jurist, if there be time to finish the first raka. *As to the midday and evening prayers, they must, under these circumstances, be performed as long as their respective terms admit of the enunciation of the formula mentioned. If a minor attains puberty while praying, the prayer should be continued and concluded ††and then counts as performed during majority. ††Neither of course is repetition necessary when the signs of puberty occur immediately after the termination of a prayer, even though the legal time permit it ; but a woman in whom menstruation manifests itself, or a person who goes mad, after the hour prescribed for a prayer has sounded, must afterwards perform it, if the time passed before the cause of exemption would have sufficed for concluding the act of devotion, had the latter been begun at the proper moment.

SECTION 3

The adzan, or first call to prayer, and the ikama, or second, are only prescribed by the Sonna, though some consider them to be rigorously obligatory, and that the Moslem community is collectively responsible for their observance. These calls take place only for the five obligatory prayers, or as some think also on occasion of all public prayers, as for the great festivals, etc. In his second period Shafii admitted as a recommendable practice that every one about to pray on his own account should begin by reciting aloud the words of the first call, except in a mosque where the congregation was assembled. During the same period the imam also recommended the reciting of the words of the second call, in the case of an obligatory prayer for which the legal time was already past, and which one was about to accomplish by way of reparation. [*I prefer Shafii's earlier doctrine, namely that it is commendable to recite in all cases the words of the first call.]

If several prayers have been omitted at the proper legal time, it is sufficient to recite once the words of the call, when these prayers are repeated one after the other by way of reparation.

When persons praying together are all women, they omit the first call, repeating the words of the second only.

At the first call all the phrases are pronounced twice ; those of the second only once. The words, "the hour of prayer is come," do not form part of the calls ; they are recited twice in each case.

The Sonna has introduced the following practices in the calls to prayer :—

1. Raising the voice by degrees while repeating the second call.
2. Pronouncing distinctly the words of the first call.
3. Pronouncing the confession of faith in the first call at first in a low tone and then aloud.
4. Adding to the first call to morning prayer the phrase "prayer is better than sleep."
5. Standing up when reciting the first call and turning to the kibla, i.e. the direction of the holy temple of Mecca.

But the two following requirements are alone necessary for the validity of the calls :—

1. Observance of the due order of succession of the phrases.
2. Enunciation of the calls without interruption ; though, according to one of our jurists, their validity is not compromised either by a few superfluous words or by a fairly long interval of silence.

The muezzin or person entrusted with the duty of crying the first call must be a male Moslem and have attained years of discretion. It is blamable to entrust this duty to any one who has incurred a slight—and still more a grave—impurity ; and it is yet more blamable that any such person should cry the second call. In conformity with the Sonna a person chosen to perform the function of muezzin is usually of irreproachable character, with a fine, sonorous voice.

In the prayer the function of the imam is more important than that of the muezzin. [On the contrary, the function of the muezzin must be considered as the more important.]

Another essential condition for the validity of the first call is that the prescribed time for the prayer should have come ; except in the case of the first call to morning prayer which may be chanted any time after midnight.

The following additional practices have been introduced by the Sonna :—

1. The chanting of the first call to morning prayer by two of the muezzins attached to the mosque, one before and one after the appearance of the dawn.

2. The repetition of the words of the muezzin by every person hearing the first call to any prayer ; except the two phrases beginning with the word “ come,” i.e. “ come to prayer,” and “ come to salvation,” which should be replaced by the formula, “ there is no force nor power but in God.” [The phrase, “ prayer is better than sleep,” is also not to be repeated. It is preferable to substitute for it, “ Thou art the truth and the right.”]

3. A prayer for the Prophet, uttered after the call is finished both by muezzin and hearers ; and then after that the following formula :—
“ O God, to whom are addressed this call and also the prayer which I am about to offer, grant to Muhammad thy benediction and grace, and make him to enter the abode of the blessed, as Thou didst promise. O Thou that art the most Merciful ! ”

SECTION 4

One of the conditions essential to the validity of prayer is to turn if possible towards the kibla, that is in the direction of the holy temple of Mecca. To this rule there are only two exceptions—(1) prayer made at a moment of danger ; and (2) a supererogatory prayer made by a traveller.

As to this second cause of exemption, it is necessary to observe further that a traveller is permitted to accomplish his supererogatory prayers while still remaining on his mount, and even while continuing his journey, *be it long or short. If, however, one is travelling in a litter, one should take the required direction and accomplish thus the inclinations and prostrations wherever possible ; †but no such obligation exists for the rider, unless he can comply with it easily. ‡It is specially to be recommended that one should place one's body in the right direction at the moment of pronouncing the introductory formula “ God is great ” ; and also, according to some authorities, at the moment of proceeding to the final salutation. The traveller who has a valid reason for not turning towards the kibla, must not turn in any other direction, but remain in the position he happens to be in at the time ; while a traveller, riding, may accomplish the inclinations and prostrations by merely bending the head—lower on the breast for the latter than for the former.

*The traveller on foot must accomplish the inclinations and prostrations like everybody else, and he must turn towards Mecca when bending down or prostrating himself, just as when pronouncing the introductory formula “ God is great.” But he is allowed to continue his journey during the kiam, and when uttering the confession of faith.

The traveller whose mount or litter permits of his accomplishing the inclinations and prostrations in the usual manner, and of taking the direction of the kibla, all without alighting, may do this provided he stops. But he is forbidden to continue the journey while doing it.

When praying in the sanctuary of Mecca one may either turn to the wall or the door ; but if the door happens to be open, the threshold must be at least two-thirds of an ell high. When praying on the roof of the sanctuary one may turn to a wall or to the door at choice.

A person who is himself able to ascertain the proper direction of Mecca should regulate his attitude by that and not by what he sees others doing. If unable to ascertain the true position, he should find out from some reliable person who is sure of it ; only in the absence of such person may one have recourse to indirect methods, and even then it is forbidden to follow blindly the example of another. When unable to discover the position of the kibla, it is better—rather than to follow blindly the example of another—to pray in the position one may happen to be in, at the risk of having to repeat the prayer upon learning afterwards that it was the wrong direction. ††One should make fresh efforts to ascertain the direction of the temple of Mecca before performing each prayer. It is only in two cases, i.e. where personal information is impossible, and where one cannot oneself distinguish the indications of direction—as, for instance, if one is blind—that it is allowable to follow without examination the example of a reliable and sufficiently educated person ; †but such a course is rigorously forbidden except where one is totally unable to find out oneself or to distinguish the indications.

*He who ascertains to the best of his ability the direction of the sanctuary of Mecca, and afterwards finds it to be mistaken, should repeat his prayer. If at the discovery the prayer is not yet finished, it should be begun again at once. If one's opinion alters with regard to the direction when at prayer, one should conform to that opinion, without repeating the prayer—even if it should happen three times, and four rakas be addressed in four different directions.

CHAPTER II.—MANNER OF PRAYER

The essentials that constitute prayer are thirteen—

1. Niya, or intention. With regard to the obligatory prayers this consists in the intention of accomplishing the prayer specially in view. †It should also refer to the obligation to accomplish that prayer, but there is no need to add that it is an obligation towards God, as this is understood. †The intention to pray late to replace an omitted or irregular prayer suffices also for the prayer made at the legal time ; and similarly an intention to accomplish a prayer at the legal time suffices for a prayer said late by way of reparation. So far as regards intention, a supererogatory prayer accomplished at a fixed time, or for a particular reason, follows the same rule as an obligatory prayer ; but whether it is necessary that the intention should also refer to the idea of a voluntary work is a matter of controversy. [††No special intention with regard to this idea is necessary.] The simple intention to pray is sufficient in the case of supererogatory prayers that have no fixed time nor particular reason ; and it should also be observed that intention is a matter of the heart and not of words, though this does not prevent it being commendable to formulate the intention at the moment of saying “ God is great.”

2. The takbirat al ihram, or introductory formula “ God is great,” obligatory for every one capable of pronouncing it. Though this formula is all-important, a few superfluous words may be added. Thus one may say, “ God is the great,” for “ God the most high is great.” But the addition must not be derogatory to the name “ God.” ††One may not say, “ The greatest is God.” The believer who cannot pronounce this formula in Arabic may provisionally make use of a translation, but he must as soon as possible learn to pronounce it in the ritual language. According to the Sonna the hands must be lifted to the height of the shoulders †at the moment of pronouncing the first syllable of the formula, and in any case the intention must not be separated from it. It is enough, according to some jurists, if the intention accompanies the first word of the formula.

3. The kiyam, or standing up. In an obligatory prayer this act is required of every one capable of it. It consists in straightening the backbone. If the body remains bent or inclined in such a manner as cannot ordinarily be described as “ upright,” the act is invalid ; ††but if holding oneself erect is physically impossible, one may perform the kiyam as best one can, even in an inclining position. In this latter case one should if possible bend more when accomplishing the rokua. Similarly a person who can stand up but cannot bend or prostrate himself, may accomplish the rokua and the sojud as best he can. And finally a person who cannot stand at all may sit instead ; but in this case it is better to sit in the manner called iftirash, rather than in that called tarabba, i.e. cross-legged. The manner of sitting called ikaa, i.e. on the buttock with the knees in the air is regarded as blamable. After the kiyam one bends forward for the rokua, until the forehead is before the knees, or, better still, on the spot where one is about to prostrate oneself. If unable to sit one can rest on the right side, or even on the back, for the whole prayer. Kiyam is not an essential part of supererogatory prayers which can be performed sitting for lying, even when one is able to get up.

4. The kiraa, or recitation of the Koran. After the introductory takbir the Sonna prescribes the pronunciation, first, of some invocation, and then of the formula, "I seek refuge with God from Satan the stoned"; both in a low tone. Our school insists upon the tawoz, as this formula is called, being repeated at the beginning of each raka, especially the first. The part of the Koran specially appointed for recitation in prayer is the first chapter called the Fatiha. It is recited at each raka; except when one is late at public prayer, when one may leave it out, in order to catch up the others. The whole of the chapter must be recited, including the words "in the name of God," correctly, and paying attention even to the double consonants. †If even a letter d is replaced by a dh, the recitation is invalid. The order in which the verses occur must be observed, and the recitation continued without interruption. The uttering of any word not in the text destroys this continuity. †On the other hand, the "amen" or any word left out by the imam may be added by the congregation. A long interval of silence, for even a short intentional interval, invalidates the recitation. A person who cannot recite the first chapter of the Koran, should recite seven other verses of the holy book, consecutive if possible. [†In Shafii's personal opinion one may recite seven separate verses, even though one may happen to know by heart seven consecutive ones.] A person who does not know seven verses of the Koran may simply glorify God; †but in this case what is said must contain as many letters as the first chapter of the Koran. A believer who can recite absolutely nothing must remain standing in silence during the whole of the recitation.

The following are practices of the Sonna :—(a) At the end of the first chapter "amen" is said without doubling the "m," but with emphasis on the "a"—it may be pronounced short and at the same time as the "amen" said by the imam in the public prayers, but always aloud; and (b) at the end of the first chapter another is recited, except at the third and fourth raka, when only the Fatiha is repeated. [According to a decision of Shafii this does not apply to a person who may happen to be in advance of the congregation; he should repeat the additional chapter so that the congregation may catch him up.] In general the congregation need only recite the first chapter, even in the two first raka, merely listening to the imam while he reads the second. †Only if the imam cannot be heard, either on account of the distance or because he speaks too low, should one recite aloud the second chapter; (c) this supplementary chapter is usually chosen from among chapters 49-114 of the Koran, a longish one at the morning and midday prayers, a shorter one for the afternoon and night, and a very short one at evening prayer. On Friday chapter 32 is preferred at the first raka, and chapter 76 at the second, to be recited after the Fatiha.

5. The rokua, or bending. This act should consist in bending so as to touch the knees with the hands, keeping the rest of the body still. The action of standing up again should be distinctly separated from that of bending. The bending must be for the express purpose of prayer; not, e.g. for reading the Koran. In the best manner of doing it care should be taken to keep back and neck in a straight line, to place the legs perpendicularly and to take the knees in the hands, the fingers being separate and turned towards the kibla. At the moment of bending one pronounces the formula "God is great," holding the hands in the same position as formerly in the prayer; and one repeats three times, when in a bending position, the formula, "Praise to my illustrious Lord." At public prayer this is all the imam says. At private prayer one adds, "O God, I incline myself before Thee; in Thee I put my trust; to Thee I make my petition. Before thee I humble my ears, my eyes, my marrow, my bones, my sinews, and all that is supported on my feet."

6. The aatidal, or equilibrium of the body. This is standing still with the sole object of praying. Thus, to get up through fear is regarded as an infraction. The Sonna insists on the following practices besides:—
(a) The raising of the hands when about to raise the head, and saying, "God hearkens unto him that praiseth Him." Then one gets up, pronouncing the formula, "O our Lord! To Thee be homage of all that is in the heavens or in the earth, and of all that exists." At public prayer this is all the imam says. At private prayer one adds, "O Thou to whom alone belong glory and praise. I declare true what Thy servant has just said; for we are all Thy servants; none can refuse when Thou givest, nor give when Thou refusest; nor can fortune render us happy, if it come not from Thee." (b) Pronouncing, during the aatidal of the second raka of the morning prayer, the following formula called Kanut, "O God, lead me, as Thou hast led those before me," etc., which, of course, the imam recites in the plural at public prayers. (c) ††Praying for the Prophet after finishing the kanut, holding the hands before the face, but not wiping it, as some do. (d) ††Intoning aloud of the kanut by the imam. At the end of each invocation the congregation say "amen," while they repeat the Lord's praises in a low tone. Those who cannot hear the imam say the kanut on their own account. The kanut is obligatory, not only at morning prayer, as we have just said, but also at all the other prescribed prayers when made at a time of endeavouring to avert an imminent calamity. At other times the formula is not recited at the other prayers.

7. Sejud, or prostration. It consists in touching with a part of the forehead the place intended to be touched while praying. The validity of the prayer is not affected by touching a place at the side, provided the deviation be not caused by a previous and unlawful movement. *In prostration one is not strictly obliged to rest one's hands, knees, or feet on the ground. [*On the contrary, this act must be rigorously observed.] The following practices are considered necessary for the validity of prostration :—(a) keeping still the different parts of the body, while resting the whole weight of the head on the ground ; (b) prostrating oneself with the exclusive object of accomplishing prayer ; (c) recovering the position called aatidal, if unfortunately one falls on one's face ; (d) causing the upper parts of the body to be lower than the inferior. And besides these necessary elements of the sejud, it is commendable, in order to accomplish one's prayer after the most approved manner : (a) to say, " God is great," while prostrating oneself, but without lifting the hands ; (b) to place the knees first on the ground, then the hands, then the forehead, and last the nose ; (c) to exclaim three times, while remaining prostrate, " Glory to the Lord most high." At public prayer this is all the imam says. At private prayer each believer adds, " O God, before Thee I prostrate myself ; in Thee I put my trust, to Thee I make my petition. I humble my face before Him who hath created it, who hath fashioned it, who hath opened my ears and my eyes. Blessed be God, best Creator " ; (d) to place the hands on the ground close to the shoulders with the fingers together and turned towards the kibla ; (e) to take care that the knees are not touching each other, that the stomach does not rest on the thighs, and that the elbows do not touch the sides. This rule is obligatory not only in the sejud but also in the rokua ; only women and hermaphrodites pray with the limbs together.

8. Jelus, i.e. sitting still between the two prostrations required in each raka. After sitting one cannot lawfully get up for any purpose but prayer. Neither must one sit too long. The aatidal also should last only a short time. The best way of accomplishing the jelus is to observe the following practices :—(a) to exclaim on sitting, " God is great " ; (b) to sit in the manner called iftirash ; (c) to place the hands on the thighs, a little above the knees, extending the fingers ; (d) to say while sitting, " O Lord, pardon me, show me Thy mercy, help me in misery, succour me, nourish me, lead me and preserve me." After the jelus one prostrates oneself a second time in the same way as the first ; except that the Sonna has introduced the practice of sitting a little after the second prostration, in order to rest, in every raka followed by another.

9. The tashahud, or confession of faith.

10. The kauḍ or sitting down when about to repeat the confession of faith.

11. The prayer for the Prophet.

Nos. 9 and 10 are considered essential elements only when followed by the final salutation, i.e. in the last raka of the prayer. In the other rakas they are only commendable acts. As to the kauḍ it is strictly allowable to accomplish it in any manner ; though, at the first, tashahud, the Sonna insists that the sitting should be in the manner called iftirash, i.e. on the heel of the left foot half bent on its side on the ground, the right foot being under the body with the toes turned towards the kibla. To recite the second tashahud one should sit, according to the Sonna, in the manner called tawarok, similar to the iftirash but with the left foot under the right side, and the hinder parts on the ground. †At public prayer, however, any one who is behind the others or has been guilty of some omission, should sit only in the manner called iftirash, both at the first and second tashahud. In both iftirash and tashahud the left hand is placed on the thigh close to the knees with extended fingers. [†The fingers should, on the contrary, be pressed together.] As to the right hand, one shuts the little, ring, and *middle fingers ; and raises the index finger when pronouncing the words of the tashahud—“ that God,” etc. ; but one should not alternately raise and lower it. *And finally one should hold the thumb pressed to the hand, like a person wishing to indicate by the position of his fingers the number 53. After the second tashahud one should pray for the Prophet ; *and it is even recommended by the Sonna after the first ; the Sonna insists upon a prayer for the family of the holy man after the second, ††but not after the first. Some authors consider it obligatory. The best manner of saying the tashahud is known to every one, so I confine myself here to pointing out that the minimum consists of the following words :—“ Glory to God and salvation to thee, O Prophet. May the mercy and blessing of God come upon thee. May peace be bestowed upon us and upon all pious servants of God. I bear witness there is no divinity but God, and that Muhammad is the apostle of God.” According to some authors one may still further compress the formula by omitting the words “ and blessing ” and “ pious ” and by replacing the words “ Muhammad is the apostle of God ” by the words “ Muhammad is His apostle.” [†The former phrase is preferable, as one reads in the Sahih or collection of traditions of Muslim.] The prayer for the Prophet should consist of the following words :—“ O God, grant thy grace to Muhammad and to his family ”; but after the second tashahud the Sonna insists upon adding the rest of the formula up to the words, “worthy of praise and glorious.” It also requires the addition of an invocation, by preference one of those directly transmitted to us from Muhammad, e.g. “O God pardon all my sins,” etc.; but this invocation should not be longer than the confession of faith and the prayer for the Prophet together. A person who cannot say the confession of faith and the prayer for the Prophet in Arabic, should make use of a translation; and this is allowable also for invocations and glorifications that are not obligatory but merely commendable. †But this permission to use one’s mother tongue is strictly limited to cases of absolute impossibility.

12. The salam, or final salutation. It consists of at least the words, es-salam aleykum, †though one may also say salam aleykum. [†According to Shafii these latter words alone are insufficient.] †The salam need not be pronounced with the intention of finishing the prayer. The best way of doing it is to use the words, “Peace be with you, and may God be merciful to you,” saying them twice, looking first to the right and then to the left and thus giving salutation to angels, men, and spirits. This, however, does not apply to public prayer, for there the imam should in intention salute the congregation, and they return his salutation.

13. Tertib, or observance of the order of succession of the essential elements of prayer, i.e. the order in which we have just mentioned them. If this order is intentionally neglected, e.g. by prostration before bending, the entire prayer is annulled; if done by inadvertence, then the subsequent portion only is regarded as unaccomplished. If one perceives that one has omitted or failed to accomplish lawfully one of the essential elements of a certain raka, before coming to the same part of the next raka, one can repair the omission by beginning the prayer again at the part omitted; otherwise the defective raka is completed by the raka one is actually saying, and one begins the prayer again from the raka so completed. If at the end of a prayer one perceives one has omitted a prostration in the last raka, it is enough to prostrate oneself forthwith, repeating the confession of faith; but if the omission was in a previous raka, or one cannot remember for certain which raka it was in, then the whole raka must be repeated. Should one, after completing the kiyam of the second raka, perceive that a prostration has been omitted from the first raka, it is sufficient to prostrate oneself forthwith, at any rate if one has already sat down after the first prostration. Such procedure, however, is not sufficient, according to some jurists, if one sat down merely with the intention of resting; and if that be not the case, still, according to their doctrine, one must sit still and then accomplish the omitted prostration. Finally, some authorities support the view that a subsequent prostration will of itself always suffice, without prejudice to an expiatory prostration. A believer who, at the end of a fourfold prayer, perceives that he has forgotten two or three prostrations, and cannot remember exactly to which raka they belonged, should accomplish two further rakas by way of reparation. If four prostrations have been omitted, the remedy is one prostration and two rakas; if five or six, three extra rakas suffice; if seven, a prostration and three extra rakas are necessary.

[The following further practices are recommended by the Sonna :—

1. Keeping the eyes fixed on the place where one is about to prostrate oneself. According to some it is even blamable to close the eyes; but this, in my personal opinion is going too far, unless one is afraid thus to endanger the efficacy of the prayer.

2. To pray only in a humble and submissive attitude.

3. To meditate upon the words of the Koran recited and the glorifying of God enounced in the prayer.

4. To intone the prayer with fervour and without preoccupation.

5. When standing up, to hold the hands under the breast, the left in the right.

6. To pronounce an invocation when prostrating oneself.

7. To lean on the hands when rising from the prostration and the kauḍ.

8. †To recite the Koran for a longer time in the first raka than in the second.

9. To glorify God at the end of the prayer.

10. To change one's place, at the end of an obligatory prayer, if one wishes to accomplish a supererogatory prayer; it is even better to go home to accomplish such optional act of devotion.

11. For the women at a mosque to take their places behind the men, who should remain until the women have gone out.

12. That each person should leave the mosque on the side most convenient for his business; but the right is preferred, if there be no special reason to go out by the left.

13. That at public prayer the congregation should cease to follow the example of the imam immediately after the final salutation, during which they should recite an invocation or something of the sort, and then reply to the imam's salutation. Should the latter salute only once, the congregation must still salute him twice.]

CHAPTER III.—CONDITIONS FOR THE VALIDITY OF PRAYER

SECTION 1

There are five essential conditions for the validity of prayer—

1. The certainty that the legally prescribed time has come.

2. The direction of the body towards the kibla.

3. Keeping the shameful parts of the body covered. The parts of the human body between the navel and the knees are called “shameful,” and this rule applies to men †and to female slaves. In the case of a free woman, the whole body is regarded as shameful, with the exception of the face and the hands. By “cover” is meant obscuring the colour of the skin, even by dirty water or mud. †If one has no clothes mud is obligatory. All that is necessary is that the clothing should be arranged so as to veil the shameful parts from being seen from above or from the side, but not from below. This rule is infringed if the parts in question are exposed by the garment opening in front when the body is bent. One’s coat should be fastened, and drawn tight across the waist; and if necessary, as much as possible of the shameful parts should be covered with the hand. When one is able to cover the shameful parts both before and behind, this should be done; but if one’s garment does not suffice for this, it is better to conceal those in front; though some authors give preference to the hinder parts, and others contend that it is a matter of choice.

4. To be free from all impurity, even slight. A slight impurity incurred during the prayer nullifies it just as much as one that one has neglected to remove before beginning; although, according to the opinion entertained by Shafii in his first period, one can, in the first case, proceed at once to a ritual ablution, and subsequently continue the interrupted prayer. The controversy extends to all other causes of illegality in prayer not due to negligence on one’s own part and which cannot be immediately removed. If, on the other hand, one can remove at once the cause of illegality, e.g. if the wind has accidentally exposed the shameful parts, and one readjusts one’s garment at once, the illegality is without consequence. But if it is a case of responsible illegality, e.g. if one has allowed the time for moistening the footgear to elapse, then the prayer is annulled.

5. That not only the clothing and the body but also the place of prayer must be free from impurity. In case of difficulty one should endeavour to ascertain whether a thing is pure or impure. If a part of the clothing or of the body has become impure, and one does not know precisely which part, one should wash the whole of the body or clothes. ††Even if one supposes the impurity to have tainted only one corner, a partial cleaning will not suffice. †This cleaning, however, can be done in two stages, i.e. by washing first one half and then the other ; provided that an overlapping border be washed twice, otherwise an intervening space is considered to be still impure.

If the clothing is or has been in contact with any impure object, even though only a part of the clothes which have not been displaced incurred this impurity, the prayer is invalid. Similarly if anything of which the other end is in contact with an impure object is held in the hand, whether it is †or is not in motion. However, if it be merely the foot which rests upon something of which the other end is touching an impure object, the prayer is valid, unless there are other causes of nullity. ††The impurity of the ground below the breast at bending and prostration does not entail the illegality of the prayer.

If in a surgical operation it is necessary to join to the patient's bone the bone of an animal, one can, if the matter is urgent and no other can be found, utilise an impure bone. On recovery the patient is none the less able to accomplish a valid prayer. If, however, the operation was not necessary, the impure bone must be cut out, if this can be done without manifest danger, or even in any case according to some authors. ††Only in case of death is there never need to cut out the impure bone from the corpse.

One may lawfully pray after cleaning the shameful parts with pebbles, even if there are still traces of impurity ; †but if while praying one has been in contact with a person so cleansed, the prayer is invalid. The dirt of the high-road, even when manifestly impure, is an excusable impurity, if not in inmoderate amount, as it is very difficult to take precautions against it. Distinctions, however, are to be made in this respect as to the time of day, and the part of the clothing or body that is affected. Similarly, a small quantity of blood from the bite of a flea, or of dirt deposited by a fly, does not affect the validity of a prayer ; †but a large amount of either, or even a small quantity spread over the skin by the flow of perspiration, does. [†According to the most competent authorities these impurities are always excusable.]

Blood from blisters is considered in the same way as that from flea-bites ; except, according to some authors, if the blisters are pressed. Blood from a pimple, an ulcer, a blood-letting or a cupping glass, is assimilated by some authors to that from blisters ; †but the majority consider it to have the same effect as hæmorrhage after menses, provided the flow is ordinarily of some duration. Otherwise this blood is equivalent to that of another person ; i.e. it is never excusable. Some jurists, however, admit an exception to this rule, when the blood has flowed only in a small quantity. [†Pimples, ulcers, etc., come under the same rule as blisters ; *and one may even accomplish prayer while tainted with the blood of another person, if in very small quantity.]

Pus and clear fluid substance coming from a wound are regarded by the law for this purpose in the same way as blood ; and the same is the case with matter coming from ulcers or tumours, whether it has *or has not a fetid odour. [According to our school this matter is always pure.]

If any one prays in a state of impurity without knowing it he should, according to the opinion held by Shafii in his second period, repeat it on discovery by way of reparation ; and the same obligation rests, according to our school, on any person who may have forgotten his state of impurity after having become aware of it.

SECTION 2

A prayer is nullified by any superfluous word, even if it consist of but one letter ; or by too long a pause in its enunciation. †Coughing, laughing, weeping, groaning, or breathing, if of such a nature as to render perceptible to the ear at least two letters, nullify prayer ; but not otherwise.

The following are considered excusable :—

1. Words uttered (a) because one cannot control the tongue ; or (b) through momentary forgetfulness that one was engaged in prayer ; or (c) through ignorance of the prohibition, if recently converted to Islam. †But this only applies to a small number of words, many are never excusable.

2. Coughing, etc., where avoidable.

3. Omission to recite the Koran through incapacity ; †but to cry aloud is inexcusable.

*If superfluous words are the consequence of violence the prayer is nullified all the same. If one utters some passage from the Koran, even if it is to say something to some one else, e.g. Koran xix. 13, “ O Yahya, take the holy scripture,” the prayer is nullified, unless the passage comes in relevantly in the recitation.

The prayer is not nullified in the two following cases :—

1. If it is interrupted for glorifying God or for an invocation ; provided this be not in addressing some one else, as e.g. in saying to some one who has sneezed, “ God be merciful to you.”

2. †If it is stopped unintentionally, even for a considerable time.

The Sonna recommends that any believer who may be obliged to interrupt his prayer by unforeseen circumstances, e.g. in order to tell the imam to let some one pass who has just come in, or to warn a blind man, should say, “ Praise to God ” ; while a woman in similar circumstances should strike the back of the left hand with the right.

When the superfluous thing consists, not of a word, but of an act, the prayer is nullified if the act consists of something of a nature essential to the prayer itself, e.g. an inclination of the body ; though such contravention is not condemnable if committed in ignorance. But if the superfluous act is not of this category, it does not nullify the prayer, unless it is a thing of great importance. Custom indicates what must be considered a thing of great importance ; thus two paces or two knocks are not so considered as a rule, but three consecutive paces or knocks are. Similarly prayer is nullified by an indecent jump, but not by a slight though continuous movement, as e.g. counting the beads of a rosary, †or scratching oneself. †In all these cases faults due to inadvertence have the same effect as intentional faults.

Prayer is also nullified by eating, however little. [Two exceptions are admitted, when the act is done (1) through forgetfulness, without thinking what one is doing, and (2) without knowing that it is illicit.] †So rigorous is this prohibition that even a morsel of sugar in the mouth is enough to nullify the prayer, if any liquid from it be swallowed.

A practice has been introduced by the Sonna that any one about to pray should place himself near a wall, a column or a post stuck in the ground ; or place before him a special carpet, or draw a line to stop passers-by, ††who are obliged to respect it.

[The following things are considered blamable if done during prayer:—

1. Turning round unnecessarily.
2. Lifting up the eyes to heaven.
3. Taking hold of one's hair or one's clothes.
4. Unnecessarily putting the hand into the mouth.
5. Standing on one foot when accomplishing the kiyam.
6. Retaining urine or stercoral matter.
7. Performing devotion in the presence of a repast one wishes to eat.
8. Spitting in front of one, or to the right side.
9. Placing the hand on the hip.
10. Bending the head excessively when bowing.
11. Praying at the public baths, or on the road, or at a place where ordure is deposited, or in a temple of unbelievers, or at a place for camels to lie down, or in a cemetery even if free from impurity.]

CHAPTER IV.—EXPIATORY PROSTRATION

THE Sonna has introduced the practice of accomplishing an expiatory prostration, whenever (1) Any prescribed duty has been neglected ; and (2) any prohibited act has been done.

With regard to the first point, if it is a matter of negligent omission of one of the necessary elements of prayer, one should first correct oneself, and prostrate oneself immediately afterwards, observing for the supplementary prostration the rule mentioned when speaking of the tertib. But when the omission extends only to a part of a necessary element, e.g. the kanut, the kiyam accompanying it, the first tashahad, the kaud accompanying it, or the prayer for the prophet that is said after the first tashahad, then one may repair the error by prostrating oneself at once. Some authorities maintain, however, that this procedure is insufficient, if the omission was premeditated. [The same rule should be observed in case of omission of the prayer for the family of the Prophet, at any rate if this is considered as a duty introduced by the Sonna.] Negligent omission of the other practices of the Sonna has no need of such expiation.

In the second case, the doing of a prohibited act, even intentionally, does not necessarily involve the nullity of the prayer ; if, e.g., one has turned round, or taken a pace or two. One need not prostrate oneself to repair the error, if one has committed any such fault by inadvertence. But where an act would, if committed intentionally, nullify the prayer, one must prostrate oneself in reparation, if one commits it inadvertently. If, however, a fault is so grave as to nullify the prayer, even when committed inadvertently, an expiatory prostration is of no avail. This is the case if the prayer is interrupted by a long discourse. On the other hand, prolonging excessively one of the essential elements of prayer which should be accomplished rapidly, nullifies the prayer only if premeditated ; if it is mere negligence it can be expiated by prostration. Among practices that should be rapidly accomplished are cited the aatidal, †and the jelus between two prostrations.

If one of the essential verbal elements has been misplaced, e.g. if one has recited the first chapter of the Koran during the rokua or the tashahad ; †the prayer is not annulled, even if the act be intentional. †If, however, such fault has been committed negligently, an expiatory prostration is required. This forms an exception to the rule already mentioned, viz. that where an intentional act does not affect the validity of a prayer, it is not necessary to expiate by a prostration its inadvertent committal.

As to forgetting the first tashahad, the two following cases must be distinguished :—

1. If one remembers the error after finishing the prayer, one should not resume the formula, for the whole prayer would be nullified, at least if the resumption is done knowingly. Otherwise, i.e. if one has not thought of the prohibition, the law requires an expiatory prostration.

†The same rule applies if the resumption is due to ignorance instead of forgetfulness. Only a member of the community may resume the first tashahad, in these circumstances, when the imam gives him the example. [†This is even rigorously necessary.]

2. If one perceives one's error before finishing the prayer, one should, if not still standing, resume the first tashahad. One should also prostrate oneself. But if one has intentionally risen before finishing the prayer, without having enounced the first tashahad, the resumption of the omitted formula nullifies the whole prayer, even if one is not yet quite standing.

The kanut, if forgotten, is not resumed, if one remembers it only during the sejud; but it is so if remembered before this, and one also accomplishes a prostration to repair the error, as soon as one is in a bending position.

If one does not know exactly what part of the essential element one has neglected, one should still prostrate oneself; but if one merely suspects one has done some prohibited thing, an expiatory prostration is never required. Should one commit an irregularity by inadvertence, and be unable to remember whether it has already been expiated by a prostration, one should prostrate oneself; and should one be uncertain if one has accomplished three or four rakas, one must perform another, followed by a prostration. †This prostration is even obligatory if the doubt has disappeared before the final salutation. The same rule applies to all cases where one has accomplished some practice without knowing if it was obligatory or not, for it is possible one may have performed a superfluous act. On the other hand, no expiatory prostration is required for an act which appears to have been necessary, even if one doubted it for a moment; for example, if in the third raka of a prayer that consists of four rakas one is uncertain if it is the third or the fourth; but if one remembers the truth before finishing the raka in question, one need not prostrate oneself to expiate one's fault. If, however, the doubt disappears only during the fourth raka, an expiatory prostration is required. If it is only after the final salutation that one suspects having omitted a necessary practice, one need pay no attention to it.

At public prayer, an omission by a member of the congregation who has followed the lead of the imam, is the latter's business. This principle is carried so far that if one has repeated the final salutation in the mistaken belief that the imam had reached that stage, it can be pronounced a second time without an expiatory prostration. Even if one remembers, during the imam's tashahad, that one has omitted one of the essential elements of a raka, always excepting the intention and the introductory takbir without which the prayer is null, one need only repeat the missing raka without prostration, after the imam has pronounced the final salutation. Any omission by a member of the congregation after the final salutation is his own mistake, for which the imam is not responsible. Thus, if one has lagged behind the imam in the prayer, one should nevertheless pronounce with him the final salutation, and then continue one's act of devotion from the place interrupted, and finally accomplish an expiatory prostration for negligence. On the other hand, faults committed by the imam through inadvertence are imputable to the congregation; and for this reason the expiatory prostrations of the imam are accomplished by the whole community; and even if the imam does not prostrate himself to expiate his errors the congregation should do so, this at least was Shafii's personal opinion. When, though the congregation is ahead, one prays under the direction of the imam, and he is guilty of an omission, either †before or after one has begun to follow him, ††one should in both cases accomplish with him the expiatory prostration, and then at the end of the prayer prostrate oneself again to expiate one's having lagged behind. If the imam omits his prostration in these circumstances, the congregation is none the less obliged to accomplish it at the end of the prayer. This was so decided by Shafii himself.

The expiatory prostration is never accomplished more than twice, whatever the number of faults committed through inadvertence. It is performed like an ordinary prostration, and, according to the opinion of Shafii in his second period, between the tashahad and the final salutation. †It follows that no reason for its performance can arise, once the final salutation has been knowingly accomplished; or even inadvertently, if a long interval has ensued. Otherwise, according to Shafii's personal opinion, the fact of having inadvertently accomplished the final salutation, does not prevent performance of an expiatory prostration. †After the prostration has been accomplished one continues the interrupted prayer. However, if the imam has been guilty of some omission in the public Friday prayer, and the time prescribed for that ceremony has expired during the expiatory prostration, one proceeds immediately to the celebration of midday prayer; and after this the congregation again prostrates itself in order to expiate the fault of having exceeded the time allowed for the weekly prayer. †It should be added that if after prostration for a fault believed to have been committed, it appears that the fault never really existed, one should prostrate oneself again in order to expiate the error of having accomplished a superfluous prostration.

CHAPTER V.—PROSTRATIONS FOR READING THE KORAN, AND FOR THANKSGIVING

PROSTRATIONS for reading the holy scripture, introduced by the Sonna, are fourteen in number, according, at least, to Shafi in his second period, including two prostrations for the reading of Chapter XXII., but not including the prostration for the reading of Chapter XXXVIII., as the latter is a prostration of thanksgiving, commendable when the chapter is read out of prayer time, †but prohibited at prayer. The prostrations of which we are speaking are prescribed by the Sonna as well for the reader as for the hearers, the only distinction being that those accomplished by the hearers are but the necessary complement of those performed by the reader. [They are prescribed also for every person who happens to hear the reading of the holy scripture.]

When the reading of the Koran takes place during prayer, the imam and congregation, when praying on their own account, prostrate themselves as may be necessary in the case of each ; but when the congregation prays under the direction of the imam, its prostrations must follow the lead given by him. Should any one omit a prostration performed by the imam, or vice versâ, the prayer of that person is nullified. A person about to accomplish a prostration for reading the Koran out of prayer time, should express his intention and then accomplish an introductory takbir raising his hands, adding another takbir when bending to the ground without raising his hands. He thus accomplishes the prostration as he would in prayer, and then, on rising, says the final takbir and the salutation. ††The introductory takbir is an essential condition for the validity of prostrations of this nature, *and so is the salutation. The believer must also comply with all the conditions requisite for the validity of prayer ; the only exception being that during prostration at prayer the takbir is said without raising the hands both in bending down and in rising up. [As another exception it may be mentioned that one does not sit down to rest after prostration for the reading of the Koran.]

While prostrate, one should say : “ My face is bowed before Him that hath created it, that hath formed it and opened mine ears and mine eyes by His energy and power.” A person who reads a verse of the Koran at two different sittings, should prostrate himself each time ; †and so should any one who reads at one and the same sitting a verse he has already read. For this purpose one raka is considered as one sitting, and two rakas as two sittings ; but if one has read a portion of the Koran without prostrating oneself, and becomes aware of the omission only after a long interval, no prostration is necessary.

The prostration of thanksgiving is never accomplished during prayer ; it is prescribed by the Sonna on the occasion of any unforeseen happiness, or averted calamity, or on meeting a person stricken with some physical or moral infirmity. Such prostration is performed in public only when one perceives a moral infirmity, not in presence of a physical infirmity. It is accomplished in the same way as a prostration for the reading of the Koran.

A traveller may accomplish without alighting any prostrations for the reading of the Koran, whether during prayer or out of prayer time, or any prostration of thanksgiving.

CHAPTER VI.—SUPEREROGATORY PRAYER

SUPEREROGATORY prayers are of two categories—

1. Those which are not prescribed by the Sonna to be performed at public prayer.

(a) Special acts of devotion combined with obligatory prayers, i.e. two rakas before morning prayer, two before midday prayer, evening prayer, and the prayer of the night. Some jurists, however, maintain that these rakas should not be combined with the prayer of the night ; others insist on the accomplishing of four rakas before the midday prayer, or four after it ; others on four before the afternoon prayer. All these rakas are no more than practices introduced by the Sonna ; they are not of rigorous observance. It is only those founded upon some imperative text of the Sonna as to whose rigorous observance there is some dispute amongst authorities. Some authors add the two rakas to be accomplished in haste before evening prayer. [††These two last rakas are also meritorious acts, for a direction to perform them is found in al-Bokhari's collection of traditions called as-Sahih. There should also be considered as imperative precepts of the Sonna the accomplishing of four rakas after the Friday public prayer, and before it as many rakas as before the midday prayer.

(b) The prayer called witr, or uneven, consisting of a single raka at least, and at the most eleven, or according to others, thirteen, rakas. A person who wished to perform more than one, may either combine them, or, better, accomplish each separately. The combination is done by means of a tashahad, and, for the last two, two tashahads. The time prescribed for the witr is between the prayer of the night and the appearance of the dawn. According to some authors the witr may not consist of only one raka except where preceded by another supererogatory prayer performed after the prayer of the night ; and the Sonna insists on the witr being the last prayer accomplished during the night. To this rule there is but one exception, viz. that the prayer called witr may be followed by the prayer called tahajjud (reveille) without requiring to be repeated ; a few jurists only maintaining that it is even then necessary to begin by praying a raka and then repeat the witr. It is commendable to add the kanut to the witr during the latter half of the month of Ramadan, and some consider this act to be commendable throughout the year. This kanut is the same as the kanut for morning prayer, except only that before beginning one pronounces the formula " O God, with sure trust in Thee we implore Thy succour and pardon," etc. [†On the contrary, this formula should be enounced after finishing the kanut ; it is also commendable to perform the witr at public prayer after finishing the prayer called the pauses, specially prescribed for the nights of the month of Ramadan.]

(c) The prayer called doha, i.e. late in the morning, consisting of not less than two, and not more than three rakas.

(d) †The salutation of a mosque. This act of devotion consists of two rakas, which may, however, be implicitly performed when one says any obligatory or supererogatory prayer, ††though it is not permissible to omit one of the rakas composing it, when accomplishing the act of devotion separately. [The salutation is not implicitly performed by saying a prayer for the dead, or by accomplishing a prostration for the reading of the Koran, or of thanksgiving. †It is repeated each time of approaching the sacred edifice.]

The legal time for such supererogatory acts of devotion as are accomplished before beginning some obligatory prayer is the time for that prayer ; and the legal time for such as are performed after finishing a prayer is the moment of accomplishing such prayer. In each case the legal time finishes at the same moment as the time for the prayer. *Where a supererogatory prayer, to be accomplished at a fixed time, has not been so performed, it is always commendable to practise it afterwards by way of reparation.

2. Supererogatory prayers prescribed by the Sonna to be performed at public prayer, on the occasion of the two yearly festivals, at an eclipse, or in time of drought. Acts of devotion of this category are in general of more importance than those which need not be performed at public prayer. †In spite of this, however, prayers of sub-category 1 (a) have priority over the prayer called tarawih, †though the Sonna prescribes that the latter must be accomplished at public prayer, and no such precept exists for supererogatory prayers in general. The believer who has performed the introductory takbir for more than one raka, may at choice accomplish the tashahad either for two rakas at once, or for each raka separately. [††It is forbidden in these circumstances to perform the tashahud for each raka separately.] The intention to say a certain number of rakas does not prevent the performing of a greater or smaller number, provided one expressly changes one's intention as to the number before deviating from the original idea, otherwise the prayer will be nullified. If, however, it is only by inadvertence that one has begun a third raka while the intention was to perform two, one may lawfully finish the third, although the intention has not previously been changed, if only one sits down immediately upon becoming aware of one's error. Only after having thus sat down may one lawfully recommence and terminate the raka in question.

[Of supererogatory prayers those performed at night are of most value, especially those said at midnight, and after them those said at the end of the night. It is commendable to pronounce the final salutation each time one finishes two rakas. The Sonna has also introduced the nocturnal prayer called tahajud; but it blames the practice of passing the whole night without going to bed, especially the night of Friday. It also blames the omitting of the tahajud, if one is in the habit of accomplishing it.

BOOK 3.—PUBLIC PRAYER

CHAPTER I.—GENERAL PROVISIONS

SECTION 1

THE Sonna imperatively prescribes the coming together of the faithful to perform in congregation the obligatory prayers. The performing of the Friday public prayer in congregation is a matter of rigorous observance; and some jurists maintain it to be the same with the daily prayers, and that all male believers are collectively responsible. This obligation, however, exists only in countries where Islam is an officially recognised religion. Inhabitants of such a country refusing to observe it should be executed. †The precept of the Sonna concerns the men only, and does not mention the women, whose presence at public prayer is not even a meritorious act. [†According to Shafi's personal opinion public prayer is an obligation for which the community is collectively responsible. Some authors maintain the obligation to be individual.]

It is preferable to pray publicly in a mosque, but neither is this rule applicable to women; and the more numerous the congregation the more valuable the prayer, provided the crowd be not attracted by any heretical innovations of the imam, and the neighbouring mosques be not deserted in consequence. It is recommended to reach the mosque so as to be present at the introductory takbir, the believer being considered to take part in the prayer if he begins this formula before the imam has finished it. Some authors, however, maintain one may arrive at any time before the kiyam, or even at the first inclination; ††and, strictly speaking, there is yet time so long as the final salutation has not been pronounced. The imam should perform his duty without either wasting time or neglecting any essential part or practice of the prayer. He need not haste, however, if all the congregation ask that the prayer should be accomplished slowly; but it is blamable to do this in order to give time to those that are late to join. *The imam may wait a moment if he sees a person come in at the inclination or the last tashahad, provided no distinction be made between the members of the community. [According to our school it is even commendable to wait under these circumstances.] But with the exception of the moment at the inclination and the tashahad of which we have just spoken, one never waits at public prayer. And according to the Souna any one who has made his prayer either alone †or in company with others should repeat it with the congregation when he enters the mosque at the moment the same act of devotion is being accomplished. According to the opinion of Shafii in his second period, it is the first prayer which is then considered as the obligatory prayer; †though one should formulate an intention for the second, as if it also were obligatory.

Whoever neglects attendance at public prayer is deserving of the most severe blame, even according to authors who see in that act only a precept of the Souna. But it is not necessary to go to the mosque if one has a valid general or personal excuse. Amongst excuses of a general character may be ranked rain, or a storm in the night, ††for too much mud on the road. Among personal excuses are reckoned illness, excessive heat or cold, impossibility of satisfying hunger or thirst, the necessity of preserving oneself from some impurity, the fear of incurring some injury to person or property, the pursuit of an importunate creditor, the avoiding of some chastisement by a few days' concealment, want of decent clothing, preparations for a voyage in company of a caravan about to start, the fact of having partaken of some food of disagreeable odour, wish not to leave a relative at the point of death, and finally the illness of any person to whom assistance is indispensable or to whom one is bound by ties of friendship.

At public prayer it is forbidden to pray, not only under the direction of a person whose prayer is known to be nullified, but even under that of a person the nullity of whose prayer one has reason to presume. Thus where two persons cannot agree upon the true direction of the kibla, even after doing their best to ascertain it; or if they differ as to which of two vessels for ablution is pure; one may not lawfully pray under the direction of either. The same if a choice has to be made from several vessels, even if the most of them are known to be pure. †But the vessel used by the imam should be used by the congregation until proof of its impurity; and one may even lawfully use without personal examination a vessel used by another, if one has no good reason for doubting its purity. Impurity of vessels for ablution gives rise to the following particular case:—when five similar vessels belong to five different individuals praying together in public, and amongst them one is impure but it is not known which, each of the five believing his own to be pure ; then each should use his own vessel for ablution ; but in order to be sure to avoid praying under the direction of an imam using an impure vessel, each should assume the function of imam at one of the five obligatory prayers, beginning with the morning prayer. †Then the prayer for the night should be repeated on their own account by four of them, i.e. all except the one who has already presided as imam, who should repeat on his own account the evening prayer. †A follower of Shafii praying under the direction of a follower of Abu Hanifa who has touched the private parts or has been bled without removing the impurity, lawfully performs his religious duty in the latter but not in the former case ; the ground of the distinction being the probable intention of the follower of Shafii, whose school does not admit impurity from bleeding. It is not permitted to follow as imam, either a person who prays under the direction of another, or a person obliged to repeat his act of devotion, e.g. one who, though living at a fixed place of abode, has recourse to ablution by sand.

According to the opinion of Shafii in his second period it is not lawful for one who can read and write to pray under the direction of an illiterate person. This latter phrase comprises—

1. He who suppresses a letter or a tashdid in the recitation of the first chapter of the Koran.
2. A stammerer who pronounces two letters as one, where the grammar does not require it.
3. A person who by defect of pronunciation substitutes one letter for another.

One illiterate may, however, pray under the direction of another illiterate, though it is blamable to be imam when one has a difficulty in pronouncing the letter “ t ” or the letter “ f ” or does not know the exact use of the vowels. And if this last defect is so grave as to alter the sense of the words, e.g. if instead of saying “ an’amta ” one says “ an’amto ” or “ an’amti,” the prayer is nullified, at least if the person in question ought to have known better. But if such person is merely perplexed and has time enough still to learn, he should be considered illiterate only if the mistakes are made in the reading of the first chapter of the Koran ; mistakes in the other parts of the prayers do not affect their validity, or disqualify the imam making them.

Neither a man nor a hermaphrodite may lawfully pray under the direction of a woman or of a hermaphrodite. A person who has performed ablution with sand or moistened the footgear may as imam lead another who has accomplished ritual ablution. A man standing may follow the lead of one sitting or lying on the side ; and a free adult may pray under the direction of a minor or a slave. Shafii himself says that the blind is in this respect as he that can see. †And an individual with no bodily infirmity may pray under the direction of one subject to an unhealthy issue of urine or sperm ; or a woman in a state of purity follow the lead of one subject to hæmorrhage after menses, provided the latter is in no uncertainty upon the subject. If it subsequently appears that an imam under whose direction one has prayed is a woman or a notorious unbeliever, or even according to some a secret unbeliever, the prayer should be repeated. But this is not necessary if it merely appears afterwards that the imam had incurred some, or even a grave impurity, or was secretly in contact with some impure object. [†The personal opinion of Shafii, which is generally accepted, is to the effect that the unbeliever who has concealed his infidelity should be considered in this matter as if he had openly proclaimed it.] †The rule applying to the case of a woman under whose direction one has erroneously prayed applies also to that of an illiterate person ; *while inversely a repetition is necessary if one has taken for a hermaphrodite an imam who appears afterwards to be a man.

A man of irreproachable character has more right to be an imam than a person of notorious misconduct ; †and a savant more than one who can merely read and write, or who has the merely negative quality of having done nothing wrong. A savant, or even a merely lettered man, has more right than an older man or one of undoubted descent ; but according to the opinion of Shafii in his second period age has precedence over birth. Where two persons are equal in all these respects preference will depend on cleanliness of clothing or body, sonority of voice, profession, trade, and so on. An owner of landed property, even if not otherwise the most worthy of the congregation, has a better right to be imam than he who possesses nothing ; and if incapable of assuming the functions himself, he has a right to nominate the imam. The master has a right of precedence over the slave living on his land ; but the law accords him no such precedence if the slave is under contract of enfranchisement. †The tenant has precedence over the lessor, the lender over the borrower ; and in his province the Governor has precedence over the learned man or the landowner.

No one may place himself in front of the imam, and an infraction of this rule nullifies the prayer, according at least to the opinion supported by Shafii in his second period. There is, however, no objection to being on the same line with him, though it is always commendable to keep a little distance. Whether one is before or behind depends on the position of the heels. At public prayer in the Masjid-al-Haram at Mecca a circle is formed round the sanctuary ; †and in that case a person on the other side to the imam may approach nearer than he. One can also approach nearer the wall if imam and congregation make their prayer inside the sanctuary and turn in two different directions. If in these circumstances the congregation consists of one man, he may place himself on the imam's right, and any one coming afterwards should place himself on the left. Then the imam moves forward a little, or, better, the others move back. If the congregation in the sanctuary consists originally of two men, or of a man and a minor of the same sex, they should place themselves behind the imam. The same rule applies to a congregation composed of one or more women.

In general, men should place themselves in front behind the imam, then male minors ; and last of all the women, the person who directs their prayer being in the front rank among them. When praying under any one's direction, one should not occupy a place apart, but place oneself if possible in one of the rows. Otherwise, immediately after the introductory takbir, one should draw some one towards oneself, and the person so drawn must comply with this demand. The congregation should be kept informed of the movements of the imam, either by looking at him or at other members close by, or by the muballigh or person specially charged with communicating to the congregation in the large mosques the acts and words of the imam.

If the imam and a member of the congregation are in a mosque, the distance between them is immaterial, whatever may be the shape of the edifice ; but if they are praying in a plain it must never exceed three hundred cubits more or less ; according to some jurists this is the absolute maximum. If the question relate to two persons or two rows, the distance is measured between these persons or rows, and not between the last person of the last row and the imam. It is of little importance if the plain is private property, real property or part property ; ††or if the distance is cut by a public road or an unfordable stream. If the imam and the person praying under his direction are in different buildings, e.g. one in the interior and the other in the vestibule of a mosque or in a chamber apart, the following distinctions are to be observed :—

1. The place of the follower is to right or left of the imam. In this case they must be in the same storey, †interrupted or not, of the buildings.

2. The place of the follower is behind the imam. ††In this case there must not be between the two buildings a greater distance than three cubits.

3. According to another system three hundred cubits is the maximum distance permitted between the two buildings as in the case of the plain ; but in any case, for the validity of the prayer it is necessary that there should be no separation between the two places, or that at least they should communicate by an open door. If there intervene an obstacle to passage but not to sight, opinions differ. All authors, however, agree that if a wall intervenes the prayer is invalid. [†I prefer the second system.]

If a person can lawfully follow, as imam, another person in another building, he can in his turn lead the other's prayer, in spite of a separation.

If one is in a higher or lower position than the imam, it is necessary that at least some part of the body should be at the same height. If one be outside the mosque and the imam inside, with nothing intervening, the distance should be measured from the edifice, or, according to some authors, from the last rows of the congregation. Under these circumstances a wall or a locked door prevent participation in public prayer, †as do also a door closed but not locked, and a railing. [It is blamable for a believer to be in a higher or lower position than the imam ; unless it is the only position possible, in which case it is even praiseworthy. One should not begin a prayer before the muezzin has finished the second call, nor begin a supererogatory prayer at the moment when the muezzin has already begun the second call ; but such prayer if already begun should be concluded unless one fears that the time for public prayer will thus be taken up.]

SECTION 4

One can only pray under the direction of another if one has formulated the intention of following his lead or of performing public prayer, an intention which should accompany the introductory takbir. ††There is no difference in this respect between a Friday and any other public prayer ; but if the intention be lacking the prayer is void, even though otherwise completely accomplished. The law does not insist that the intention of the congregation shall refer to any special imam ; but the prayer is void if such intention be formed, and there is an error as to the person. On the other hand, it is not necessary that the imam should formulate the intention to perform his functions, though it is a commendable practice. An error committed by an imam in designating some particular person about to pray under his direction does not prejudice the validity of the prayer.

A person who prays in order to perform his religious duty at the time prescribed by law may take as his imam a person who prays in order to accomplish his duty by way of reparation. One may also perform an obligatory prayer under the direction of an imam who is accomplishing a supererogatory prayer ; and perform midday prayer under the direction of an imam who is accomplishing afternoon prayer, and vice versâ. The midday prayer may even be performed under the direction of an imam who is accomplishing the morning or evening prayer ; but in that case the believer should act as if he were behind the congregation, and accomplish afterwards the rakas that are in his own prayer but not in that of the imam. When the imam proceeds to the kanut at morning prayer, or to the last jelus of the evening prayer, one may then either follow him or leave the congregation. *And so, on the other hand, one may perform morning prayer, taking as imam one who is accomplishing that for midday, though the latter is longer than the former ; and then one may either pronounce the final salutation and leave the congregation as soon as the imam begins the third raka, or remain quietly in one's place to the end of the ceremony without taking part in it, and pronounce the final salutation along with the imam. [This latter course is the better.] When the believer has an opportunity of performing the kanut of the second raka, while the imam is not speaking, he should do so ; but if this be impossible he may either omit that formula or cease to pray under the direction of the imam and recite it by himself. ††It must always, however, be quite understood that one cannot perform under the direction of an imam a prayer which differs in its essential practices from that which the imam himself is accomplishing. Thus one may not perform one of the five obligatory prayers under the direction of an imam who is accomplishing prayer on the occasion of an eclipse, or a funeral prayer.

One should follow the imam in the different acts constituting prayer, commencing each shortly after the imam, without waiting for him to finish it. Strictly speaking, however, one can begin each act at the same time as the imam, with the exception of the introductory takbir. †If one is still occupied with another essential element of the prayer, i.e. when the imam has already finished such element, while one is still occupied with the preceding, the prayer is not therefore nullified. This only occurs when the interval between the imam and the member of the congregation amounts to two essential elements of the prayer, without valid excuse. If such excuse exists, e.g. if the imam has hurried over the recitation of the Koran, and bent in prayer before the member of the congregation has finished his recitation, that member should, according to some authors, follow the imam, omitting the remainder of his recitation. ††Others think the recitation should first be concluded, and the imam followed afterwards. But the interval between imam and member must never exceed three essential elements of importance, i.e. which cannot be hurriedly accomplished. If this should occur, the member must stop praying under the direction of the imam, according to some opinions ; †or else he should follow the imam in what he is actually doing, and accomplish what has been omitted after the imam has pronounced the final salutation. In case the member of the congregation is unable to conclude the recitation with the imam, because occupied with the introductory invocation, he is considered excusable.

This only applies to a member of the congregation who has been present at the ceremony from the beginning. One who is behindhand because he arrived late, and has in consequence not yet finished his recitation when the imam bends in prayer, ‡should stop his recitation, bend, and join the imam in the raka, provided the imam be not at the moment occupied with the introductory invocation or the tawuz, for in this case the recitation should be continued as much as possible. When behindhand like this, after pronouncing the introductory takbir, one should pay no attention to the practices introduced by the Sonna, but limit oneself to the recitation of the first chapter of the Koran, unless one is quite sure of being able to catch up the others. A member of the congregation who during the rokua perceives he has omitted the recitation, or is uncertain about it, should not go back, but should pray one raka after the imam has pronounced the final salutation. If this recollection or doubt occurs after the imam has bent in prayer, but before the member has done so, he should first proceed to the recitation and then has an excuse for remaining behindhand. Others, however, think he should bend in prayer with the imam, and accomplish the omitted portion after the final salutation. If the member of the congregation has preceded the imam in saying the introductory takbir his prayer is null ; but if he has only preceded him in the recitation and the tashahad, his prayer is valid and he has legally acquitted himself of his duty before God. Some authors, however, prescribe that in these circumstances the prayer should be recommenced with the imam. Finally, if one has preceded the imam in some material act, e.g. inclination or prostration, the prayer is nullified, if the error affects two essential elements ; otherwise not. A few authorities contend that the prayer is nullified even if only one essential element is affected.

SECTION 6

When the imam stops praying the congregation ceases legally to pray under his direction. Each member indeed can stop praying under the direction of the imam whenever he pleases ; though according to one authority such a course is only lawful if there be some valid excuse for withdrawing from public prayer. With respect to this, there should be added to the excuses already mentioned the case where an imam unnecessarily prolongs a prayer, or omits some important precept of the Sonna, such as the first tashahad.

*One may begin a prayer on one's own account and resolve afterwards to continue it under the direction of the imam, even if the latter has already begun. Even if the imam be already occupied with a different raka, one can still take him as model, and get up and sit down when he does. When, under these circumstances, the prayer of the imam terminates first, one should act like any other person who was not present at the beginning. But if one is finished before the imam, one can either leave the congregation, pronouncing the final salutation on one's own account, or wait and finish the prayer along with the imam. The part of the prayer which the imam is accomplishing at the entry of a late arrival, is considered, so far as the latter is concerned, as the first part of the prayer. Consequently, in the part of the prayer he has still to make on his own account, he must repeat the kanut pronounced by the imam, if this formula is of strict observance. Similarly a member who joins the congregation at one of the rakas of evening prayer should say the tashahad in his own second raka ; but it should be remembered that an arrival at the moment the imam bends in prayer is considered to have been present at the entire raka. [Provided one keeps still before the imam gets up after the rukua ; even when the latter is accomplished in the most simple manner.] *If one is doubtful of having participated in a raka at the right moment, that raka cannot count.

On joining the congregation one should accomplish the takbir twice, once as introduction to the prayer, and once for the inclination. One takbir will not suffice for the two acts ; except, according to some authors, in a supererogatory prayer. ††One takbir is of no use if performed without thinking of the double function of this formula. When a person joins the congregation at the moment the imam is performing the aatidal, the later portions of the prayer are valid for him on accomplishing one takbir ; †and such person should say with the imam the tashahad, and the formulas beginning with the word sobhana. †A person who does not arrive before the prostration, an act of no profit to him, need not say a takbir on joining the congregation. But after the imam's final salutation the person behindhand in this way should get up and pronounce the formula in question, provided he has sat under the direction of the imam at the place he performed the jelus in a former raka accomplished on his own account ; †otherwise he should omit the takbir altogether.

CHAPTER II.—PRAYER ACCOMPLISHED ON A JOURNEY

SECTION 1

OF prayers that fall to be performed in the course of a long journey, undertaken with a lawful object, only the fourfold prayers may be abridged. This indulgence of the law does not extend to a prayer whose proper legal time has been allowed to pass by when not travelling. *If this oversight has occurred when travelling, the prayer can be performed afterwards abridged, if the journey is not yet over, but not after one's return home.

A traveller leaving a town is considered to have begun his journey when he has passed not only the ramparts †but also the habitations of the neighbourhood. [†These are of no account.] If the town has no ramparts the journey begins after passing the last buildings, without considering what ruins or gardens may be in the neighbourhood ; and the same principle applies also to a village. The journey of a nomad living in a tent begins from the limit of the camp. The journey may be considered at an end when one has repassed these same boundaries. If the traveller stops anywhere intentionally for four days, the journey is suspended for that period, by the mere fact of arrival at this temporary halting place. ††But in the four days is included neither the day of arrival nor the day of departure. On arriving at a town with the intention of stopping only as long as the finishing of one's business requires, prayer may be abridged for eighteen days ; or according to some opinions four days, while according to others there is no restriction of time. There are authorities too who consider an abridgment warranted if the delay is caused by fear of being attacked, but not during a stay for some commercial object. However this may be, our rite does not allow abridgment if a long stay is anticipated.

SECTION 2

Prayer may be abridged if a journey extends to at least forty-eight miles of Hashim. [This distance is the equivalent of two days' journey with loaded camels. Distances on land and sea being the same, prayer may be abridged even where a ship might under full sail cover the distance in an hour.]

The traveller must from the start have a fixed destination. Therefore he cannot abridge prayer if either—

1. He wanders aimlessly here and there, whatever the distance may be.

2. He is looking for a debtor or a slave whose whereabouts he does not know, and after finding whom he means to return home.

If of two roads leading to the same destination one chooses the longer for some reason or other, e.g. because of the level or the security, prayer may still be abridged. *But this is not so if the choice be made from mere caprice. A slave, a wife, or a soldier travelling under the authority of other persons, and ignorant of their destination, may not abridge prayer; even when such persons have an idea the journey will be long, only the soldier may abridge prayer, not the slave or the wife. If a person starts with the intention of making a long journey, and returns voluntarily before completing it, it is finished none the less, and if he starts again it is considered a new journey.

No one has the benefit of abridging prayer who leaves their abode for an illicit purpose, e.g. as a fugitive slave, or a wife deserting her husband. †It is the same if a journey begun lawfully is continued unlawfully; while, on the other hand, prayer may be abridged on a journey continued with a lawful object though unlawfully begun.

A traveller who has prayed even for a moment under the direction of an imam who is accomplishing the entire prayer without abridgment, should also finish it without abridgment. This principle is carried so far that a traveller cannot invoke the right of abridgment, if he has begun his prayer under the direction of another traveller, who in the middle of it incurred some unforeseen impurity, e.g. a nasal hæmorrhage, and was replaced by another imam who did not abridge. If under these circumstances the first imam rejoins the congregation and resumes his functions after the disappearance of his impurity, the traveller must yet continue his prayer without abridgment. A prayer accomplished by a traveller without abridgment because following an imam must be repeated entire in regular fashion, if it has to be repeated because of some fault of the traveller or the imam, or because the latter is afterwards discovered to be impure. The same rule is observed if one has to repeat a prayer accomplished under the direction of an imam one supposed to be a traveller but afterwards discovered to be living at a fixed abode, or of an imam with regard to whom one did not know whether he was a traveller or not. On the other hand, one may lawfully abridge prayer after having formulated one's intention; when, at the moment of formulating that intention, one knew that the imam was not living at a fixed abode, though uncertain if he intended to abridge prayer or not. †One may even, in this state of uncertainty, formulate the intention conditionally, i.e. "if the imam abridges the prayer I will do so with him, but otherwise perform it in the ordinary manner."

To abridge prayer lawfully one must intend to do so from the beginning, and avoid anything incompatible with that intention, throughout the whole act of devotion. Thus a believer cannot claim a right to abridge prayer if :—(1) he has begun the prayer intending to shorten it, but has afterwards hesitated to keep to this intention ; or (2) he is not sure of having had the intention of shortening the prayer ; or (3) if the imam gets up to perform a third raka, and one is not certain if it is in order to accomplish the entire prayer without abridgment, or by inadvertence.

The prayer is nullified, if one begins intending to shorten it, and then in spite of that knowingly begins the third raka, without special cause for deviating from one's original idea. But if this is a mere inadvertence one may either :—(1) resume one's position, and after a prostration by way of reparation pronounce final salutation ; or (2) change one's intention and accomplish the whole prayer without shortening it ; but in that case one should first resume one's position, and then get up again at once to perform the later rakas.

Another essential condition for the lawful shortening of prayer is that one must be able to consider oneself as a traveller throughout the entire duration of the act of devotion. If one expects to arrive at one's destination during prayer, or if one's vessel arrives in port, the prayer must be normally accomplished.

On a journey of at least three days it is better to abridge prayer than to perform it in the ordinary way. But the traveller is recommended to observe the fast of the month of Ramadan, rather than exercise his right to break it, at least when this can be done without danger.

SECTION 3

During a journey that admits of abridgment of prayer, one may combine the midday and afternoon prayers, and the evening prayer with that of the night ; performing the combined prayers at the usual time of the earlier or of the later of the two. According to one jurist this may be done even when the length of the journey does not admit of the shortening of prayer. If one is actually travelling at the legal time for the midday or evening prayer, it is better to postpone it until the time of afternoon prayer or of the prayer of the night, as the case may be, and accomplish the two prayers together.

One may anticipate a later prayer only on three conditions :—

(1) One must first perform the prayer for which the legal time has come. Its illegality involves that of the second, anticipated, prayer—but not vice versâ.

(2) One must intend to combine the two prayers, when one begins the first, or at least before its completion.

(3) The two prayers must not have any considerable interval between them; otherwise the second prayer must be postponed to its proper time. Whether an interval is considerable or not is a matter of custom.

††The believer who has had recourse to lustration with sand may lawfully combine prayers, as well as one who has performed ritual ablution or bathed. Asking for something in a hurry between the two prayers is not considered a breach of continuity. If, after combining two prayers one remembers that one has omitted from the former some essential element, both are nullified and must be repeated together, but if it is one of the essential elements of the second that has been omitted, the error may be rectified by recommencing the act of devotion at the place of omission, if no long interval has elapsed. If a considerable interval has been allowed to ensue, the second prayer only, not the first, is nullified; and the combination of the two prayers becomes unlawful. If uncertain whether the omitted portions belonged to the first or second prayer, both prayers should be separately repeated at their respective legal hours.

††If the second prayer has not been anticipated, but the first postponed to the legal time for the second, they can be combined without observing the order, without causing one to follow immediately on the other, and even without formulating an intention to combine them. But this intention should have existed already when one resolved at its prescribed hour to postpone the first, otherwise one is guilty of an irregularity, and the first prayer counts merely as an act of devotion performed too late.

If, when one wishes to combine two prayers by anticipating one of them, one arrives at a fixed place of abode before beginning the second, their combination becomes unlawful; but this is not so if one has already begun, and still less if one has finished, the second prayer. And if, in a case where the first prayer has been postponed, one reaches a fixed abode after having accomplished both, both remain valid; but if they are not finished before arrival, the first counts only as an act of devotion accomplished too late. Rain is a good reason for combining two prayers by anticipating the second; while, on the other hand, Shafii in his second period decided that it is no excuse for a postponement. Anticipation is, however, permitted only where rain is actually falling at the beginning of each prayer, †and at the moment of final salutation in the first. Snow and hail, when sufficient to wet the clothes, are regarded as rain. *This faculty of combination refers especially to the believer performing public prayer in a distant mosque, who is afraid of getting wet before reaching home if he starts at once.

CHAPTER III.—PUBLIC PRAYER ON FRIDAYS

SECTION 1

PUBLIC prayer on Fridays is obligatory only for adult male Moslems, sane, free, domiciled in the place, and not obliged to remain at home by sickness, etc. It is not obligatory for any one with a valid excuse for not attending daily public prayer, for one under contract of enfranchisement, ††for one partially enfranchised. Those for whom public prayer on Fridays is not obligatory have nevertheless a right to be present, provided they can legally perform midday prayer; though the law allows them the option of leaving the congregation after the midday prayer, before proceeding to that for the week. This rule does not apply to believers who, having a mere accidental excuse for absence, such as sickness, etc., happen to be in the mosque at the time of weekly prayer; these are forbidden to leave, unless their sickness is increased by remaining. Weekly public prayer is obligatory even for decrepit and sickly persons, if they have means of transport and can endure it without pain. The blind should attend, if he can find some one to lead him. The inhabitants of a village should perform weekly prayer, if they are in sufficient number for it, otherwise they should go for this purpose to a neighbouring town or village, if a call can be heard from the one to the other, in the silence of the night. If the distance is too great for this, then there is no obligation to go.

The law forbids any one who should attend the Friday prayer beginning a journey upon that day immediately after the sun has begun to decline, unless he happens to have to take the road that leads to the place of meeting, or he is afraid of incurring some detriment from leaving later and consequently being obliged to remain in the rear of the caravan. According to the opinion of Shafii in his second period this rule applies also to the case of a person wishing to leave a little before the sun begins to decline, at least if the journey is merely allowable; but if the departure is commendable or obligatory, one may choose what hour one pleases. [†A journey, whether it be merely allowable, or commendable, or obligatory, is in all cases subject to the prohibition to start on Friday at the time mentioned.]

should still, according to the Sonna, be present at the public midday prayer on that day. It is better, however, that they should not take part in it, but remain concealed, unless the cause of their absence from the Friday prayer is a matter of public notoriety. It is also recommended to believers who consider themselves temporarily excused from attending the Friday prayer, to postpone the midday prayer on that day as long as possible, until sure of being unable to go to the weekly function ; but those, on the other hand, who have a permanent excuse, such as women and sickly persons, should perform the midday prayer as soon as the hour has sounded.

Besides the conditions already mentioned, the law has established for the validity of weekly public prayer, the following :—

1. It must take place at the time prescribed for midday prayer. If this is past, the Friday prayer cannot be performed, as it may not be accomplished too late by way of reparation. If one is afraid that the legal time does not suffice for its completion, one should say the midday prayer and no more ; and if the legal time expires during the ceremony, it should be concluded as an ordinary midday prayer. Only one author maintains that this prayer should be accomplished from beginning to end. A person who arrives late and lags behind should finish his act of devotion as a midday prayer ; though according to some authors he should finish the weekly prayer as if nothing were the matter.

2. Public weekly prayer must be performed in a place surrounded by edifices inhabited by members of the community ; *so that people living in tents in the desert cannot accomplish it.

3. In the same town, public prayer on Friday cannot be performed in different places, either simultaneously or successively, unless the town be so extensive that its inhabitants cannot easily assemble in one spot. Some jurists do not admit this exception ; others think that any town divided by a large river should be considered in this respect as two separate towns ; others again are of opinion that in the case of several villages with contiguous buildings, the ceremony may be held in as many places as there are distinct communes. When Friday public prayer has been accomplished in one place, and others proceed to perform it in too near a neighbourhood, the former alone is lawful, unless the Sultan attends the latter, in which case it alone is lawful, in spite of not having priority. To determine which of two public prayers has priority it is necessary to observe the time of the introductory takbir ; or, according to some authors, the moment when the congregation disperses ; while a third doctrine maintains that the important point is the beginning of the first sermon. If two public prayers begin at the same time, or it is not certain if one began first, the ceremony should be begun over again. When, on the contrary, it is known that one began before the other, but it is not certain which, or it has been forgotten, then midday prayer only must be accomplished. One jurist maintains that even then one should perform the Friday prayer.

4. Weekly public prayer can be accomplished only in congregation, and is in that respect subject to the rules detailed in Chapter I. of this Book. The congregation must consist of at least forty Moslems, adult, sane, free men, domiciled in the place, i.e. who leave it neither in winter nor summer, except by necessity. The ††Friday prayer is regularly performed even if the congregation consist only of forty sick persons. The imam can be included in the legal forty. If the congregation wholly or partly disperses during the sermon, leaving less than forty behind, the continuation of the service is invalid ; but if they return after a short interval it can be resumed from the place of interruption. *If the interval is long the whole ceremony must be begun over again ; and if the congregation disperses during the prayer, the latter is nullified. Only one author thinks this is not so if at least two persons remain in the mosque. *The weekly service may be performed under the direction of a minor, a slave, or a traveller, provided there are forty persons present besides them. *If the imam has contracted an impurity, whether grave or slight, the service is still lawful if forty persons besides him are present, but not otherwise. ††But if one begins the prayer at the rokua under an impure imam the whole raka is invalid.

5. Before beginning the prayer the imam must deliver two sermons, consisting of five parts :—(a) the praise of God ; (b) the prayer for the Prophet, consisting like (a) of certain special words ; (c) an exhortation to virtue, ††of which the wording is not prescribed. These three parts must occur in each of the two sermons. (d) A recitation of a verse of the Koran in one of the two sermons. Some authorities maintain that this recitation should take place in the first sermon ; others that it should occur in both ; yet others that it is not obligatory at all. (e) An invocation, as the word is ordinarily understood, for the good of Moslems, in the second sermon. A few authors consider it not obligatory. The sermons must be delivered in Arabic, observing the proper order of succession of (a), (b) and (c) ; and the proper time must have arrived, that is the sun must have begun to decline. The imam remains standing, if possible, when delivering each sermon, but sits down during the interval between them. The sermons should be pronounced so that at least the minimum legal congregation could hear them. Shafii, in his second period expressed the opinion that it is not absolutely prohibited for the members of the congregation to speak a few words when listening to the sermons. The Souna insists on the congregation being silent when listening to the imam. [†The order of succession of the parts of the sermons is not a matter of rigorous observation.] *The following are essential conditions for the validity of the sermons :—(a) uninterrupted delivery ; (b) absence of any grave or slight impurity in the imam, who (c) must be decently dressed. The Sonna has introduced the following additional practices :—(a) delivery from a pulpit or other elevated place ; (b) a preliminary salutation by the imam of those close to the pulpit, his turning towards the congregation when mounting the steps, and salutation of the whole congregation when taking his seat ; it is only then that the first call is intoned ; (c) eloquence, intelligibility and conciseness ; (d) turning neither to the right nor to the left ; (e) leaning during delivery upon a sword, stick or something similar ; (f) remaining seated between the sermons as long as is required to recite chapter 112 of the Koran.

After the second sermon the muezzin intones the second call to prayer, while the imam hastens to descend from the pulpit so as to be facing the mihrab before the second call is finished. He then says a prayer consisting of two rakas ; in the first he recites aloud chapter 62 of the Koran, and in the second chapter 63, both after reciting chapter 1.

The Sonna recommends every believer to take a bath before attending Friday public prayer. Some authorities extend the recommendation to those who do not attend the service. The bath can strictly be taken at any time after dawn, but it is preferable to take it as soon as possible before going to the mosque. †Those unable to take a bath should have recourse to ablution with sand. The Sonna also prescribes—

1. The taking of a bath on the occasion of each of the great festivals ; at an eclipse, or in time of drought ; when about to wash a corpse ; on recovery from an attack of insanity or a fainting fit. It is prescribed to an infidel upon his conversion, and for pilgrims to Mecca. The bathing of a person about to wash a corpse is more imperative than the Friday bath ; though Shafii in his first period maintained the contrary opinion. [*This former opinion is the better ; being accepted by the majority of authorities and based on several authentic traditions, while only one authentic tradition supports the opinion adopted by Shafii in Egypt.]

2. Going to the mosque early, on foot, in a state of composed meditation.

3. On the way, and in the mosque before the service begins, reciting a portion of the Koran, or glorifying God.

4. Refraining from outstripping other members of the congregation on their way to the mosque.

5. Wearing one's best clothes, using scent, paring the nails, and removing any disagreeable bodily odour.

[The Sonna also recommends the recitation of chapter 18 of the Koran, both on the day and night of Friday, and to pronounce on that day several invocations and prayers for the prophet. Once the first call has been intoned, those present at the service are rigorously prohibited from occupying themselves with commercial or other affairs, in the preacher's presence. A bargain, however, struck in contravention of this rule, cannot be legally invalidated on that ground. It is considered blamable to conclude a bargain even before the first call if the sun has already begun to decline.]

SECTION 3

A person who takes part in the Friday public prayer from the inclination in the second raka is considered to have been present at the whole ceremony ; and all he needs to do is to perform one single raka more, after the imam has pronounced the final salutation. But if he enters after that inclination, he is considered to have been absent at the whole prayer ; and should perform midday prayer in four rakas, after the imam's final salutation.

†Each member of the congregation should have an intention to accomplish the Friday public prayer under the direction of the imam. If the imam is obliged to discontinue Friday public prayer, or any other prayer, by reason of a slight impurity, etc., *another may continue the function. Only, in the case of Friday public prayer, the imam may be replaced solely by a member of the congregation who has prayed under his direction until the moment when the impurity was ascertained, †but who need not have been present at the sermons or even at the first raka. It is clear, however, that if the substitute has been present from the beginning of the first raka, the ceremony continued under his direction will be valid both for him and for the congregation ; †otherwise it will be valid for the congregation only and not for him. The substitute should continue the function just as the imam himself would have done, whether he has been present since the beginning of the prayer, or whether he came late and so is behind the congregation. Consequently if he has still to perform two rakas and the congregation only one, he should proceed at once to the tashahud after finishing his first raka. Then he should inform the congregation that they may cease praying under his direction, or wait until he has finished his second raka and finish the service together. †The congregation need not renew their intention when continuing the service under the direction of a substitute.

If the crowded condition of a mosque obliges the believer, when making his prostration, to rest his body, not on the ground but on the body of one of his neighbours, the prostration is still valid. ††If prostration is quite impossible he must wait till the others get up ; he must not substitute for the prostration a mere nodding of the head. Under these circumstances the following distinctions are to be drawn :—

1. If the believer has still time to prostrate himself before the imam bends in prayer in the second raka he should do so, and after rising he should :—(a) take part in the recitation if the imam is still standing ; (b) †bend his body with the imam if the latter has already begun the inclination of the following raka, acting like a person who has arrived late ; (c) take part in that portion of the prayer with which the imam is occupied, if the latter has already finished the inclination of the next raka, but not pronounced the final salutation, and then after the service perform a supplementary raka ; (d) but he has missed the service altogether if the imam has already pronounced the final salutation.

2. If the believer has no time to prostrate himself before the imam bends in prayer in the second raka. One author is of opinion that he should prostrate himself as soon as possible and finish the prayer on his own account, *but other authorities think he should bend his body with the imam. †This inclination, though the imam's second, is considered to be the believer's first, and so his raka consists of the inclination of the imam's first raka and the prostration of the second. ††This, however, does not prevent one accomplishing in this way the entire Friday prayer. The authors referred to go so far as to consider the whole prayer nullified if the believer prostrates himself on his own account, while knowing that he ought to incline with the imam. But if he has so prostrated himself through oversight or ignorance it is only that first prostration which does not count ; and if he has occasion to prostrate himself a second time, the latter prostration is valid. †One has thus accomplished all the essential elements of a raka, and is considered to have performed the Friday prayer, provided the two prostrations are finished before the imam pronounces the final salutation. When, owing to forgetfulness, the member of the congregation has lagged so far behind that the imam is already bending in the second raka when he is still prostrated in the first, he should, according to our school, bend in prayer with the imam.

CHAPTER IV.—PRAYER IN CASE OF DANGER

SECTION 1

THERE are three categories of this prayer :—

1. When the enemy comes from the direction of the kibla, the imam should draw up his army in two or more lines, and pray with all his soldiers up to the prostration, when one of the lines should prostrate itself with him for the two prescribed prostrations of the first raka, while the other soldiers remain on guard. Then before beginning the second raka those who at first remained on guard perform two prostrations on their own account, and after that the whole army begins the second raka with the imam. In this raka the soldiers who remained on guard during the prostrations of the first raka prostrate themselves with the imam, while the others remain in their turn on guard until the imam sits down, when they prostrate themselves on their own account. The tashahad and the final salutation should be accomplished by all together. This manner of prayer was introduced by the Prophet of God at the battle of Osfan. It is also permissible for the two divisions of a single line to remain on guard by turn in the two rakas; for even a single division may remain on guard in the two rakas while the imam prostrates himself, provided, as we have just seen, that these omitted prostrations are accomplished at the end of each raka.

2. When the enemy does not come from the direction of the kibla, and consequently it is impossible to face the prescribed point without exposing the rear or the flank, the imam should perform the prayer twice, each time with a separate portion of the army while the other portion is held ready to repel an attack. This was done by the Prophet of God at the battle of Batn-Nakhl.

3. When one only of two divisions of an army is in face of the enemy, the imam first prays one raka with the other division, and when he is about to begin the second raka this division stops praying under his direction, pronounces the final salutation, and relieves the division on guard, which then joins the imam and accomplishes the second raka under his direction. After the imam has sat down for the tashahad, the whole army performs another raka on its own account—the second so far as the soldiers are concerned—and this raka finished, the army begins to pray again under the direction of the imam and pronounces with him the final salutation. This course was adopted by the Prophet of God at the battle of Zat ar Rika, and is better than that followed at Batn-Nakhl. After the departure of the first division the imam should recite some passage of the Koran until the arrival of the second. On finishing this recitation he says the tashahad ; though this, according to one jurist, should be deferred until the second division has joined him. In the case of evening prayer the imam should pray two rakas with the first division and one with the second. *This is better than the other way about, though the latter is also permissible. The imam should so arrange that the second division may arrive either during the first tashahad of the second raka, or, †better, during the kiyam of the third. In the case of a fourfold prayer he should pray two successive rakas with each of the two divisions, *though he may also divide his army into four and pray a single raka with each. The entire army is responsible for the negligences that each division may commit in the raka it prays under the direction of the imam, i.e. its first raka ; †and the same responsibility exists for faults of this nature committed by the second division in the second raka, but not for those of the first division in its own second raka. A negligence of the imam in the first raka is imputed to the whole army, but if it occurs in his second raka, i.e. the first of the second division, it is imputed to that division only.

The Sonna prescribes that in these three categories of prayer weapons should not be laid aside ; and one jurist considers this to be of rigorous observance.

4. In the midst of a battle or other imminent danger, one must pray as one can, whether riding or afoot. One need not turn in the direction of the kibla, †and may even, if necessary, omit most of the practices of which prayer consists. Prayer, however, can never be performed shouting ; and one must always, if possible, lay aside weapons if ever so little blood-stained ; but if circumstances do not permit the laying aside of one's weapons, one may, if it is absolutely necessary, pray while holding blood-stained weapons in the hand, *without being obliged to repeat this act of devotion later. If it is impossible to perform the bending and the prostration, one makes only a sign of the head, lower in the latter case than in the former. One can pray like this both in combat and flight where combat or flight is permissible ; and also when escaping from a fire, a flood, a fierce beast, or even a pressing creditor who threatens his debtor with bodily restraint ; †but such a course is not permissible for a pilgrim to Mecca who is afraid of invalidating his pilgrimage by arriving too late for the ceremony at Mount Arafat. *If one has prayed in this manner in presence of a troop of persons supposed erroneously to be the enemy, one's prayer must be performed over again on discovering the mistake.

SECTION 2

The law forbids a man to clothe himself in silk or to use it as carpet or covering. A woman may wear clothes of silk; †but neither may she use this material for carpet or covering. †A guardian may clothe in silk a minor of whom he has charge. [†A woman may use silk also as carpet or covering; at least it has been so decided by jurists of Irak, and others.]

Silk clothes may, however, be legally worn by men :—

1. When urgently necessary; e.g. in case of extreme heat or cold, or if some unforeseen attack obliges him to snatch up the first thing he can find, and he can find no other.

2. For the sake of health; e.g. if infected with itch or other cutaneous malady, or to protect himself from vermin.

3. In time of war; brocade having qualities that render it particularly useful to the soldier.

It is forbidden to use a material composed of silk and threads of some other stuff, if the weight of the silk exceeds the weight of the other threads, †but if otherwise it is permissible. Silk lace or embroidery is not forbidden, if the coat is not ornamented in an extravagant manner.

And finally one may lawfully wear an impure coat when not praying or performing some other act of devotion; but except in case of urgent necessity such as an unforeseen attack, one may not cover oneself with dogskin or pigskin, †nor with the skin of any animal that has died a natural death.

It is not forbidden to burn in a lamp oil that has become impure.

CHAPTER V.—PUBLIC PRAYER AT THE TWO GREAT FESTIVALS OF THE YEAR

SECTION 1

This prayer is prescribed by the Sonna only, though some authors maintain it is a rigorous obligation for which the community is collectively responsible. The prayer may be accomplished either in public or on one's own account. Slaves, women, and travellers should take part in it as well as other believers. The legal time for this prayer is between sunrise and the moment when the sun begins to decline, but it is preferable not to begin the ceremony before the elevation of the sun has reached the height of a lance.

The prayer consists first of two introductory rakas; then is pronounced the introductory invocation; and after that are said seven takbirs, with a pause between each two takbirs of a length sufficient for the recitation of a verse of the Koran of medium length. On the termination of the takbirs the confession of faith is pronounced, followed by another takbir and a glorification of God, preferably in the following terms:—"Praise to God," "Glory to God," "There is no god but God," or "God is great." Finally the tawaz is accomplished and the first chapter of the Koran recited. In the second raka five takbirs precede the ordinary recitation of the Koran, and the hands must be raised at each takbir. Neither the seven nor the five takbirs mentioned are obligatory, nor any of them; and they have no object once the recitation has been begun, though Shafii in his first period admitted that they could if necessary be performed so long as the inclination had not begun. The chapters of the Koran which should be recited after the first chapter are, in the first raka chapter 50, and in the second chapter 54, both aloud and without any omission.

After the two rakas are finished the Sonna requires two sermons of the same component parts as the two Friday sermons. At the end of the fast the sermons contain an exhortation with regard to the special contribution prescribed on that occasion; while at the feast of victims the congregation should be exhorted to accomplish the sacrifice. The first sermon is preceded by nine takbirs and the second by seven, accomplished in either case one after the other without interruption.

At these two festivals it is commendable—

1. To take a bath at midnight, and according to one jurist at dawn.
2. To use scent, and dress in one's best clothes, as on Friday.

The ceremony should take place preferably in a mosque, or according to others, in a plain, provided there be no obstacle to either of these courses. In any case the imam should instruct his substitute to preside at the prayer in the mosque for those whose strength does not permit them to follow the rest of the community to the plain. The others make their way to the plain by one road and return by another. The congregation should assemble early, but the imam arrives only at the time the prayer begins. At the feast of victims the ceremony should be performed in haste.

[At the end of the fast some nourishment should be taken before the ceremony, but not at the feast of victims. In either case one should go to the ceremony on foot, in a state of composed meditation. Before going every one except the imam may say a supererogatory prayer.]

SECTION 2

It is commendable to entone the takbir, on the eve of the two festivals, at sunset, in the inns, on the roads, in the mosques, and in the bazaars, takbirs* which are continued until the imam begins the ceremony. On the eve of the feast of victims the Mecca pilgrims replace the takbirs by the cry of labaika. †The Sonna makes no mention of takbirs to be intoned immediately after evening prayer on the eve of the breaking of the fast. The Mecca pilgrims begin the takbirs from the midday prayer of the Yum-an-nahr or day of the feast of victims, and continue them until morning prayer on the last of the next three days called ayam-at-tashrik. *Those who are not on pilgrimage are subject to the same obligation as the pilgrims. One authority maintains that the takbirs of these believers should begin at evening prayer on the eve of the feast of victims, another thinks they should commence from morning prayer on the day of Mount Arafa. According to this view, which has prevailed in practice, the takbirs continue until the afternoon prayer of the last of the days called ayam-at-tashrik. *If when performing one of the special acts of devotion or some supererogatory prayer one is guilty of omitting some obligatory prayer one should say takbirs also on the days called ayam-at-tashrik. The most usual form of the takbir is the following :—" God is great, God is great, God is great. There is no god but God. God is great, God is great. Praise be to God." It is commendable to add : " God is great in his greatness. I offer Him numberless praises. Glory be to God morning and evening." If on the thirtieth day of the month of Ramadan, before the sun has begun to decline, it is legally ascertained that the new moon has been seen on the previous night, the fast should be at once broken, and the festival prayer accomplished. But if the proof be only attained after sunset the day just ended counts as a fast day ; while if this takes place after noon but before sunset one breaks the fast without celebrating the festival prayer, as the hour is past. *Under these latter circumstances the prayer can be accomplished at any moment according to some ; but one jurist has expressed an opinion that the next day must be considered the legal one, and that the prayer performed then at the prescribed hour, is not too late.

CHAPTER VI.—PRAYER ON THE OCCASION OF ECLIPSES

THIS prayer is prescribed by the Sonna. One begins by formulating a special intention to perform it, and then recites the first chapter of the Koran. One bends one's body, gets up, again recites the first chapter, stands still and at the end prostrates oneself. This constitutes one raka, after which another is performed in the same manner ; but never a third, even if the eclipse be not yet over when the second is finished.

†Should the eclipse terminate sooner than the prayer, one of the two inclinations may not for that reason be omitted. To accomplish it in the best and most approved manner possible one recites the two first chapters of the Koran at the first kiyam ; and at the second, besides the first chapter about 200 verses of the second ; at the third about 150, and at the fourth about 100. At the first inclination one repeats the formula “ Glory to God ” as long as would be necessary for the repetition of 100 verses of the second chapter of the Koran ; at the second inclination this formula is repeated for as long as it would take to repeat 80 verses ; similarly for the third a time of 70 verses ; and for the fourth 50. †The prostrations should not last too long. [††On the contrary they should be prolonged as much as possible according to what is stated in the two collections of traditions called Sahih by al-Bokhaii and Muslim, while al-Bawaiti quotes a decision of Shafii tending to show that the prostrations should last as long as the preceding inclinations.]

According to a precept of the Sonna prayer on the occasion of eclipse should only be accomplished in congregation. The imam repeats aloud in the case of a lunar, but not in that of a solar eclipse. Then he delivers two sermons as on Friday, and finally exhorts the congregation to repent and do good. A person joining the congregation at the imam's first inclination is considered to have been present at the whole raka,* but not one arriving at the second inclination or the second kiyam.

The legal time for prayer on the occasion of an eclipse of the sun is considered to have elapsed when it reappears in its full splendour, or sets still obscured. The legal time for prayer on the occasion of an eclipse of the moon is considered to be over at the end of the eclipse or at sunrise ; but according to the opinion adopted by Shafii in his second period, neither the appearance of the dawn, nor the setting of the moon while still obscured, have any effect upon the legal time.

If the time of a prayer on occasion of eclipse coincides with that of a public weekly prayer, or with any obligatory prayer, that obligatory prayer has the priority, at any rate if it is feared there may not be time for it unless begun at once. If there is time one should first perform the prayer on occasion of eclipse, then pronounce the Friday sermons with references in them to the eclipse, and lastly accomplish the weekly or daily obligatory prayer. If a festival or eclipse coincides with a burial prayer, the latter should be first accomplished.

CHAPTER VII.—PRAYER IN TIME OF DROUGHT

THIS prayer also has been introduced by the Sonna, and is said when there is great need of rain. It is repeated two or three times if the drought continues. When preparations have been made for it but the rain falls before the congregation assembles, they should still meet to render thanks to God and invoke Him, †† and then proceed to the prayer as if nothing had happened.

The imam should first command the faithful to fast for three days, to repent of their sins, and to seek the favour of God by being charitable and refraining from injustice. On the fourth day one goes to the plain, fasting, in ordinary clothes, with head bent in sign of humility. Children, old people † and domestic animals should accompany the community ; and even the presence of infidels cannot be forbidden at this ceremony provided that they are the subjects of a Musulman prince and do not mix with the believers.

The prayer consists of two rakas like that on the occasion of the two festivals, except that according to some authorities the 71st chapter of the Koran is recited in the second raka, † and that the ceremony need not take place at the time prescribed for the festivals. The sermons are the same as at the festivals, except that for the formula “ God is great ” are substituted the words “ I ask pardon of God.” In the first sermon is pronounced also the following invocation :—“ O God grant us an abundant rain, to moisten the soil, for our benefit and profit and the fertilisation of the earth, a rain that may spread everywhere upon all lands for a length of time. O God, grant us an abundant rain, and reduce us not to despair. O God, grant us Thy pardon, for Thou lovest to pardon. Cause the heavens to pour down an abundant rain.” The imam turns in the direction of the kibla after beginning the second sermon, and on its termination turns again to the congregation and utters the most pressing invocations, both in a low tone and aloud. When turning towards the kibla he turns back his cloak so that the right side is to the left and the left to the right ; and Shafii in his second period decided that it must be turned back again so as to place the upper part below and vice versâ, while the congregation imitates his movements. [The cloak is worn turned about in this way until one has got home and taken off one's things. If the imam will not perform the prayer, the congregation has the right to do so on its own account ; but there is no objection to the imam delivering the sermons after the prayer, instead of before as usual. The Sonna has also introduced the following usages :—

1. Exposing oneself to the first rain of the year, with no clothes on but what is required to cover the shameful parts, so that the rain may wet the body all over.

2. Taking a bath on that occasion, or performing ritual ablution in the water of some torrent.

3. Saying "glory to God" on hearing the thunder or seeing the lightning, but without continuing to look at it.

4. Exclaiming during the rain, "O God, may this rain be beneficial to us." Then one utters some invocation, and at the end of it says, "A favourable rain has been sent us by the goodness and mercy of God." It is blamable to substitute for this formula the words, "We have had rain through the influence of such and such star," or to conjure the wind in a similar way.

5. Asking God to abate too abundant rains, if they are causing damage. This supplication is made in the following words :—"O God, be Thou our help ; but be not against us," without accomplishing a regular prayer.]

CHAPTER VIII.—INTENTIONAL OMISSION OF PRESCRIBED PRAYERS

A SANE adult Moslem who refuses to pray and denies the obligation is an apostate and punishable as such ; even if he has merely neglected prayer through laziness, without denying its obligation, he is none the less punishable with death. ††Capital punishment is liable to be incurred by the omission of even one single prescribed prayer, the moment its time is passed, if done designedly and without offering any excuse. One should begin by exhorting the culprit to repentance, and if this be unavailing strike him upon the neck. Some authorities prefer that he should be pricked with a sharp instrument until he either prays or dies. After his death, however, his body is washed and wrapped in a winding sheet. Prayers are said for the repose of his soul, and he is buried among the faithful. Nor does the law insist upon removing all trace of the grave in which he is laid.

BOOK 4.—FUNERAL CEREMONIES

SECTION 1

ONE should think often upon death, and prepare oneself for it by repentance, and by refraining from injustice, especially if one is ill.

††A person about to die is laid upon the right side, with the body turned towards the kibla. If the bed is not large enough the dying person is laid on the back, the face and the soles of the feet turned towards the kibla. The confession of faith is said so that the sick person may hear it, but without inconveniencing him; the 36th chapter of the Koran is recited, and everything done to fix his attention upon his Lord. After death the eyelids are closed, and a bandage placed under the cheeks; the joints are rendered as supple as possible; the whole body is covered with a piece of light cloth; and some heavy object is placed on the stomach. Lastly the corpse is placed on a bier or something of the sort, and after the clothes have been taken off is turned towards the kibla as before death. This duty is incumbent upon the most suitable relative.

As soon as death is ascertained one hastens to wash the body. This ablution, the wrapping of the body in a shroud, the prayer for the repose of the soul of the deceased, and the burial, are obligations for which the survivors are collectively responsible. The washing of a corpse must always extend to all parts of the body. The person accomplishing it removes the impurity, †but he need not formulate the intention. The corpse of a person drowned, if the body has been completely wetted, need not be washed again. An infidel can, if necessary, perform the ablution. [According to Shafii's personal opinion the body of a drowned person should be washed.]

The best way of performing the ablution is as follows. The corpse is taken to some place isolated and concealed, where it is placed on a table. Ablution is then practised with cold water, while the corpse remains covered with a shirt upon the table, inclined backwards. The spine of the corpse is supported on the right hand, the thumb being in the hollow of the neck, and the back of the deceased resting on the right knee. The left hand is then pressed down hard upon the abdomen of the corpse, in order to expel the excreta. The body is laid upon the back ; and the shameful parts washed with the left hand, covered with a rag. The left hand is then covered with another rag, and the fingers introduced into the mouth of the deceased. The teeth are rubbed and the nostrils cleansed. After this one proceeds to ritual ablution as in the case of a living man ; and when it is terminated the head and beard are washed with a decoction of lotus leaves or some analogous plant, and the hair and beard are softly combed with a comb of which the teeth are not too close together. Any hairs that may come out should be put back again. Then one proceeds to the ablution of the front of the body, first the right side then the left. Then the corpse is laid upon the left side in order to wash the right side and the back, from the neck to the heels ; and on the right side in order to wash the left side and the back in the same way. Such is the first ablution of the body. It is commendable :—

1. To repeat the ablution once or twice, and to employ for the first ablution a decoction of lotus or marsh-mallow.

2. To pour clear water on the body, from above to below, after the liquid containing the lotus or marsh-mallow has flowed away.

3. To put a little camphor in the water used at each of the three ablutions.

If after the ablution some impurity still comes from the body, one should simply remove it ; though some authors consider that one should proceed to a fourth ablution, if the impurity comes from the shameful parts ; while others think a new ritual ablution to be obligatory in such a case.

A man's corpse is washed by a man, and a woman's by a woman ; though the master can wash the body of a woman who was his slave, and the husband that of his wife. Similarly the wife may wash the body of her husband ; but in all cases where the ablution is performed by a person of the other sex, the hands should be wrapped in rags so as not to touch the body. †When at the place of decease persons of the same sex as the deceased cannot be found, nor persons of the other sex allied by kinship or marriage, the ablution cannot take place, and recourse must be had to lustration with sand. The ablution of the corpse of a deceased person is obligatory for those who have to pray for the soul ; but in the case of a woman this duty is incumbent on the relatives, and firstly those within the prohibited degrees. †They even have priority over the husband. In default of relatives a woman not of the family may be called upon for this duty, and it is only in the last resource that recourse is had to the male relatives, in the order in which they are called to pray for the deceased. [With the exception of a cousin on the father's side and the other relatives with whom marriage is not forbidden, for they are considered for this purpose as not being of the family.] †A husband has priority over all other male relatives.

It is forbidden to perfume the corpse of a person deceased during Ithram, and to cut off a hair or a nail as a memento ; †but it is permissible to perfume the body of a woman deceased during a period of legal retirement, though the use of scent was legally forbidden her when alive. According to the opinions maintained by Shafii in Egypt, in the case of a person not deceased during Ithram one may lawfully cut the nails and the hair, even of the armpit, the pubis and the moustache. [*Such a proceeding is always blamable.]

SECTION 2

After the ablutions are finished the corpse should be wrapped in a shroud, which is subject to the same rules as the clothes which the dead person might wear during life, in such a manner as to cover at least the shameful parts. Any testamentary disposition tending to nullify this precept is without legal effect. It is preferable to wrap a man's corpse in three shrouds, though four or five may be used ; but as to women five shrouds are recommended by law. If using three shrouds, the corpse is simply enveloped three times ; but if five are employed, one begins by dressing the body in a shirt and turban and then wraps it round three times, in the case of a man ; while a woman is first dressed in a cloak, a veil and a shirt, and then enveloped twice. According to one jurist, however, the body of a woman should first be dressed in a mantle and veil, and then wrapped round thrice. The Sonna has prescribed that the shroud should be of white material ; and that the expense is a first charge upon the succession ; while, if the deceased person has left nothing the expense must be borne by those liable for the maintenance of the deceased, i.e. the relatives, the master †for the husband. One spreads first the finest and largest shroud, the second above it, and the simplest last, not forgetting to scatter aromatic spices upon each. One lays the body on the back upon these three shrouds, and places with it camphor and spices. The thighs are pressed close together, and each opening of the body stopped with cotton. The shrouds are then wrapped round and pressed tightly together. The bands on the thighs and other parts of the body are not detached until the corpse is just about to be lowered into the grave.

The body of a person deceased during Ithram is not wrapped in sewn shrouds ; neither is the head covered. In the case of a woman deceased during Ithram, the face only should remain uncovered.

†It is better to have the bier supported between the two poles than to have it carried by four persons. In the former case a man places the two front poles on his shoulders with his head in the middle, while two men bear the poles behind, one on the right and one on the left. If four persons are employed two bearers are placed in front of the bier and two behind. It is commendable that those who form part of the funeral procession should walk immediately in front of the bier, which should be carried rapidly to the cemetery, unless it is feared some lesion may thereby be caused to the body.

SECTION 3 (1)

Prayer for the repose of the dead consists of seven essential elements :

1. The intention, which is formulated like that in other prayers. It is enough to have the intention of performing one's duty to God ; though some authorities consider necessary an intention of accomplishing an obligation for which Moslems are collectively responsible. The intention need not refer to a particular deceased person ; but if one does so and afterwards discovers one has made a mistake, the prayer is void. If one is present at two or more simultaneous funerals, one may formulate an intention for all at once.

2. Four takbirs ; †though the prayer is not void if five are said. However, if the imam begins a fifth, †it is better that those present should cease to pray under his direction, and either pronounce at once the final salutation or wait quietly till they can do so with him.

3. The ordinary final salutation.

4. The recitation of the first chapter of the Koran, after the first takbir. [This chapter can be recited just as well after one of the three other takbirs.]

5. The prayer for the Prophet, which is performed after the second takbir. ††The prayer for the family of the Prophet is not obligatory.

6. A special invocation for the repose of the soul of the deceased, after the third takbir.

7. The Kiyam, at least according to our school, if it is possible.

The Sonna requires also that the hands should be raised when performing the takbir, and that the first chapter should be said in a low tone, though some consider that it should be recited aloud if the ceremony takes place at night. †It is commendable to pronounce the tawuz, without the introductory invocation.

At the third takbir one pronounces the formula :—" O God, this is Thy servant, and the child of parents who are Thy servants," etc. These words are preceded by the following :—" O God, pardon our living and our dead, absent and present, old and young, women and men. O God, cause him amongst us to whom Thou accordest life to live in the observance of religion, and to die in the faith him whom Thou wilt to die." To this last formula is added in the case of a little child :—" O God, may this child be the forerunner of his parents in Paradise, may his loss be reckoned to them as a sacrifice to Thee, may it be to them a warning and an example, and may this child be their intercessor with Thee. May the weight of this loss be placed in the heavenly balance to their profit at the day of judgment, and patience be poured upon their hearts." And lastly at the fourth takbir one says these words :—" O God, deny us not the recompense due to him ; lead us not into temptation after his death ; and pardon both us and him.

The prayer is void if, without valid excuse, one has lagged so much behind the imam as to be still engaged upon one takbir when the imam has already got to the next. A person who arrives after the ceremony has begun should pronounce a takbir, and then say the first chapter of the Koran, even though the imam may have finished it ; but if the imam has already got to the next takbir before such person has begun the recitation he should omit it, and join the imam in saying the takbir. †If the imam is finishing the next takbir while one is still reciting the first chapter, one should stop doing so and follow the imam for the remainder of the prayer. If the imam has reached the final salutation when one arrives, one should accomplish all the takbirs and glorifications of God, though according to one jurist the latter are not rigorously necessary under the circumstances.

The conditions essential for the validity of a prayer for the repose of the dead are the same as in the case of ordinary prayer, except that it need not be accomplished in public, the prayer of one man being sufficient. According to some authors, however, there must be at least two persons to accomplish this prayer ; others say three, others four. †A funeral prayer may validly be performed by women, if there are no men in the place. Funeral prayer is said for one who dies far from his own people. It should take place before burial, but it can be repeated afterwards, †especially if at the moment of death one is among those responsible for its due execution.

Funeral prayers should never be performed on the tomb of the Prophet.

SECTION 3 (2)

Shafii, in his second period, adopted the doctrine that the wali of the deceased is more competent to be imam in the prayer for the repose of his soul than the chief of the state or of the town. In this connection is understood by wali any male relative of the deceased, whether entitled to succession or not, i.e. (1) father, (2) grandfather or other agnate ancestor, (3) son, (4) grandson, (5) brother—*whole brother having priority over half-brother on the father's side ; (b) son of whole brother, (7) son of half-brother on father's side, (8) other agnates in order of succession, (9) cognates. If two persons are equally related to the deceased, priority should, according to the personal opinion of Shafii, be accorded to the elder, if of irreproachable character. But a free man always has priority over a slave, even though the latter may be more nearly related to the deceased.

The person presiding as imam at a burial service should place himself near the head of the corpse if a man, but in the case of a woman he should place himself behind the body. A single service will suffice for several deceased persons at once. It is forbidden to pray for the rest of the soul of an infidel ; it is not necessary even to wash his corpse, though the body of an infidel subject of a Moslem prince should be wrapped in a shroud and buried. In the case of a Musulman known to be dead, prayer for the repose of his soul is obligatory, even if only a part of the body has been found. An abortion that has uttered a cry or wept at birth is buried like an ordinary person. *If, uttering no cry, it has given some sign of life, as palpitation of the heart or movement of a limb, prayer is obligatory ; but if there are no such signs it is unnecessary, even if four months be passed.

It is unnecessary to wash the body of a martyr, or to pray for the repose of his soul. By martyr is understood any one who dies in war against the infidels. *Thus a soldier who dies after the end of the war, or fighting against rebels, or, according to our school, in consequence of an accident, is not considered as a martyr. †A martyr dying in a state of grave impurity need not be washed. The impurity should be removed, but not the blood from his wounds. His blood-stained garments are the shroud of the martyr. If these are an insufficient covering, they should be supplemented with a shroud of some kind.

The grave should always be deep enough to retain the odour of the body and protect it from wild beasts. It is commendable that it should be so deep and wide that the deceased could stand up in it and lie down in it with his whole length. It is better, if the earth is hard enough, that the grave should be hollowed out laterally rather than a simple trench. The corpse is introduced head first, drawn softly by that part of the body, preferably by men, i.e. in the first instance by those who have the precedence in the burial service. [In the case of a married woman, the husband has the better right to carry out the deposition, though not to lead in the prayer.] The people who place the corpse in the grave should be of uneven number. The corpse should be laid on the right side, facing the kibla and leaning against the wall, with the back supported by a brick or something similar. The entrance of the grave should also be walled with bricks. Those present then throw in three handfuls of sand, and the grave is filled up by means of the shovel. The earth forming the tomb may rise above the level of the ground to the height of a span; ††and it is better that the surface should be plane rather than convex. Two persons are not buried in the same grave except in case of necessity, when the one having most merit must be placed on the side of the kibla. Sitting or walking on a tomb is forbidden, and any one wishing to visit it should approach in the same manner as to the living person.

The Sonna has introduced the practice of making visits of condolence before the burial and three days after. A Musulman performs this duty to a fellow-believer by saying :—" God grant you large compensation for the loss you have suffered ; may He pour resignation upon your heart ; may He pardon the sins of the dead." If it be an infidel whom the Musulman is consoling, he says :—" God grant you large compensation for the loss you have suffered ; may He give you the necessary patience " ; while an infidel says to a Musulman :—" God pardon the sins of the dead, and pour resignation upon your heart." It is permissible to deplore the loss of any one before and after death ; but it is forbidden to compose for this purpose an elegy or a funeral oration containing nothing but an enumeration of the good qualities of the deceased. It is also forbidden to utter lamentable cries, or to manifest extravagant signs of sorrow, as e.g. by striking the breast.

[Some special rules are here added :—

1. One should make haste to pay the deceased's debts and execute his testamentary depositions.

2. It is blamable to wish for death in order to avoid some misfortune, but not to avoid something incompatible with religion.

3. The Sonna recommends a sick person to take care of himself and to take medicine ; but it is blamable to force any one to do so.

4. Parents and friends of the deceased may kiss his face.

5. There is no objection to making an announcement of the death, in order to call people to the burial service, etc., provided this be not done in the manner practised in the time of paganism.

6. The person performing the funeral ablution should see no more of the body than is strictly necessary for the proper performing of his duty, and should never look at the shameful parts. Ablution with sand is enough, if circumstances prevent washing the body with water.

7. A person who has incurred a grave impurity, and even a woman during menstruation, can attend to the washing of a corpse ; and such persons themselves require after death no greater ablution than any one else.

8. The person entrusted with the ablution of a dead body should be a reliable person. Should he perceive that the deceased had some good quality of body he may mention the fact ; but he must not mention any bodily defects, unless for some useful purpose.

9. If two brothers, or two wives, both claim precedence at a funeral, the matter must be decided by lot.

10. An infidel is more competent than a Musulman to preside at the funeral of an infidel relative.

11. It is blamable to use a shroud dyed with red earthamine, or one of an exorbitant price. A piece of material that has been washed is better for this purpose than one which is quite new. A minor is subject to the same rules as an adult, so far as regards the shrouds and cloths to be used at the interment.

12. It is meritorious to use spices for the embalming of the dead ; some authorities even regard it as obligatory.

13. A bier should be borne by men only ; even if the body be that of a woman.

14. It is forbidden to carry the bier carelessly ; or so as to cause apprehension lest the body fall to the ground.

15. It is recommended to carry the body of a woman so as to be concealed from the public gaze, e.g. in a coffin.

16. One may not ride, except when returning from the burial.

17. There is no objection to a Musulman attending the funeral of an infidel relative.

18. It is blamable to make a noise, or to light fires, during a funeral.

19. If the dead bodies of Moslems are so mixed with those of infidels that it is impossible to distinguish them all must be washed and prayed for. In this case one may either : (a) perform a burial for all at once declaring one's intention of applying it only to the repose of the souls of those who were Moslems ; this is considered the better course and was recommended by Shafi himself ; or (b) pray for each body separately, on the understanding that the prayer is valid only in the case of a Musulman ; in this case the formula used is " O God, pardon him, if he was a Musulman."

20. It is requisite for the efficacy of a funeral prayer that the corpse should first be washed ; and it is even blamable to pray before the corpse has been wrapped in a shroud. Consequently no prayer is said for the repose of the soul of a person crushed to death by the fall of a house, whose body cannot be recovered from under the débris.

21. When performing a burial service it is not lawful to stand in front of the bier or of the grave. These two precepts are admitted by our school. The prayer may, however, be said in a mosque. The Sonna insists upon those present being placed in at least three lines.

22. Every person attending a burial service, who has not already prayed for the repose of the soul of the deceased should join the others in doing so ; but he need not repeat it if he has already done it.

23. A burial service may not be deferred in order to allow more people to attend.

24. The body of the suicide is washed, and prayer said for the repose of his soul, just as in other cases.

25. When the imam has the intention of accomplishing a prayer for the repose of the soul of a deceased person who is absent, and a person praying under his direction has the intention of praying for the repose of the soul of another whose body is present, or vice versâ, the prayer of the latter is valid all the same.

26. It is recommended that corpses be interred in some recognised cemetery. It is blamable to pass the night there.

27. It is also commendable to cover the grave with a piece of cloth of some sort during an interment, even in the case of a man, and to say during the deposition :—" In the name of God, and in accordance with the precepts of the religion of His apostle. God grant him His grace and His blessing."

28. A dead body may not be laid on a carpet ; nor may the head be placed on a pillow.

29. It is blamable to place a corpse in a coffin, unless the earth be damp or soft.

30. It is permissible to proceed to a burial at night, and even at an hour in the daytime when it is blamable to pray, provided it be not intentionally chosen, for any other time is better.

31. It is considered blamable to plaster a tomb, to adorn it with a monument, or place inscriptions upon it. Monuments erected in a public cemetery should be demolished.

32. It is recommended :—(a) to water the grave, (b) to place pebbles as a pavement, (c) to mark the position of the head with a stone or a piece of wood, (d) to have the graves of relatives together in one spot (e) to visit graves. Visiting graves, however, is commendable in men only ; in women it is blamable, some authorities even forbidding it altogether in their case. Others allow women this visit as a right but not as a merit.

33. A person visiting a tomb should pronounce a salutation, recite some portion of the Koran, and invoke the grace of God upon the deceased.

34. It is forbidden to carry a corpse to another town—though some authorities consider it merely blamable—unless the death occurred in the neighbourhood of Mecca or Medina—or, according to a decision of Shafii, Jerusalem—for then it may always be carried into one of these holy cities. All, however, agree that it is forbidden to disinter a body, whether in order to carry it elsewhere or for any other reason, except in case of necessity, e.g. if the body has been buried without being washed, or if buried in a misappropriated shroud or piece of ground, or if a valuable object has accidentally fallen into the grave, or if the face of the deceased was not turned towards the kibla, etc. †On the other hand, a corpse may not be legally disinterred under the pretext of wrapping it again in a shroud.

35. The Sonna prescribes to those taking part in funerals not to hasten away from the grave as soon as the body is buried, but to wish the deceased person a happy abode.

36. The neighbours should prepare food for the family of the deceased for the first day and night after the interment; one should even persuade the survivors to take something. But it is forbidden to prepare a meal for the hired mourners.

BOOK 5.—ALMS CONTRIBUTION, OR CHARITY TAX

CHAPTER I.—ASSESSMENT ON CATTLE

SECTION 1

ALMS is not obligatory except on cattle properly so called, i.e. camels, horned cattle and small cattle; it is not exacted upon horses, slaves or the offspring of small cattle and gazelles. It is not leviable upon camels unless there are at least five. On this number one shah is due, on ten camels two shahs; on fifteen three shahs; on twenty four shahs; on twenty-five one she-camel called bent-makhad; on thirty-six one she-camel called bent-labun; on forty-six one she-camel called hikka; on sixty-one one she-camel called jaza; on seventy-six two bent-labuns; on ninety-one two hikkas; on one hundred and twenty-one three bent-labuns; and after this on each forty head one bent-labun, and on each fifty one hikka.

By bent-makhad is understood a yearling she-camel; by bent-labun a two-year-old she camel; by hikka a three-year-old she-camel; and by jaza a four-year-old she-camel. By shah is understood a young animal; either a yearling lamb (others say six months), or a two-year-old kid (others say one year). †Where a shah is due the taxpayer may give a lamb or a kid at his choice, whether the small cattle of the country consists principally of sheep or goats. †Either a male or a female shah may be given, and when paying assessment on less than twenty-five camels one may give a camel instead of a shah. Instead of a bent-makhad one may give a bent-labun as the latter is the more valuable. If the only camels one possesses have redhibitory defects, it is as if one had none. And on the other hand the taxpayer is never obliged to give a very valuable animal. †An ibn-labun, i.e. a male two-year-old camel may not be given instead of a bent-labun or of any she-camel; but a hikk or three-year-old male camel may be substituted for a bent-makhad or yearling she-camel, †though not for a bent-labun.

If the number of camels in a drove be a multiple of both forty and fifty, e.g. two hundred, the taxpayer is not, according to our school, obliged to give always four hikkas; he may give either four hikkas or five bent-labuns. Thus the owner of a drove containing only hikkas or only bent-labuns may give four of the former or five of the latter ; while the owner of a drove containing neither may buy, as he prefers, four hikkas or five bent-labuns. According to some jurists, however, such owner should give those that would be most advantageous for the poor ; ††and in any case an owner possessing both is not considered to have paid the assessment if he has given an inferior lot, either by deceiving the inspector, or because the latter has failed in his duty. Otherwise, if the owner has acted honestly and the inspector done his duty, there is no ground for complaint, once the animals have been accepted ; †but the difference between the value of the animals given and what was due must be made up, either in money or, according to some authorities only, in kind. The taxpayer who is liable for a bent-makhad, but has none, though he has a bent-labun, may give this latter and take back two shahs or twenty drahms ; if he is liable for a bent-labun, and does not possess one, he may either give a bent-makhad and also two shahs or twenty drahms, or give a hikka and take back two shahs or twenty drahms. The right of choosing between shahs and drahms belongs to the payer. The taxpayer may always in these circumstances decide whether to give a hikka and take back its excess value over the bent-labun he was owing, or to give a bent-makhad plus the difference between its value and that of a bent-labun. Only he must not give an animal having redhibitory defects. The taxpayer has even the right :—

1. To give she-camels two degrees more valuable than what is required, e.g. a hikka instead of a bent-makhad, and to take back the double excess, i.e. four shahs or forty drahms ; or

2. To give she-camels two degrees less valuable than what is required, e.g. a bent-makhad instead of a hikka, plus the double deficit, i.e. four shahs or forty drahms ; †both on condition that bent-labuns cannot be procured.

According to the best opinion there is no excess if a thaniya or five-year-old she-camel is given instead of a jazaa or four-year-old she-camel. [†On the contrary, nearly all authorities admit that there is an excess in such a case.]

One cannot supply the deficit nor take back the excess of one degree of value, by giving or taking one shah and ten drahms instead of two shahs or twenty drahms ; but if it is a difference of two degrees one may give or take either four shahs or forty drahms or two shahs and twenty drahms.

As to horned cattle the levy is void on less than thirty head. Of thirty one tabia or yearling calf is taken. If there be more than thirty head in the herd a tabia is taken for each thirty, and a mosinna or two-year-old calf for each forty. Nothing is taken from small cattle in less number than forty. On forty, one shah is levied ; on one hundred and twenty-one, two shahs ; on two hundred and one, three shahs ; on four hundred, four shahs ; and on each additional hundred, one shah.

SECTION 2

Where a flock or herd consists of animals of the same kind the ordinary levy is made with this modification that, taking due count of their respective values, a kid may be exchanged for a lamb, and vice versâ, as they are both included in the word shah. But if the animals are of different kinds, e.g. sheep and goats, the assessment is made, according to one jurist, on the more numerous kind ; or, if the two kinds are in equal number, on that which is the more advantageous for the poor. *According, however, to the majority of authorities, the taxpayer may in these circumstances give whichever kind he prefers, taking due count of their respective value and number. If, for instance, there are thirty goats and ten sheep, the assessment, according to this theory, is one goat or one sheep, provided the value of the animal given is equal to three-quarters of the average value of a goat, plus quarter of the average value of a sheep. A sick animal, or one with redhibitory defects is not sufficient, unless there are none but animals of this sort. Neither is a male animal accepted except in the two following cases :—

1. If, as we have already mentioned in the preceding section, the law insists upon its acceptance.

2. †If there are none but males.

If there are none but little ones, one must be contented with such, according to the opinion maintained by Shafi'i in his second period. One may not take for the assessment a ewe that has just lambed, nor an animal that is being fattened, nor one in calf, nor one of exceptional value, without the owner's consent.

Cattle belonging to two joint owners is taxed as if it belonged to a single individual. This is also the case where two neighbours have mingled their flocks or herds ; provided there is no separation between the animals of the two owners, either at the watering-place, the meadow, the stable, or the place where they are milked ; ‡and provided there is only one herdsman, and one male animal for breeding purposes. †It does not matter whether the flocks or herds were mingled intentionally or accidentally. *In the case of fruit, grain, precious metals and merchandise, it is taken as indicating that the owners have mixed their respective quantities, if they have jointly the same overseer, threshing-floor, shop, caretaker, store, etc.

There are two other essential conditions for the tax on cattle being due—

1. That the property has been in one's possession for a whole year. This rule admits of one exception. In the case of a flock or herd of which the original number already reached the nisab or taxable minimum, the new-born animals become taxable in the year of their birth; but animals added by purchase, etc., become so only in the year following. The declaration of births made by the owner at the end of the year is presumed to be correct, and it is only in case of grave suspicion that he may be required to confirm his declaration on oath. If during the year one loses possession of some head of cattle and replaces them later in the year, or if an exchange of cattle of the same kind takes place between two owners, the yearly period for the purpose of taxation begins only from the date of acquisition.

2. That the cattle have been turned out to graze; for there is no ground for the tax if the animals have passed most of the year in the stable. †Even cattle fed in the stable for half the year or less are taxable only if the owner turned them out to graze also during this period, and if the fodder given in the stable was comparatively in such small quantity that the animals could have gone without it and been hardly the worse.

In default of these two conditions the tax cannot be levied. †Cattle is also not considered taxable if: (a) it is turned out to graze separately; or (b) it is, though grazing, fed with hay, etc.; or (c) it is used to plough or irrigate the land.

If the animals are accustomed to go down together to the watering-place, the assessment takes place while they are all there; otherwise in the stables or enclosures of the respective owners. An owner whose moral character inspires confidence is believed on his word when he declares the number of his taxable animals; otherwise this presumption does not exist, and the animals must be counted, after having them driven into some narrow space.

CHAPTER II.—ASSESSMENT ON PRODUCE

THIS tax is limited to plants fit for food, such as, among fruit, dates, and grapes, and among grains and vegetables, wheat, barley, rice, lentils and other such commonly eaten products. According to Shafii's earlier opinion it is levied also on olives, saffron, wars, carthamine, and honey.

The nisab or taxable minimum of produce is five wask, which is equal to sixteen hundred ratal of Baghdad, or, according to the measure of Damascus, to three hundred and forty-six ratal and two-thirds. [†This last amount is three hundred and forty-two ratal and six-sevenths, †as the ratal of Baghdad is one hundred and twenty-eight drahms and four-sevenths. Some authorities reject the four-sevenths, and according to others one hundred and thirty drahms is the proper estimate.]

When dates or raisins are intended to be dried, the weight is not estimated until after they have been so dried; otherwise the weight of dates or grapes is ascertained immediately after the plucking. Grain and vegetables are weighed without chaff, etc., while the minimum taxable of those that remain enveloped, such as rice and alas, is ten wask instead of five. In determining the quantity of produce taxable those of different nature may not be combined, but those of different species may. The taxpayer is in this case assessed on the total, taking count of the respective quantities of each kind. If this is impossible one takes the mean. Thus the alas may be combined with ordinary wheat, of which it is a species, and the assessment made on the total; but the solt is a distinct plant, though some jurists maintain it to be a species of barley and others a species of wheat. The fruit and other taxable produce of a particular year may not be combined with that of the year following, but those of the same year must always be totalled, even if the harvest be in different seasons. However, according to some jurists the totalling of the fruit of a whole year is not necessary where some only begin to grow after the gathering of others; but even these authorities agree that the rest of the produce of a single year must in all cases be combined. *By fruits of the same year is understood all produce gathered in that year, irrespective of the time it was sown or begun to grow.

In the case of land irrigated only by rain—or in no need of artificial irrigation, the roots of trees and plants obtaining moisture by the proximity of water—the assessment on produce is one-tenth of the crop; but fields irrigated by means of tanks or water-wheels, or with water that has been paid for, are assessed at only half this rate. ††Water brought in conduits is regarded legally as rain-water. Where the irrigation is half natural and half artificial the assessment is three-fourths of the tenth. Where one kind predominates, it should be regarded, according to one jurist, as being the sole kind; *others, however, think an inquiry should be made as to which has contributed the more to the growth of the trees and plants; while others are of opinion that the number of times irrigation of each kind has taken place should be considered.

The tax is due on the appearance of signs of maturity in the case of fruit, and in the case of other produce at the moment the grain begins to harden. It is then that the Soma has introduced the practice of making a valuation of the fruits and determining the amount due by the owner. This valuation should include all the trees and can be made by a single expert, who should be a †free man of irreproachable conduct.

*After the valuation, the portion of the poor is separated from that of the owner, who should hand over the former as soon as the drying is finished. According to our school this obligation should be explicitly notified to the proprietor, who should declare his assent to it; though some authors consider that the separation of the two parts is legally accomplished by the mere fact of valuation. In any case the owner is responsible only for the amount of his assessment and not for the delivery of particular fruit, and so may still sell the total yield of his garden. An owner who alleges that fruit has been lost to him after valuation, either in some obscure way as by theft, or in some visible accidental manner of public notoriety is presumed to be correct if he takes an oath to that effect. If, on the other hand, he alleges as the cause of the loss something which, though visible in its nature, is not of public notoriety, †he must first of all establish its existence in general, and only when this has been done can his oath be accepted to the effect that the calamity in question has injured his garden in particular. Should the owner complain of injustice on the part of the expert, or that the latter has combined produce of dissimilar kinds, his assertion cannot be accepted, ‡except in the case of some kinds of produce which, though different, can easily be confused.

CHAPTER III.—ASSESSMENT ON GOLD AND SILVER

THE nisab or taxable minimum of silver is two hundred drahms, and that of gold twenty mithkal, of the standard weight in use in Mecca. One-fortieth is levied on each of these precious metals; but debased gold and silver are not taxable, unless the quantity of pure metal amounts to the nisab. Where a vessel or other object is composed of gold and silver in two unequal parts, the proportion of the two parts themselves being known, but it not being known which is gold and which is silver, the vessel is assessed as if it were composed of a quantity of gold equal to the larger part and also of a quantity of silver equal to that larger part, unless the owner prefers to have the metals separated.

The tax is levied on illicit ornaments and other objects of gold and silver, *but not on such as may legally be used. Among illicit objects are reckoned gold and silver vessels, and also chains and bracelets if belonging to a man who has obtained them in order to wear them.

†But if a man buys a bracelet or other ornament, without intending to wear it, or in order to lend it to a woman who can lawfully wear it, he is not liable to pay tax on it. The same is the case with a man who has bought a broken ornament to mend and sell. A man may not lawfully wear gold, except at the nose or the end of a finger, if these have been mutilated. Gold may also be applied to the teeth to prevent their becoming loose. But if a man has lost a finger he may not replace it by one in gold; neither may he wear a ring in which the jewel is attached by means of small gold hooks. As to silver the law permits a man to wear it in the form of a ring, and to adorn with it his weapons and accoutrements, such as a sword, lance, or belt; †but he may not ornament with silver what he does not himself carry, his saddle or bridle. This of course does not apply to women, who may lawfully wear all sorts of ornaments both in gold and silver, †as well as stuffs embroidered with threads of the precious metals. †Only they should abstain from adorning themselves with gold or silver in an excessive and prodigal manner, wearing for instance a chain of the weight of two hundred dīnar, a restriction which is applicable also to the ornamentation of weapons and accoutrements. †A man may possess a Koran adorned with silver, a woman one ornamented with gold.

Lastly, it is an essential condition for the tax on the precious metals becoming due that the owner should have had possession of them for a whole year.

Pearls and precious stones are not taxable.

CHAPTER IV.—ASSESSMENT ON MINES, TREASURE AND MERCHANDISE

SECTION 1

ON gold or silver extracted from a mine one-fortieth is due. One jurist says a fifth; another a fortieth if there is difficulty in the extraction, otherwise a fifth. Our school admits only the imposition of the nisab or minimum mentioned in the last chapter for each of the two precious metals, without possession for a whole year being necessary.

The quantities extracted are added together in order to determine the total amount to be assessed, if the exploitation has been uninterrupted; but it is not necessary that it should have been continually remunerative, this at least is the opinion adopted by Shafii in his second period. A forcible interruption is considered as no interruption, and so the quantities extracted may still be combined; but this is not permissible in the case of a voluntary interruption. In other words one cannot add what the mine has already produced to what is extracted subsequently, except to determine if the latter has reached the taxable minimum. This principle applies to all taxable precious metals, whether they come from a mine or not.

On discovered treasure a fifth should be paid by way of assessment, according to our school, provided the amount is not less than the taxable minimum, and that it consists of coin. A whole year's possession is not necessary. By treasure is understood a hoard buried in the time of Paganism. A discovered hoard, dating from a period when Islam had already been introduced into the locality, belongs to the owner who buried it. If the owner is unknown, it becomes simply lost property, and the finder must then conform to the rules which will be given when treating of that subject. The hoard is considered to be lost property when it is not known if it was buried before or after the conversion of the country to Islam. One becomes owner of the treasure and owes assessment on it only if it was discovered on an uncultivated portion of the public domain, or when clearing an uncultivated portion of one's own property. A hoard discovered in a mosque or on the public road is regarded simply as lost property, whatever may be its date, at least according to our school. Treasure discovered on the property of another belongs to the actual proprietor if he claims it, otherwise to the previous holder and so on and ultimately to the original owner. In case of dispute between seller and purchaser, landlord and tenant, or borrower and lender, the presumption is in favour of the actual occupier provided he confirms the truth of his assertion on oath.

Assessment on merchandise depends on two conditions—possession for a whole year, and attainment of the nisab or minimum taxable value. This latter is the same as for the precious metals, and should be the value obtaining *at the end of the year, or according to the opinion of one jurist both at the beginning and end of the year—or as another thinks, throughout the whole year. †If goods are sold in the course of the year for an amount less than the nisab, and other goods bought with the money, possession dates from the purchase. ‡If at the end of the year the value of goods is under the nisab, one owes nothing for that year, and begins to reckon another. Objects acquired in order to profit by their exchange are regarded as merchandise, whether obtained by purchase for as dower or as compensation for divorce, but not when obtained by gift, nor when consisting only of firewood gathered in the forest, nor when taken back after sale in consequence of redhibitory defects.

When goods are bought for a sum of money which is itself taxable, the year's possession is reckoned from the date of obtaining the money ; but if the amount is under the nisab, or if goods are acquired by exchange for other goods already in one's possession, the year begins only from the date of purchase. Some authorities, however, admit an exception to this rule when taxable cattle are given in exchange for goods, in which case duration of ownership of the cattle is added to duration of ownership of the goods. Profit obtained in the course of the year by sale or exchange is added to capital if this profit consists of goods and not coin ; *otherwise it is not included in the total taxable. †All increase of merchandise, whether by animals in which one trades giving birth to young, or by trees bearing fruit, is regarded as taxable merchandise, the possession of which dates from that of the original merchandise.

The assessment on merchandise is one-fortieth of the value. When goods are bought for money the price constitutes the real value, whether less than the nisab or not ; but where goods are exchanged they must be valued in the money of the place. In this last case, if there are two kinds of money of equal currency, the following distinctions must be drawn :—

1. If the value reaches the nisab only when expressed in one of the two kinds, it should be expressed in that kind.

2. If the value reaches the nisab when reckoned in either kind, then it should be reckoned in that which is most advantageous for the poor. According to some authorities the taxpayer has the choice.

The value of goods sold is estimated according to the price stipulated ; that of exchanged goods is valued in the money current in the place.

Slaves owned for purpose of trade in them are liable both to the tax at the end of the fasting month and also to the ordinary tax on merchandise. In the cattle trade the owner of a herd which reaches the nisab either under Chapter I. or as merchandise, owes the assessment under that heading ; if the nisab is reached in both, then only the tax on cattle is paid. Shafii so decided during his Egyptian period. If at the beginning of a certain year one has become possessed of goods exchanged six months afterwards for a herd of cattle, it is the assessment on merchandise which is payable at the end of the year in question, after which the tax on cattle is payable in due course. This opinion also was adopted by Shafii in his second period.

In a joint stock company a sleeping partner is personally responsible for the tax both on the joint capital and on the profits ; at least where it is agreed that the acting partner does not become legally entitled to his share in the profits by the mere fact of drawing up the balance sheet, but only on distribution. †This, however, does not prevent the entire assessment being always based on the total profit, and not on the capital. If, on the other hand, it is agreed that the managing partner becomes legally entitled to his share of the profits by the mere fact of having drawn up the balance sheet, a sleeping partner is responsible only for the assessment on the joint capital and on his part of the profit ; while it is the managing partner who, according to our school, is responsible for his own share.

CHAPTER V.—PAYMENT AT THE END OF THE FASTING MONTH

THIS tax is due from the night preceding the festival at the end of the fasting month. Those who die after sunset are still liable for it, but not those who are born after that moment. The Sonna does not allow payment to be deferred until after prayer on the festival, and the law absolutely forbids its postponement until the next day after the feast.

An infidel is not subject to this tax at the end of the fasting month, †unless on account of his slave or Moslem relative. A slave is not liable on his own account, but authorities are not agreed upon the case of one undergoing gradual enfranchisement. The partially enfranchised slave owes the tax in proportion to his liberty. The payment is not obligatory for insolvent persons, those i.e. who have no more food than is necessary for their subsistence and that of people dependent on them for the day and night of the feast. And, besides, the believer should only pay this contribution after he has supplied the necessary needs of his household.

Any one who owes this payment for the breaking of the fast for himself, owes it also for those dependent on him, though a Moslem owes nothing for an infidel slave, relative, or wife. A slave owes nothing for his wife; nor a son for his father's wife ; though as regards the son this rule is the subject of controversy. *If a husband is insolvent, or a slave, his wife is liable for this payment on her own account, unless she is herself a slave ; †and the master of a female slave owes it for her, if she is married to some one who is free, but poor. [†A free woman married to a slave does not owe this payment on her own account ; such is Shafii's personal opinion.]

When a slave is absent, and his whereabouts is unknown the master still owes the tax for him, according to our school. Some authorities consider it as due only on the return of the slave ; one maintains that under these circumstances the master owes nothing.

†If a person possesses no more than a saa of food, he should give what he has in payment for himself. If he has more than a saa, he should pay first for himself and then in order for his wife, infant child, father, mother, grown-up child. Now the assessment on food stuffs is one saa for each taxable individual, i.e. six hundred and ninety-three drahms and a third. [†According to the method of calculation adopted in the chapter relating to the assessment on produce, the saa is equal to six hundred and eighty-five drahms and five-sevenths.]

The food that is given in alms at the breaking of the fast should be such as is liable to ordinary assessment, *though cheese may also be given. It must be food commonly consumed in the place. Only a few authors maintain it to be enough to give what one has and consumes oneself; and a few others think one may give what one likes. It is permissible to give better food than one has oneself, but not an inferior kind. According to one doctrine quality is determined by price; †but according to the generally received opinion the more substantial food should be looked upon as of superior quality. Thus corn is better than dates or rice, †while dates are inferior to barley but better than raisins. One may give on one's own account a saa of some kind of food and for one's relative a saa of some superior kind, but the tax is not properly paid by giving for each person a saa of different kinds of food. When the people of the place eat various kinds of food so that it is impossible to say which is the most common, the taxpayer may give whatever he thinks best, though the very best kind is to be preferred. †As to the payment due for an absent slave, this must be made in the food of the place where the slave is.

[Grain and vegetables given as payment of the tax at the breaking of the fast must be free from redhibitory defects. A father may legally pay this tax for his infant child from the latter's estate, and similarly for his grown-up son with the latter's consent. One may do it for any one with his consent. When a slave belongs in common to two persons of whom one is solvent and the other insolvent, the solvent owner owes half a saa; †if both are solvent but their contributions are of different kinds, each gives half a saa of food, without regard to the particular kind given by the other.]

CHAPTER VI.—PERSONS AND OBJECTS LIABLE TO ASSESSMENT

SECTION 1

THE tax is due only from a free Moslem proprietor. It is, however, due from an apostate, if he does not legally forfeit his property by the mere fact of apostacy. But it is not due from a slave undergoing gradual enfranchisement. It is levied from—

1. The property of a minor, a lunatic, †and a slave partially enfranchised ; provided in the latter case that what belongs to him as a free man is not below the nisab or taxable minimum.

2. Property usurped by another, strayed camels, and goods deposited with a person who denies the deposit—all these only on recovery.

3. Property purchased, even before possession has been taken ; though according to others the tax on such property is the subject of controversy, as also in the case of the second category.

4. Property in another town. The assessment on this is due immediately, if there is full power to dispose of it ; otherwise it is treated as in 2.

5. Debts due to one. A debt relating to a certain quantity of cattle, and a debt which cannot be exacted, such as that due to a master from a slave undergoing gradual enfranchisement, are not subject to assessment. In his first period Shafii extended this principle to all debts due to a person, whether relating to goods or money ; but during his Egyptian period he drew a distinction in this respect between a debt which can be immediately exacted and one which is due only at a fixed date. The tax on the former is due at once, except when the debt cannot be recovered owing to the insolvency of the debtor, etc. ; otherwise it is regarded as coming under the second category ; though some authors think the assessment is due even before the debtor has satisfied his obligation. *The fact of being a debtor does not prevent one's being due for the tax on one's property ; though according to one opinion assessment cannot be insisted on in the case of so-called "hidden" property owed to others, i.e. precious metals and merchandise. *An exception, however, must be made in the case where a person's debts are so considerable that the judge has been obliged to declare him bankrupt, and that he has remained in a state of legal incapacity for a whole year, in which case his property is regarded as coming under the second category, as he has not had the free disposition of it. As to claims on the estate of a deceased person, the tax has preference over a debt to a private individual ; though according to one authority the debt has preference, and according to another they are claims of equal importance.

6. Booty obtained in war against the infidel, even before distribution ; provided it consist of one and the same kind of taxable property, that those having a claim to it prefer that it should remain in common, and that a whole year has elapsed since this decision. The entire booty is then subject to assessment, whether the share of each of the owners amounts to the nisab, or whether the total alone does so ; and the tax is paid in the place where the booty was constituted common property.

But if those having a claim to the booty have expressed no wish to keep it in common, it is assessable only after distribution.

7. Marriage dower, i.e. when a woman has stipulated, as dower, a definite quantity of a specified taxable kind of cattle, she owes the assessment on it at the end of a year.

*A person who has leased a house to another for four years, at a rate of eighty dinars paid in advance, owes assessment only during the tenant's occupation, i.e. at the end of the first year he must pay assessment on twenty dinars, at the end of the second on twenty for one year and on twenty for two years, at the end of the third on forty for one year and on twenty for three years, at the end of the fourth on sixty for one year and on twenty for four years. According to another opinion assessment on eighty dinars, and nothing more, is due at the end of the first year.

THE tax may be exacted as soon as it is due, i.e. as soon as the existence of the taxable property and the categories of persons having claim to it have been ascertained. Such as consists of so-called "hidden" property, i.e. precious metals and merchandise may be given personally to those entitled to it; and, according to the opinion maintained by Shafii in his second period, this may even be done in the case of the so-called "visible" property, i.e. cattle and produce. This distribution may be effected through an agent, or by the Sovereign, his officials and delegates; *and this latter method is even considered the better, unless the ruler is a tyrant.

An intention of performing one's duty towards God must be expressed by saying: "Here is the portion of my substance which I owe as assessment," or "as legal alms." It is not enough to say, "This is the portion of my substance which I owe," †or "This is legal alms." It is unnecessary to specify the property on which one is paying assessment; but if one does so, the gift counts as assessment on that particular property only. Expression of intention is obligatory on the guardian of a minor or the curator of a lunatic, when paying the tax for those entrusted to their care. †When payment is made by an agent, it is sufficient to express the intention when the amount is handed to him; it is not necessary for the agent to repeat it when paying in at the receiving office. It is, however, preferable that the agent also should himself express an intention, if he personally distributes it to the ultimate recipients. If the distribution is effected through government, the only expression of intention required by law is from the tax-payer, but if this is omitted the act has no value, even if an intention is expressed by the distributing official. †It is only when the assessment is recovered from a refractory taxpayer that expression of an intention is unnecessary on his part and is replaced by that of the ruler or his officer.

SECTION 3

It is not lawful to pay the assessment before one possesses the taxable minimum, but one may do so before the period of one year has expired, ‡so long as one is not two years in advance. As to the alms at the breaking of the fast, one may pay it in advance from the beginning of the month of Ramadan, †but not earlier. ††Assessment on fruit may not be paid until signs of maturity have appeared, nor in the case of grain and vegetables until the seeds have begun to harden ; but it may then be done immediately. In order that this anticipated payment should be valid the law insists that the owner should remain liable until the end of the year, as it is not till then that the tax is due ; it is also necessary that the person who accepts an anticipated share in the proceeds should not lose whatever claim he has at the end of the year. If after such anticipated acceptance a person loses his right to a share in the distribution of alms—even though he should regain it in the course of the year—the anticipation is, according to some authors, nullified. This right, however, is not considered to be lost merely because the person receiving an anticipated share has thereby ceased to be poor.

A taxpayer may only recover what he has bestowed in advance upon a person who appears afterwards to be no longer entitled to alms, if he has reserved to himself this right in all eventualities, †a reservation implied in the words, “ This is the alms I owe you, which I give you in advance.” †On the other hand, it cannot be recovered if the taxpayer did not state that the payment was in advance, and the person having a claim to it declares that he was not aware of it. †In legal proceedings the presumption is in favour of the recipient, on oath. If a claim for recovery is found good, the person who has received the advance is responsible for the accidental loss of the property delivered, †up to its full value on the day of delivery. †Nothing is due for a diminution in the value. †The separate fruit need not be given back.

A taxpayer who is in arrears is responsible for property due by him for alms, even in case of accidental loss ; but not if such loss occurred before the tax was due. *In the case of accidental and partial loss before the due date, the owner owes assessment only on what is left. If the loss was caused through his fault, after a year's possession but before the tax was due, the owner owes the full assessment in spite of the loss, for the assessment adheres to the property as if the recipients were co-proprietors ; or, according to one jurist, as if it were secured to them. One author maintains, however, that there is here a stipulated responsibility, not a real right. *The sale of taxable property before paying the assessment is invalid so far as relates to the amount of the tax, but valid for the remainder.

BOOK 6.—FASTING

CHAPTER I.—GENERAL PROVISIONS

SECTION 1

THE fast of the month of Ramadan becomes obligatory, i.e. commences, either upon the termination of the thirty days of the preceding month of Shaban, or from the first appearance of the new moon. The testimony of a single irreproachable witness—or of two, according to one authority—is sufficient to establish the fact of this appearance. †If there be only one, he must unite all the requisites of an ocular and unexceptionable witness ; so that the testimony of a slave or a woman cannot be accepted. If the fast has been begun on the testimony of a single irreproachable individual, but the moon is not seen for the next thirty days, †the fast must still be terminated after that period, even though the sky may have been cloudless. †A sight of the moon in any place renders obligatory the commencement of the fast in that neighbourhood, but not in places situated at a great distance. By great distance is understood a distance which permits of the abridgment of prayer, or, according to others, a distance that causes an appreciable difference in the rising of the heavenly bodies. [†The latter opinion is the better.]

When, by reason of the above rules, the fast is not yet obligatory in a certain place, †a traveller, arriving from a place where the moon has already been seen, should conform to the local observance. And he should act in the same way on arrival at a place where the moon has already been seen, coming from one where it has not yet been observed. But if in this way on arrival at a place he celebrates with the inhabitants the feast at the end of the fasting month, he must make up afterwards for the day's fasting he has thus omitted. †A passenger on a ship leaving on the morning of the feast and arriving the same day at a distant place where the inhabitants have not yet terminated the fast, should conform to the local observance during the rest of the day.

The intention is an essential condition for the validity of fasting. For the obligatory fast it should be formulated before the end of each night ; ††without, however, it being necessary to do this in the latter half of the night, or to abstain after having done so from eating and coition. ††If one goes to sleep after formulating it, it is not obligatory to renew it on awaking. As to a supererogatory fast it is enough to formulate the intention on the day selected for the fast, provided the sun has not yet begun to decline ; though according to one authority it can be done even later. ††Another doctrine, however, requires that the intention and the other conditions essential for the validity of fasting must in all cases exist from the beginning of the day. In the case of an obligatory fast the intention must have special reference to this fast. The most complete way of expressing an intention for the fast in the month of Ramadan is to use the following words :—" I intend to fast for the coming day, in order to perform my duty towards God, in the month of Ramadan of the present year." With regard to the words " perform," " duty," and " towards God," there is here the same diversity of opinion amongst scholars, as with regard to the formulating of an intention for prayer. ††One can, if need be, omit any special indication of the year, when expressing an intention as to fasting.

When, on the thirtieth night of the month of Shaban, one formulates the intention of beginning next day the fast of Ramadan, provided it is then the first of that month, the fast accomplished that day counts for that of the first of Ramadan only if one had reason to think that it would be the first day of that month, if e.g. the moon's appearance had been asserted by a slave, a woman or minors of sufficiently developed intelligence. For these persons, though incapable of furnishing legal proof of the moon's appearance, can render it probable, if they are otherwise worthy of confidence. In default of such reason for believing that the moon has appeared, a fast accomplished by virtue of the conditional intention above-mentioned is of no value, even if it afterwards appeared that it was really the first day of Ramadan on which one fasted. But if, on the other hand, it is on the thirtieth night of Ramadan that one expresses an intention to fast on the following day, provided it is not the first day of Shawal, this fast is always valid, if the day in question is really in the month of Ramadan.

A believer who is himself unable to ascertain the beginning of the month of Ramadan—if, e.g. he is in prison—should do his best to find out indirectly, and then fast for an entire month. If by doing this his fast happens partly to correspond with the ensuing month of Shawal, he is none the less considered to have accomplished his duty, †even if a little late. And if, under these circumstances, he has fasted for an incomplete number of days, while the month of Ramadan that year was a full month of thirty days, he can make up afterwards the single day that is wanting. On the other hand, a believer who in such circumstances begins fasting by mistake before the first day of Ramadan, must all the same continue fasting for the whole of that month, if this is still possible when he perceives his error. Otherwise, according to the opinion adopted by Shafii in his second period, he should repeat the fast afterwards, by way of reparation, as soon as he has perceived his error.

A woman, even when undergoing menstruation, may lawfully formulate during the night an intention to fast next day, and subsequently accomplish that act of devotion, provided that bleeding ceases before dawn, and provided also that in that same night the legal time for the menstruation is more than half over, for the ordinary term of the menses of the woman in question.

SECTION 3

When fasting, the following abstinences are rigorously prescribed :—

1. Abstinence from coition.

2. Abstinence from vomiting. ††Vomiting nullifies the fast, even if one be sure that nothing coming out of the body has gone back again. Involuntary vomiting does not count, †nor a clearing of the throat followed by a spitting of white froth. As to fluids descending from the head into the mouth they must be rejected, †for if kept in the mouth or swallowed the fast is broken.

3. Abstinence from allowing anything whatever to enter what is understood by the interior of the body. Some authorities consider that the fast is not broken unless the body has strength to digest what is thus introduced as nourishment or medicine. All authorities agree that introduction into the head, stomach, intestines or bladder breaks the fast ; and that it is of no importance whether the introduction takes place by sniffing or chewing or by a clyster, or through some wound penetrating into the stomach or touching the membrane of the brain. †The fast is also broken if one lets any liquid fall, drop by drop, into the ear. There are two other conditions established by the law as being required before the fast can be considered broken. (a) Introduction of substances must take place by an opening, and penetrate into the interior of the body. Thus the fast is not broken if oil happens to filter through the pores of the skin into the body, nor if collyrium applied to the eyes leaves a certain taste in the throat. (b) This introduction must be intentional. Thus the fast is not broken if a fly or a mosquito or the dust of the road or a little flour siftings enter the body, nor if the saliva is inadvertently swallowed, before it has left its original place of formation. On the other hand, the fast is broken : (a) by tasting saliva which has re-entered the mouth after leaving it ; (b) by putting into the mouth a thread moistened and still wet with saliva ; (c) by swallowing saliva mixed with any other substance, or saliva which has become impure. †One may, without breaking the fast, swallow all at once the saliva which has accumulated in the mouth ; but according to our school fluid remaining in the mouth or nostrils after clearing the throat or sniffing and then introduced into the body does break the fast, at least, if it be in considerable quantity, not otherwise. Similarly particles of food between the teeth, carried away by the saliva and swallowed, are of no consequence for the fast, when they cannot be distinguished and removed. Forced deglutition does not break the fast ; but it is broken if one swallows anything which one has been forced merely to take into the mouth. [*This last circumstance does not break the fast any more than the former.] Nor is the fast broken by inadvertently eating something ; †but it is broken if this negligence is often repeated. [†Even in this case the fast is not broken.] And similarly, according to our school, with respect to coition.

4. Abstinence from onanism ; otherwise the fast is broken. It is the same in the case of emission of semen due to touching or kissing a woman, or sharing a bed with her ; but not if it is due to lewd thoughts or looks. It is for this reason that it is blamable to embrace a person during the fast, if one is of a passionate temperament, and in any case it is better not to do so. [†This rule is of rigorous observance.]

The fast is not broken by cupping, or by the application of leeches.

Care should be taken in the evening not to eat until first assured that the sun has set ; †though strictly one may rely upon indirect information as to that fact. In the morning one can eat as long as one has reason to believe that the night is not yet over. [And even if one is doubtful upon the matter.] When one has done one's best to ascertain the proper time for taking one's meal either before the beginning or after the end of the day, but it appears after all that a mistake has been made, that day's fast is nullified. If one has taken some nourishment without thinking of the exact time, and it does not afterwards appear that any contravention has occurred, the fast is nullified in the case of an evening meal, but not in that of a morning one. If one has some food in the mouth on the appearance of the dawn, but immediately rejects it, the fast is not nullified ; and similarly with regard to coition.

SECTION 4

Essential conditions for the validity of fasting in general are faith, mental lucidity, and absence of menstrues or lochia for the whole day.

††There is no objection to one's sleeping the whole day ; *nor is the fast invalid by reason of a state of unconsciousness, provided there be in the day at least one instant's recovery.

Fasting is not permitted on either of the two great annual festivals, nor during the three days called ayyam-at-tashrik, at least according to the ideas of Shafii in his second period. †Nor may one accomplish a supererogatory fast on an "uncertain" day, for it is then generally speaking illegal, except to make up for a day of fast which has been neglected, or to accomplish a vow, or when it happens to coincide with a fixed date at which one is in the habit of fasting. The thirtieth day of the month of Shaban is called an "uncertain" day if the appearance of the new moon has been established only by public rumour, or by the testimony of minors, slaves, or persons of notorious misconduct. A day when the moon is invisible by reason of clouds is not an "uncertain" day.

During the month of Ramadan the Sonna recommends—

1. Breaking the fast as soon as possible, by eating some dates, if one has any, or, if not, by drinking a little water.
2. Putting off the meal taken before the fast to the last moment one is sure the prescribed time has not yet come.
3. Abstinence from lying and evil-speaking.
4. Not allowing oneself to be carried away by passion.
5. Bathing before dawn in order to remove all impurity.
6. Not applying cupping glasses.
7. Embracing no one.
8. Not exciting the appetite.
9. Refraining from chewing.
10. Saying, when breaking the fast, "O God, I have fasted to Thy glory ; and I now break the fast with food that cometh from Thee."
11. Frequently bestowing alms.
12. Frequently reading the Koran.
13. Withdrawing often into a mosque, especially during the last ten days of the month.

SECTION 5

The fast of the month of Ramadan is obligatory for every believer provided he be of sound mind, an adult, and able to support it. A minor should be exhorted to it from his seventh year, if he is strong enough. A sick person may omit to observe it, if he fears that it may seriously affect his health ; and so may a person undertaking a long journey with a lawful object ; with this distinction, however, that the exemption of the latter begins only from the second day, that of the former from the moment he falls ill. If in spite of this exemption the traveller or the sick person begins the day with fasting, he may break the fast when he pleases, ††except on arriving at his destination, or on recovery, as the case may be.

Such traveller or sick person must, after breaking the fast, make up afterwards for the days omitted. A similar duty lies upon the following persons :—

1. A woman who has her menses during the fast†.
2. Any person who breaks the fast without lawful excuse.
3. Any person who forgets to formulate an intention before fasting.
4. Any person who is unconscious for at least one whole day.
5. An apostate. But the born infidel who is converted need not make up for the days on which he would have fasted, had he been a Moslem.

There is no obligation to make up for a neglect due to minority or madness. †A minor who attains puberty on a day begun fasting should finish that day fasting, and that is all that is necessary. If he has begun the day not fasting, it is not necessary to make up for it. †It is the same with a lunatic who has come to his senses, or a converted infidel, these also being exempt from any obligation to fast on the day of the change, unless it was already begun fasting. On the other hand, the omission must be made up for afterwards by any one who improperly breaks a fast, or forgets to formulate an intention, but not by a traveller or sick person whose cause of exemption has ceased after the breaking. Our school goes so far as to extend this rule to the case where the cause of exemption has ceased before a breaking of the fast by a traveller or a sick person, unless on the preceding night a special intention was formulated to fast next day. It is necessary to make up for the lost day, if one has taken anything on an “uncertain day” which turns out afterwards to be a day of the month of Ramadan.

Abstinence from anything that breaks the fast, during the rest of a day on which the fast has already been broken, is a feature peculiar to the month of Ramadan ; it is not required when fasting in consequence of a vow, or to make up for a lost day.

SECTION 6

A person dying before he has been able to make up for days of fast of the month of Ramadan omitted by reason of a valid excuse, owes nothing by way of reparation, as no contravention can be imputed to him. But if, on the other hand, he had been in a position to make up for the days lost, there must be deducted from his estate, by way of expiatory fine, a modd of foodstuff for each day. Shafii, in his second period, abandoned the doctrine that the wali, or representative of the deceased, should accomplish the fast in his place. This rule applies also to a fast in consequence of a vow or by way of expiation. [*The original doctrine of Shafii is preferable, understanding by wali in this connection any relative, agnate or cognate, without distinction of sex or degree. Even a person who is not of the deceased's family can accomplish this fast, †not of his own accord but with the authorisation of the wali. It is not necessary after a death to accomplish a prayer or a spiritual retreat left undone by the deceased, nor to replace these acts of devotion by any expiatory fine paid out of the estate. One jurist, however, pronounces in favour of the obligation to accomplish a spiritual retreat neglected by the deceased.]

*An expiatory fine of a modd of foodstuff per day is due also from a person who abstains from fasting on account of advanced age. If a pregnant woman, or one who is suckling an infant, omits fasting for the sake of her own health, she should make up for it afterwards ; but she owes nothing in the way of fine. *If, however, she omits it for fear of hurting the health of the child, she must not only make up for it afterwards, but pay an expiatory fine in addition. †These principles with regard to a suckling woman apply also to any other person who breaks the fast in order to avoid imminent danger ; but not to the believer who breaks the fast of the month of Ramadan without a definite lawful excuse. We shall speak in the following section of the breaking of the fast by coition.

The believer who has to make up for a fast neglected in the month of Ramadan but who unnecessarily defers this act of devotion until the next Ramadan, owes also an expiatory fine of a modd of foodstuff for each day, multiplied by the number of years the accomplishment of this duty has been put off. And if, under these circumstances, the believer dies, without having made reparation for his fault, though able to have done so, there must be levied from his estate an expiatory fine of two modd for each day of fast neglected, i.e. one for the contravention and another for having deferred the reparation.

The expiatory fine is given to the poor and the indigent. Several modd may be given to the same individual. The foodstuffs given are the same as those given for the tax at the end of the fast.

SECTION 7

Expiation properly so called, and not merely an expiatory fine, is obligatory if one has violated the fast on a day of the month of Ramadan by intentionally indulging in coition, which is considered under the circumstances not only as a contravention but as an immoral act. Expiation is therefore not obligatory in the following cases :—

1. When one has indulged in coition forgetting that it was a fast day.
2. When one has violated in this manner a fast other than that of the month of Ramadan.

3. When one has broken the fast of the month of Ramadan by some act other than coition.

4. When one has indulged in coition during a voyage, intending to use one's right to break the fast, †or otherwise.

5. When one has indulged in coition under the erroneous impression that it was still night.

6. When one has indulged in coition, after having eaten through forgetfulness, and thinking the fast had so been broken, even though this idea was erroneous, and the fast was really broken by the coition.

7. When, forgetful of the fast, one has committed the crime of fornication ; or in the case of a traveller who has broken the fast in this way, wishing to use his right to sleep with a woman, without first ascertaining whether she was prohibited for him or not.

Expiation for coition is due by the man who has indulged in it ; or, according to one jurist, by the man and the woman together ; though, according to another, each is separately liable for the entire expiation. Expiation is also obligatory for the unbeliever who, after seeing the new moon, indulges in coition on one of the following days, even if he be the only person who has seen it and the other people of the place have not yet begun their fast. The expiation must be repeated as many times as there are broken fast days, and it remains none the less obligatory though a voyage is begun immediately afterwards. Our school extends this principle to the case of illness, though in other respects both traveller and sick person may break the fast when they please. ††Expiation has no effect upon the obligation to make up for the broken fast days.

Expiation consists in the freeing of a slave. If one has no slave, one must fast for two consecutive months ; and if one is not capable of this, one must feed sixty indigent persons. *If all three methods are impossible, the transgressor remains personally liable for the expiation of his fault, which he must accomplish as soon as he has the means of doing so. †One may always discontinue a fast undertaken by way of expiation, and substitute for it the feeding of indigent persons, when assailed by violent sexual desire. †A poor man may not lawfully give to his family what he owes by way of expiation.

CHAPTER II.—SUPEREROGATORY FASTING

THIS fast is recommended by the Sonna on : (1) Monday ; (2) Thursday ; (3) the day of Mount Arafah ; (4) the aashura, or 10th day of the month of Muharram ; (5) the tasua, or 9th day of the same month ; (6) the days called “ white days,” i.e. the 13th, 14th, and 15th of each month, because the moon is then full ; and (7) six days of the month of Shawal, at one’s choice, but preferably six consecutive days.

It is blamable : (1) to choose a Friday or Saturday for a supererogatory fast, except when fasting for several consecutive days ; (2) to undertake a perpetual fast, if one fears to incur thereby some injury to person or property ; otherwise it is commendable. But a perpetual fast may not include the two great annual festivals, nor the three days called ayyam-at-tashrik.”

A person who undertakes voluntarily a supererogatory fast or prayer may stop when he pleases without making any reparation ; but when one has begun an additional fast to make up for some neglect, this act of devotion must be completed. This must be done both in the case where immediate reparation is necessary, i.e. where an obligatory fast has been broken without lawful excuse ; for where the neglect need not be immediately made up for, as when the fast is broken in any other manner.

BOOK 7.—RELIGIOUS RETIREMENT

SECTION 1

THIS retirement is always commendable, but particularly upon the ten last days and nights of Ramadan, in order to include if possible the "night of power," believed to be the twenty-seventh. Shafii, however, inclined to think that this night is that of the twenty-first or twenty-third.

The retreat can only be accomplished in a mosque, preferably a jama masjid. In his second period Shafii maintained that a woman cannot perform this act of devotion in her private chapel, i.e. the room of her house specially set apart for family prayer. If one has vowed to undertake a retreat in masjid-al-haram at Mecca, it is there that it should take place; and similarly if a vow is made to accomplish a retreat in the great mosque at Medina or in the masjid-el-aksa at Jerusalem. The mosque at Mecca may be substituted for that at Medina or Jerusalem, but not vice versâ. In the same way the mosque at Medina may be substituted for that at Jerusalem, but not vice versâ.

† It is necessary to remain in the mosque long enough to be able to say one has sojourned there; though according to some jurists it is enough to have passed through the edifice without stopping, while others insist on a stay of at least one day.

Coition nullifies a retreat. So does any voluptuous contact, e.g. touching or kissing a woman, if any lascivious feeling is thereby provoked, but not otherwise. Coition in forgetfulness of the retirement is subject to the same rules as in regard to the fast. On the other hand, there is no objection to using scent and ornament, and taking nourishment during a retreat. One may also enter into retirement during the night only. A vow "to undertake a retreat on a fast day" is obligatory as is also a vow "to undertake a retreat fasting," or "to fast in retirement." †In all these cases the two acts of devotion must be combined.

Religious retirement requires a previous intention which, where the retreat is the consequence of a vow, is formulated in the same way as an intention for a necessary act of devotion. If the retirement has no previously fixed term, the intention to undertake a retreat is enough, however long may be the stay in the mosque. If the devout person leaves the mosque intending to return to it, the intention must be formulated anew, even if at the beginning the intention was for a definite time. But if one left the mosque in order to satisfy a want of nature a renewal of intention is not rigorously necessary. Some authors, however, insist on the intention being renewed in all cases where the mosque is left for a long time, without reference to the motives of this absence ; while others consider no such obligation exists at all. If one has vowed an uninterrupted retirement for a definite time, but afterwards quits the edifice for a valid reason, the retreat cannot be regarded as interrupted, and there is no need to renew the intention. Other jurists, however, insist on the intention being renewed, even in these circumstances, after each absence not necessitated either by a want of nature or by bathing to remove some grave impurity.

Religious retirement can be lawfully accomplished only by a sane Moslem free from grave impurity—including, in the case of a woman, menstruation. A retreat is nullified by apostasy, or drunkenness, both of which, according to our school, are retro-active. But madness and loss of consciousness supervening during retirement have no such effect upon what has already been accomplished, unless the person has been carried out of the mosque. The time passed by the believer in the mosque in a state of unconsciousness is considered as part of the retreat, but this is not so in the case of madness, or menstruation obliging the person to quit the edifice. A state of grave impurity also necessitates the believer quitting the mosque, if he cannot take a bath on the premises ; if he can, it is not necessary for him to leave for this purpose though it is permissible. The time during which menstruation or any grave impurity continues must be deducted from the period of retreat.

SECTION 2

A vow to enter a state of retirement for a fixed time without interruption should be accomplished ; ††but continuity is not obligatory, unless expressly declared. ††But a vow of a retreat “for a day” may not be divided up into twenty-four hours on different days. The believer who vows a retreat for a definite period only, e.g. a week, and who accomplishes it partially, but uninterruptedly, should observe continuity if obliged to make up afterwards for his omission ; but, on the other hand, the person who has not begun continuously is not obliged to continue so later, when making up for any lost days. *It is lawful to undertake an uninterrupted retreat, reserving a right to leave the mosque in case of any unforeseen occurrence ; and it is not necessary then to make up for lost time. This last rule, however, presupposes that the retreat is to expire at a fixed date, e.g. "at the end of the month," otherwise lost time would have to be made up for.

Continuity is interrupted by any exit without valid excuse ; though it is understood that there is no objection to one limb of the body being outside the edifice, or to leaving it in order to answer a call of nature. For the latter purpose one may go to one's own house, even if at a considerable distance, †if not too far. The believer who leaves in order to answer a call of nature, and falls ill on his return to the mosque, does not diminish the virtual effect of his act of devotion, if the interruption was short, and he followed the same road. Neither is continuity interrupted if one leaves the mosque for the following reasons :—

1. In consequence of some malady obliging one to leave.
2. In consequence of menstruation ; at any rate in the case of a long period of retirement. *On the other hand, there is interruption from this cause, if the period of retirement was so short that a woman is ordinarily free during this interval.
3. Through forgetfulness, at least, according to our school.
4. †In order to go to a minaret, isolated from the principal edifice, and perform one's duties as muezzin.

After these exits and absences from the mosque it is necessary to make up later for the time lost ; except when the mosque is quitted in order to answer a call of nature, for then it is never necessary to compensate for the interruption.

BOOK 8.—THE PILGRIMAGE

CHAPTER I.—GENERAL PROVISIONS

THE hajj, or pilgrimage, *and the omra, or visit to Mecca, are obligations towards God which can be accomplished only by Moslims. The guardian puts himself into a state of ihram for his pupil, and the curator for the lunatic entrusted to his care, for one cannot do this for oneself if unable to understand the nature of this act of devotion. As to the obligatory pilgrimage and visit, a journey to Mecca can never count for one or the other, unless one has put oneself into a state of ihram on one's own account, i.e. unless one is a free, sane, adult Moslem. So the poor man is capable of it, but not the minor or the slave.

The obligation to accomplish the pilgrimage or the visit exists only for such believers as are not only capable of legally performing it but also in condition of doing so personally or by intermediary. As to the power of accomplishing this act of devotion in person, it depends on four conditions—

1. Possession of a sufficient quantity of provisions, sacks and money for the voyage there and back. Some authors do not insist on possession of funds for the return journey, if family or near relatives are not left behind at the place from which one starts. A man who gains only enough to live from day to day is not obliged to go to Mecca if the distance be great; but if the distance be short and enough is gained on one day to support him for several the journey is obligatory.

2. Possession of a mount, if the distance from Mecca is two days' journey. If one cannot ride without a great deal of difficulty, one need not go unless in a pannier, if one can find a companion to occupy the other half. Any person who lives at a less distance from Mecca than two days' march, and who can walk, must make the pilgrimage, even if afoot; but if he is too feeble for such an undertaking, he is considered in the same way as a person living at too great a distance. Before such a journey can be looked upon as obligatory, the law insists also that provisions for the nourishment of self and mount must be the property of the pilgrim, and that he has not acquired them to the prejudice of his creditors, or of persons he has to support during his absence. †In the same way the expenses of the pilgrimage may not be deducted from those of the pilgrim's household nor from what he has to give to a slave whom he needs as a servant. †But he is obliged, if necessary, to sell his merchandise to defray the expense of the pilgrimage, if by so doing he is enabled to take his journey to the holy city.

3. The security of the road. The pilgrimage is not obligatory if danger is feared for person or goods, from wild beasts, enemies or brigands, unless one can take a safer road. *One should go by sea, if that way seems the safer ; and if necessary pay for an escort. Nor need one go at all unless one can get water and necessary provisions at reasonable prices at the places where travellers usually obtain their supplies. A reasonable price is one considered moderate in that country and at that time. It is also necessary that one should be able to procure forage for one's mount at each stage of the journey. A woman need not go unless accompanied by her husband or by some relative within the prohibited degrees, or by at least three trustworthy females. †The law does not require each woman in a caravan to be accompanied by her husband or a relative. †A woman on pilgrimage should remunerate the individual who accompanies her and who has undertaken the journey solely on her account.

4. Ability to make use of one's mount with no great difficulty. A blind man is exempt from the duty of pilgrimage if he has no guide. The rules just mentioned with regard to a woman's companion, apply also to a blind man's guide. A person who is incapable by reason of imbecility is subject to the same law as any other person, so far as regards the duty of going on pilgrimage to Mecca, except that he is not entrusted with money for the journey, and his curator should accompany him or employ some one else to do so.

Permission to be represented by a substitute at the pilgrimage is granted in the following cases :—

1. When a person dies without fulfilling his obligation of going to Mecca, the pilgrimage should be accomplished by another person for the deceased, defraying the expense out of the estate.

2. When one cannot go to Mecca by reason of paralysis, etc., one's duty is to send a substitute, at least if one is rich enough to pay for such a substitute and can find one at a reasonable price. This remuneration is of course subject to the pecuniary obligations already mentioned as incumbent upon any one who undertakes the pilgrimage in person. But the law does not insist in these circumstances that the maintenance of the family should be assured in advance for the whole period of going to Mecca and returning from it.

†When a son wishes to employ some one to accomplish the pilgrimage for the sake of his father, the person addressed upon the subject is not obliged to consent—and still less is he bound to comply when approached by some one who is not even a member of the deceased's family. But if a son offers to make the pilgrimage for his father, the latter is bound to accept his offer, or indeed that of any other person.

CHAPTER II.—STATIONS

ONE should put oneself into a state of ihram, i.e. begin the pilgrimage, in the month of Shawal or Zulkada, or on one of the ten first nights of Zul Hijja. As to the permissibility of not putting oneself into a state of ihram until the night preceding the feast of sacrifice, authorities are not in agreement. ††If he puts himself into a state of ihram on any other month, the believer can only accomplish a visit, an act which can be performed at any time of the year. The pilgrimage takes place only at one fixed time.

The stations at which one must stop in order to put oneself into a state of ihram are as follows :—

1. For the inhabitants of Mecca, the holy city itself. According to some authorities all inhabitants of the sacred territory may place themselves in a state of ihram at their own domicile.
2. For pilgrims from Medina, Zul Halaifa.
3. For those from Syria, Egypt and the north of Africa, Johfa.
4. For those from Tahama and Yemen, Yalamlam.
5. For those from south or north Nejed, Karn.
6. For those from the east, Zat Irk.

It is preferable to put oneself in a state of ihram at the entrance of these stations, although strictly speaking this may even be done when leaving them for Mecca. If the pilgrim does not pass through one of these places, he should place himself in a state of ihram, as soon as he arrives in the vicinity of the nearest to his route ; or, if he passes near two of them, †when close to that which is the farther from Mecca. If he passes near none of them, he should place himself in a state of ihram when at a distance of two days' march from the holy city. A pilgrim domiciled between the holy city and one of the stations should enter a state of ihram at the place where he resides. If a believer passes through one of the stations, not intending to accomplish a pilgrimage, but resolves afterwards to perform this religious duty, he should begin the state of ihram at the place where he adopted this decision. But no one arriving as a pilgrim may pass a station without putting himself in a state of ihram ; and if he neglects to do so he must go back to the station indicated by law, unless the time for the ceremonies is at hand, or the road is not safe. In these two last cases an expiatory sacrifice must be performed ; †but not if the pilgrim duly returns to the station. Unless a pilgrim does so return, an expiatory sacrifice is always due for a neglect to put oneself in a state of ihram at the proper station. One can always place oneself in a state of ihram on leaving one's domicile, before arriving at one of the stations, and this is indeed the course to be preferred. Only one author maintains it to be better not to put oneself into a state of ihram until one's arrival at a station indicated by law. [*This latter doctrine is preferable, and in accordance with authentic traditions.]

The stations for the visit are the same as those for the pilgrimage, on arrival at least from outside the sacred territory. Otherwise, i.e. if one is already at Mecca for the pilgrimage, one should first of all proceed to the nearest part of the boundary of the sacred territory, without reference to one's country of origin, then cross this boundary if only by a single pace, and place oneself in a state of ihram at this same station. *The believer, however, who has taken part in the ceremonies of the visit, without first recrossing the boundary of the sacred territory in order to renew his ihram, may make reparation for his fault by an expiatory sacrifice. According to our school an expiatory sacrifice is not obligatory for those who cross the boundary of the sacred territory after having renewed their ihram for the visit. The places most to be recommended for crossing the sacred territory and renewing ihram for the visit are : Jarana, then Tanaim, and lastly Hodaibiya.

CHAPTER III.—IHRAM, OR STATE OF CONSECRATION

SECTION 1

THE believer who goes to Mecca may put himself into a state of ihram—

1. Precisely ; by formulating an intention to accomplish the pilgrimage, the visit, or both.

2. Generally ; by merely formulating the idea of ihram, without special reference to the act to which it is to relate. The precise manner is to be preferred, though one jurist maintains the contrary opinion. The general intention may, during the months of pilgrimage, serve at the believer's choice, either for the pilgrimage, the visit, or both ; but one cannot lawfully take part in any ceremony without first making up one's mind upon the subject. †On the other hand, a general intention at any other time of the year applies only to the visit ; and never to the pilgrimage, even if one wait until the time prescribed for that duty.

3. By saying—" My ihram will be the same as such an one's." If the person indicated did not put himself into a state of ihram at all, these words are held to imply a general intention. According, however, to the opinion of some authorities, such a proceeding has no legal consequence, if the person in question is known not to have put himself into a state of ihram. Where the former intention was precise, the later accomplishment must of course be in the same precise manner. If the death of the person indicated prevents the nature of his ihram being known, both pilgrimage and visit must be accomplished together in the manner called kiran, and part taken in the ceremonies of both.

When placing oneself in a state of ihram, one should formulate one's intention and pronounce the sacramental words labaika, etc. The words without the intention are of no effect; ††but the intention is good, even without the words. The Sonna has introduced the following usages :—

1. Taking a bath when putting oneself in a state of ihram; or, if there be no water, having recourse to ablution with sand. The bath is repeated on making one's entry into the holy city; on the occasion of the halt at Mount Arafat; at Mozdalifa on the morning of the feast of sacrifice; and lastly on the three following days, called ayyam-at-tashrik, when one repeats the ritual lapidation.

2. To use scent, when putting oneself into a state of ihram, both for the body †and for the clothes. There is no objection to one's continuing to wear these perfumed garments after having placed oneself in a state of ihram, nor to having about one's person some object that gives an agreeable odour; †but one must not put them on again after having once taken them off, under penalty of an expiatory fine.

3. That women should stain the hands red when putting themselves into a state of ihram; and that men should put off clothes that are sewn, and put on special garments called izar and rida, both of white stuff. On his feet a man may only wear sandals.

4. Performing two rakas, when putting oneself into a state of ihram. But it is preferable to do this latter only when about to continue the journey to Mecca, whether on foot or not; only one author considers that the state of ihram should follow immediately upon the two rakas.

It is recommended to a person who has put himself in a state of ihram to repeat frequently and aloud the words “labaika,” etc., especially when changing his position, e.g. mounting a horse or dismounting, ascending or descending some elevation, or when rejoining a caravan; but not during the circuit of the Kaba. However, according to the earlier idea of Shafii, the formula is commendable also when making this circuit, provided it is not said aloud. It is composed of the following words :—" Behold me, O God, behold me, behold me. No one shareth Thy power. To Thee the glory, the riches, the empire of the world. No one shareth Thy power." On seeing anything astonishing one says : " Behold me, of a truth the true life is that of the other world." After pronouncing this formula the believer adds a prayer for the Prophet, and lastly beseeches God to permit him to enter Paradise to show Himself satisfied with him, and grant him escape from everlasting fire.

CHAPTER IV.—ENTRY INTO MECCA

SECTION 1

It is preferable—

1. To make one's entry into the holy city before the halt at Mount Arafat.
2. To take a bath at Zu Tuwa, if arriving by the Medina road.
3. To make one's entry near the place called Thaniya Kada.

On first catching sight of the Kaba or sanctuary one exclaims, " O God, may this temple grow in glory and grandeur, esteem and veneration. May the number of those that extol its greatness and grandeur exceed the number of those that come hither, as pilgrims and visitors, to praise its worth and distinction, its glory and magnificence. O God, salvation cometh from Thee ; make us live in faith." The mosque built round the Kaba is then entered by the gate called the Banu Shaiba, and one begins at once to make the circuits called " of arrival." These circuits are specially prescribed for the pilgrim who has made his entry into the holy city before attending the ceremony at Mount Arafat. When one enters the city without any idea of accomplishing a pilgrimage or visit, it is none the less commendable to put oneself into a state of ihram for one or other of these acts of devotion. According to one jurist this is even a matter of rigorous observation ; unless one is continually going in and out of Mecca, e.g. as a woodcutter or hunter.

SECTION 2

The circuits, of whatever category they may be, consist of obligatory practices, and of practices introduced by the Sonna.

The obligatory practices are as follows :—

1. To cover the shameful parts.
2. To be exempt from all filth and impurity. Any impurity incurred by the believer during the circuits necessitates ritual ablution or a bath, after which the circuit may be continued from where it was left off.

According to the opinion of one jurist, it must be begun all over again from the beginning.

3. To keep the sanctuary on one's left hand.

4. To begin the circuit from the place in the Kaba inclosing the Black Stone ; and to face this stone with all the front of the body each time it is passed. A circuit begun at any other place does not count, and if the believer has in such way arrived at the Black Stone, he should begin a new circuit from there. Neither does a circuit count if one has walked upon the Shazarwan or basement of the sanctuary, nor if one has touched the wall of the sanctuary with the hand by stretching out the arm above the Shazarwan, nor if one has passed, on one's way, through the two entries of the Hijr. However, authorities are not all agreed as to the touching of the wall.

5. To make the circuit of the Kaba seven times, without leaving the mosque that surrounds it.

The practices introduced by the Sonna are as follows :--

1. Making the circuit on foot.

2. Beginning each circuit by touching the Black Stone with the hand, the lips and the forehead. If the crowd of devout people prevents one touching the stone with lips and forehead, it is enough to touch it with the hand and then kiss the hand. If necessary it can suffice to point the finger at the Black Stone.

3. Not touching the corner stones on the Syrian side of the Kaba, i.e. those placed at the north and west corners. As to the corner stone on the Yemen side, i.e. the south corner, one places one's hand upon it, and then simply kisses the hand.

4. Beginning a circuit by uttering the following formula :—" In the name of God ; God is great ; O God, I believe in Thee ; I declare the truth to be in Thy Book ; I trust in that which Thou hast promised ; and I conform to the practices of Thy Prophet Muhammad, to whom grant Thy grace and blessing."

5. When opposite the door of the sanctuary pronouncing this formula: " O God, this temple is Thy dwelling ; this sacred territory belongs to Thee ; the security found here comes from Thee ; and this is the place to seek refuge with Thee from fire everlasting." To this formula an invocation may be added if so desired. An invocation believed to have been used by the Prophet is to be preferred to a recitation from the Koran, but not one not so derived.

6. Making the first three circuits in the way called ramal, i.e. with short quick steps, and the others at an ordinary pace. This rule is specially to be observed when one is going, immediately after the seven circuits, to perform the ritual walk between the hills Safa and Marwa ; and, according to one authority, when performing the circuits called "of arrival."

7. Saying, during the ramal, "O God, may this pilgrimage be looked upon with favour by Thee; may my sins be pardoned; and may the walk that I am about to perform be agreeable to Thee."

8. Wrapping oneself with one's rida in the manner called idtiba, during the ramal; ††as also when executing the ritual walk. The idtiba consists in passing the middle of the rida under the right armpit, and putting the two ends over the left shoulder, so that the right shoulder is left bare. The ramal and the idtiba are not prescribed for women.

9. Keeping in the circuits as close to the sanctuary as possible, unless the crowd of devout people prevents the ramal being possible, in which case it is better to perform the circuits at a little distance. But if it is feared to come thus into immediate contact with women, it is preferable not to execute the ramal, and to perform all the circuits at an ordinary pace, keeping near the Kaba.

10. Performing the successive circuits uninterruptedly.

11. After finishing the circuits, performing two rakas, placing oneself behind the Makam Ibrahim. The recitation in each consists respectively of Chapters 109 and 112 of the Koran.

When accomplishing the circuits at night, the above-mentioned formulas, etc., are uttered aloud. According to one jurist the last two practices, Nos. 11 and 12, are obligatory, and not merely precepts of the Sonna. When a person in a state of ihram is carried round the sanctuary by another not in that condition, the circuit counts for the person carried. The same if the bearer also is in a state of ihram, and has already performed the circuits on his own account. †If, however, a person who has not yet accomplished the circuits, though in a state of ihram, carries round the sanctuary another in like state, the circuit counts for the person carried if such is the intention of the bearer; but if the latter's intention is to perform the circuit either for himself alone, or for himself and the person carried, the circuit counts only for himself.

SECTION 3

After finishing the circuits and the prayer, one touches the Black Stone with the right hand, and then kisses that hand. Then one leaves the mosque by the gate called the gate of Safa in order to perform the ritual walk, a ceremony which consists in traversing seven times the distance between the hills of Safa and Marwa, beginning at the former. This walk may be taken either just after the final circuits, or after those “of arrival.” But it must not be separated from the latter by the halt at Mount Arafat. In any case the walk is only done once ; and if accomplished immediately after the circuits “of arrival” it is not repeated again after the final circuits. It is commendable—

1. To mount the hill of Safa and that of Marwa to the height of six feet, saying : “ God is great, God is great, God is great ; glory to God ; God is great for having led us hither, and He is worthy to be praised for His goodness towards us ; there is no God but He that is the One, whose power none shareth. To Him be the empire of the world ; to Him the glory. It is He, the Beneficent, that giveth life and death from His hand ; He is the Almighty.” Then one offers up a prayer, either for some spiritual, or for some worldly, benefit. [These glorifyings and prayers are repeated twice or even thrice.]

2. To walk at an ordinary pace at the beginning and end of the road, but to run in the middle. The places where the speed should be altered are indicated.

SECTION 4

It is recommended that the imam or his substitute should preach a sermon at Mecca on the seventh day of the month of Zul-Hijja, after midday prayer. It consists of a single discourse exhorting the congregation to proceed next morning to Mina and obtain information as to the ceremonies about to be performed. Next morning the preacher sets out for Mina, followed by the pilgrims. There they pass the night, and as soon as the sun is risen proceed to Mount Arafat. [The pilgrims do not go straight there, but stop on the way at Namira near Mount Arafat, until the sun begins to decline.]

On Mount Arafat, as soon as the sun begins to decline, the imam preaches two sermons, and then accomplishes with the congregation the midday and afternoon prayers combined. The audience remains there until sunset glorifying God and offering prayer, and uttering many times the confession of faith. After sunset one goes to Mozdalifa and performs evening prayer and the prayer of the night combined, the former being said late.

For the validity of the halt at Arafat, the law insists absolutely that one must actually have been on some part of the mountain bearing that name ; even if only for some other reason, as to seek a fugitive slave. It is necessary that one should be capable of taking part in religious ceremonies in general, and not in a fainting condition ; while, on the other hand, there is no objection to sleeping upon the sacred mountain. The legal time for the halt at Arafat begins on the day bearing that name, from the moment the sun begins to decline ; †† and it lasts until dawn on the next day, called yum-en-nahr, or day of the immolation of victims. A person quitting the assemblage on Mount Arafah, and not returning before sunset, owes for this contravention an expiatory sacrifice ; but the observance of this precept is merely commendable ; only a single author maintains it to be obligatory. If one returns to Mount Arafah before sunset one cannot be blamed, †nor even if it be only during the night. The believers who by mistake have only been on Mount Arafah the tenth day of the sacred month have none the less fulfilled their duty, unless their number was inferior to the number of devout persons ordinarily there at that time, in which case their halt counts only as an act performed late. Those who halt at Arafah on the eighth of the month, and perceive their error before the time prescribed for the ceremony has gone by, should repeat their act of devotion at the legal time. ‡If they perceive it too late they must still satisfy the requirements of the law by way of reparation.

SECTION 5

The night is passed at Mozdalifa. A pilgrim who quits this village before or after midnight has not failed in his duty, provided he returns before the dawn. Only the pilgrim who is not there in the second half of the night, owes an expiatory sacrifice ; though the necessity of this sacrifice has been considered doubtful as in the case of that already mentioned with regard to Arafah.

The Sonna prescribes that women and weak men should start early for Mina, but not before midnight. The other pilgrims remain at Mozdalifa, and as soon as possible after morning prayer they set out for Mina, taking with them from Mozdalifa pebbles for the lapidation. On arrival at the place called Al Mashar al haram, they halt until dawn, uttering invocations. Then they proceed to Mina, where they arrive a little after sunrise. There each pilgrim must throw seven pebbles on a heap of stones called jamrat-al-akaba. During this ceremony the cries of labaika are momentarily interrupted, and replaced at each cast by " God is great." Any person who has brought a victim should immolate it after the lapidation.

Next one has one's head shaved or one's hair cut, the former being preferable, though women may content themselves with the second. This shaving or hair-cutting is an essential part of the ceremonies, whether of a pilgrimage or of a visit. Three hairs at least must fall under the razor or the scissors, or be pulled out or burnt. The cutting may be effected either at the end of the hairs or at the roots. It is even recommended to a perfectly bald person to have the razor passed at least once over his head. After the hair has been cut or shaved, one returns to Mecca to accomplish the final circuits, and the walk if not yet taken. Then one returns to Mina for the third time.

The Sonna insists upon observing the proper order of the ceremonies—lapidation, immolation, head-shaving or hair-cutting, circuits—as they have been described. One may lawfully proceed to accomplish any of them from midnight preceding the day called yum-en-nahr, i.e. of the sacrifice of victims. For the immolation there is no prescribed time. The time allowed for the lapidation lasts until the end of the yum-en-nahr. [††The immolation should take place on the yum-en-nahr, as Rafi himself points out at the end of the next chapter.] For head-shaving or hair-cutting, for the circuits, and for the walk, no time is prescribed by the law.

When we said above that the act of shaving the head or cutting the hair is an offering to God, we should have added that after accomplishing the lapidation and this offering, the pilgrim has recovered the first degree of his tahallol or normal condition; he can dress as usual, shave, pare his nails, *and even go hunting or execute a marriage contract. [*A marriage contract is still forbidden him. When the pilgrim has accomplished the final circuits, he has then entirely recovered his normal condition. He can do, after that, everything that was prohibited him on account of his state of ihram.]

SECTION 6

On his return to Mina the pilgrim passes there the next two nights, those i.e. separating the three days called ayyam-at-tashrik, and repeats each day the lapidation at the jamrat-al-akaba, and at the two other heaps of stones in the vicinity, each lapidation consisting of seven distinct casts. It is permissible to leave Mina on the second of the ayyam-at-tashrik before sunset, after the lapidation, without waiting to pass the night of the third day. Only, if the departure does not take place until after sunset, then the night must be passed at Mina and next day's lapidation duly performed. The lapidation on the ayyam-at-tashrik may be commenced as soon as the sun has begun to decline; and must be finished before sunset, or, according to others, before the appearance of dawn on the morrow.

The following are conditions for the validity of the lapidation:—

1. That it is accomplished in seven successive casts, one by one.
2. Observing the proper order of the different heaps of stone.
3. That the stones thrown are pebbles.
4. That they are really thrown. It is not enough to deposit them at the place mentioned.

The Sonna has introduced the practice of employing pebbles of ordinary size. The law does not require : (1) that the stones should remain where they are thrown ; or (2) that the person performing the lapidation should immediately leave the stone-heap.

A person who has not enough strength to accomplish himself the ceremony of lapidation should ask another to do it for him. *Any one who has omitted the lapidation on the first or second day can still make it good on the morrow, without an expiatory sacrifice. This sacrifice is, however, formally prescribed for any one who omits the lapidations altogether. According to our school an expiatory sacrifice is due if three out of the seven casts have been omitted.

The lapidations over, one may leave Mecca, after once more performing the circuits of the sanctuary as a farewell ; a further stay in the holy city not being permitted. These farewell circuits are obligatory ; their omission requiring an expiatory sacrifice. Only a single author maintains they are merely prescribed by the Sonna, and that consequently their omission has no need to be expiated. Even, however, in the case of those who admit that these farewell circuits are obligatory, the pilgrim is allowed to be exempt from the necessity of any expiatory sacrifice, if, after leaving Mecca without performing them, he returns before having covered a distance permitting him to abridge prayer, ††but not otherwise. A woman in whom menstruation manifests itself during her stay in Mecca, need not wait until it is over in order to perform her farewell circuits ; she may leave without accomplishing them.

The Sonna has introduced a custom that the pilgrim, after taking part in the ceremonies we have just described, should drink the water of the sacred fountain Zamzam and visit the tomb of the Prophet at Medina.

SECTION 7

The essential elements of the pilgrimage are five : the iḥram, the halt on Mount Arafa, the circuits, the walk, and the act of head-shaving or hair-cutting—at least, according to the authorities who consider this last as a necessary ceremony. If one of these elements is omitted the pilgrimage is wholly void, and this error cannot be made up for by any expiatory sacrifice. The five ceremonies mentioned, with the exception of the halt on Mount Arafa, are also essential elements of the visit.

The pilgrimage and the visit may be accomplished together in three different ways—

1. In the way called ifrad, i.e. first performing the pilgrimage, and then putting oneself into a state of iḥram in order to accomplish the visit, as if one lived at Mecca.

2. In the way called Kiran, i.e. by putting oneself into a state of ihram, for both acts of devotion, before arriving at the prescribed station. One is then considered, when accomplishing the ceremonies of the pilgrimage, to have performed at the same time those of the visit. The putting oneself into a state of ihram in order to accomplish the visit in the pilgrimage months is enough to enable one to combine the two acts, provided that before performing the circuits one places oneself in a state of ihram for the pilgrimage also ; but the inverse proceeding is not permitted by the law, according to the opinion maintained by Shafii in his second period.

3. In the way called tamatto, i.e. by putting oneself into a state of ihram for the visit, at the station indicated by the law, and while accomplishing this act of devotion ; and then after this remaining at Mecca until the time of the pilgrimage and placing oneself in a state of ihram for this last duty, as if one lived in the holy city.

The first method is the best, then the third, and lastly the second, though one authority has maintained that the third method is the best. Any one who follows it, however, owes an expiatory sacrifice in the three following cases :—

1. If he does not live in the neighbourhood of the Masjid-al-haram, or sacred mosque built round the Kaba ; i.e. when his domicile is at a greater distance than two days' march. [†This distance is not to be computed from Mecca, but from the boundary of the sacred territory.

2. If the visit takes place in one of the pilgrimage months, and in the same year in which he performs the pilgrimage.

3. If he has not returned to the prescribed station, in order to place himself in a state of ihram for the pilgrimage.

This expiatory sacrifice is due from the moment of entering upon a state of ihram for the pilgrimage ; but it is better to perform it on the day of the immolation of victims. The believer who is unable to perform the expiatory sacrifice during his stay in the sacred territory should fast for ten days ; i.e. three days during the pilgrimage, preferably before the day of Mount Arafah, *and the other seven on his return home. It is also commendable that the three and the seven should be consecutive days ; *and if the three first have not been observed during the pilgrimage, a short interval should elapse between their observance and that of the seven. A person choosing the second of the three methods must make the expiatory sacrifice, in the same way as if he had chosen the third. [Unless he lives in the neighbourhood of the sacred territory.]

CHAPTER V.—ACTIONS FORBIDDEN DURING IHRAM

DURING ihram abstinence from the following things is obligatory :—

1. Covering the head, even partly, with anything whatever, except in case of necessity. Nor is it permitted to wear any article of clothing that is sewn or woven or tied round the body, unless one has no other. These precepts, however, apply only to men. A woman's face is subject to the same rule as a man's head ; but a woman may wear sewn clothing, *except gloves.

2. The use of scent, whether on the clothes or on the body ; and the use of cosmetics for the hair or beard ; though it is not even blamable to wash the body and head with mallow water.

3. Cutting the hair or the nails. The expiatory fine of three modd of foodstuffs is only incurred in full when at least three hairs or three nails have been cut ; one modd only being due for a single hair or a single nail, and two modd for two hairs or two nails. A person who is unable to observe this abstinence, should have his whole beard shaved and pay the expiatory fine.

4. Coition. This act nullifies the visit always, and even the pilgrimage if one has been guilty of it before attaining the first degree of tahallol. It must be expiated by the sacrifice called badana, i.e. the immolation of a camel, and subsidiarily a cow, or seven head of small cattle. One must continue to take part in the subsequent ceremonies, and must afterwards repeat all the ceremonies, even in the case of a supererogatory pilgrimage, or of a visit. †This repetition should take place as soon as possible, and in any case after no long interval.

5. Hunting any animal fit for food, other than a domestic animal. [This rule extends to any animal born of such animal and of one that may be killed.] Hunting is forbidden on all the sacred territory even when one is not in a state of ihram. Any one who has killed an ostrich must make reparation by a badana ; an antelope or a wild ass is expiated by the sacrifice of a cow ; a gazelle by a full-sized goat ; a hare by an anak or goat of less than one year ; and a jerboa by a jafra or weanling kid. Wild animals that have not been thus appraised are expiated by the most suitable domestic animals, according to the opinion of two irreproachable experts. If the law cannot be satisfied by the sacrifice of an animal, one should pay the value of the animal killed.

6. Cutting or plucking, upon the sacred territory, even if not in a state of ihram, any vegetable whatever that has not been sown or planted by man. *For cutting or plucking plants or trees one is liable for an expiatory sacrifice. In the case of a large tree one owes a cow ; in the case of a small tree or a plant, a sheep. [Our school does not distinguish between what is planted by man and what is not. One is merely permitted to cut the galingale, and thorny plants, such as the ausaj, etc., such at least is the opinion of most authorities. †One may also lawfully take such plants as are necessary as fodder for one's beasts, and medicinal plants one may require.]

Hunting is also forbidden in the immediate neighbourhood of Medina ; but a breach of this rule involves no responsibility, according to the opinion maintained by Shafii in his second period.

A hunter having to expiate the killing of an animal may, at his choice, either—

1. Kill the animal he owes and give the meat to the poor of the sacred territory ; or—

2. Have the value of the animal he owes estimated, buy foodstuffs to this amount, and distribute to the poor as in 1 ; or—

3. Fast a whole day for each modd of foodstuffs owed in virtue of alternative No. 2.

If the animal killed is one which cannot be compensated for, No. 2 or No. 3 must be chosen. As to the expiatory fine for shaving the head or cutting the hair, one may choose between the sacrifice of a sha, or a present of three saa of foodstuffs, in each case to the profit of six poor persons ; or one may fast for three days. †But the expiatory sacrifice incurred for omitting some obligatory duty, such as putting oneself into a state of ihram at one of the stations, always consists in the sacrifice of a sha ; and this immolation cannot be replaced by any other act of devotion, unless it is impossible to find a sha. In this latter case one may buy foodstuffs to the value of the animal for poor persons, or, subsidiarily, fast a day for each modd. The expiatory sacrifice due for not choosing the prescribed time for the halt on Mount Arafat, also consists of a sha, but may be replaced in the same way as for the person who has unlawfully followed the third way of combining the pilgrimage and the visit. †It must take place during the pilgrimage, which must be accomplished afterwards by way of reparation. On the other hand, the expiatory sacrifice for committing some illicit act, or for omitting some obligatory duty, is not confined to any legal term ; *but it must be performed in the sacred territory, and the meat belongs of right to the poor who are domiciled there.

As to persons accomplishing the visit, the best place for them to perform their expiatory sacrifices is Murwa. The best place for pilgrims to do so is Mina. This rule applies also to the immolation of victims which the pilgrim or the person accomplishing the visit have brought to the holy city in fulfilment of a vow. ††This immolation, like the others, should take place preferably on the day of the feast of victims.

CHAPTER VI.—CAUSES THAT PREVENT THE ACCOMPLISHMENT OF THE PILGRIMAGE

THE believer who is prevented from continuing the ceremonies is considered to be thereby released from his state of ihram, and fully restored to his tahallol or normal condition. Some authors, however, insist that, to have this result, the cause of prevention must be individual, or that it must apply to all the pilgrims without exception. Illness is not a valid cause of prevention ; unless a right to interrupt the ceremonies was expressly reserved at the time the ihram was undertaken ; but a person who leaves his state of ihram in this way must in any case sacrifice a sha, at the place where the cause of prevention arose.

[A return to a state of tahallol only occurs when the intention to do so is combined with a sacrifice and with the cutting of the hair, etc. ; at least according to the authorities who consider this last act as an essential ceremony. *In default of a sha, the immolation may be replaced by the purchase of foodstuffs to the value of the animal, and subsidiarily by a fast of a day for each modd. *This is the only way in which one can be immediately released from a state of ihram.]

When a slave has put himself into a state of ihram without his master's consent, the latter may oblige him to return to his normal condition. In the same way a husband may break the ihram of his wife, if she undertakes a supererogatory pilgrimage without his permission ; *and the same is the case if the pilgrimage be obligatory. A person who has been prevented from continuing a supererogatory pilgrimage is not required to repeat it later ; but this is so in the case of a recognised obligatory pilgrimage. As to a pilgrimage which, though obligatory, has not been expressly recognised as such, it must be repeated only if one has the power to accomplish it.

A pilgrim who has allowed the prescribed time for the halt on Mount Arafat to pass by, cannot be released from his state of ihram until he has performed the circuits, the walk, the cutting, etc., of the hair ; though the obligation to accomplish these two last ceremonies has been called in question by one authority. In any case the believer under such circumstances owes an expiatory sacrifice, and must afterwards perform his act of devotion.

BOOK 9.—SALE OR BARTER

CHAPTER I.—GENERAL PROVISIONS

For the validity of a contract of sale or exchange the law requires mutual consent, i.e. that the vendor should make an offer of the goods, e.g. by saying, "I sell you," or "I make you owner" of such and such a thing, and that the purchaser should declare his consent, e.g. by saying, "I buy the object," "I accept the ownership," or "I accept it." There is no objection to the purchaser first declaring his wishes, *as by saying, "Sell me such and such a thing," and the vendor replying, "I sell it you," which constitutes a valid agreement. †A sale may also equally well be implied in words such as, "I give you the thing for such and such a sum." But the law forbids that any long interval should elapse between the declaration of the vendor and that of the purchaser; and it requires the acceptance to be similar to the offer, for if one party says, "I sell you the thing for one thousand debased pieces of money," and the other replies, "I buy it for a thousand good pieces," there is no legal sale. In the case of a mute person a sign is as good as consent expressed in words. Each contracting party must be capable of managing his affairs.

[Another condition essential to the validity of a sale is that no violence must be used against either party, except such as is authorised by law. An infidel is forbidden: (1) *to buy a copy of the Koran, or a Moslem slave (unless his ancestor or descendant)—the latter is freed by the mere fact of such purchase; or (2) to buy weapons of war, unless he is the subject of a Moslem ruler.]

There are five conditions necessary for the legal sale of any thing—

1. It must be a pure substance. Thus, a dog cannot be sold, nor wine. Nor can anything that has become impure be sold; if it is impossible to remove the impurity, as in the case of impure vinegar, milk, or fat.

2. It must be of some use and consequently of some value. Thus, vermin cannot be sold, nor useless wild animals, nor e.g. two grains of corn, etc., nor an object of mere amusement like a musical instrument or an article only used in playing a game. As to this last category, however, some authors consider sale permissible if the materials have an intrinsic value. †The sale of water is allowed, even by the banks of a river, and sand may be sold even in the desert.

3. The vendor must be able to deliver it to the purchaser. Thus, a domestic animal or a slave that has escaped or property that has been misappropriated by another person cannot be sold, ††unless to a person able in fact to bring back the animal or slave or recover the property. One may not sell the half of a vase or of a sabre, for these things cannot be materially divided without great loss of value ; †but this is permissible in the case of a piece of cloth, each portion of which retains its proportional value. One may not sell any pledged article without the creditor's consent ; nor a slave who has committed a crime and who can consequently be seized by the injured party as damages. There is no objection, however, to the sale of a slave who is himself in debt, *or who is liable to corporal punishment under the lex talionis, or otherwise.

4. The vendor must be the real owner. The sale of another's goods is null. In his first period Shafii was of a different opinion, and considered the sale of another's goods, without the knowledge of the owner, as a conditional sale, i.e. a sale having full legal effect if the owner subsequently approves of it, but not otherwise. But the sale of the property of a person to whose succession one will be called, and whom one supposes to be living, but who it subsequently transpires was dead at the time of the contract, is considered to be valid.

5. The thing must be distinctly known to the two contracting parties. Thus "one of two coats" cannot be sold without determining which ; but one saa may be sold from a heap of grain, whether the number of saas in the heap is known †or not. A sale cannot be effected, in block and without indicating the respective quantities, of "as much corn as can be stored in such and such a room," nor for "as much gold as the weight of such and such a stone," nor for "as much as so and so has sold his horse for," nor for "a thousand pieces of money consisting partly of drahms and partly of dinars." Where a certain quantity of "pieces of money" has been stipulated for, the price is considered sufficiently determined if one coinage only is current in the locality ; but where two coinages are current, the one intended must be specified. A particular heap of grain may legally be sold at the rate of one drahm the saa, though the number of saas is not known ; but if the sale is for "one hundred drahms at one drahm the saa," ††the contract is void unless there are really just one hundred saas of grain. A thing sold is deemed to be sufficiently known to the two parties if it is in their sight and they have inspected it ; *but a thing not there cannot be sold unless both parties have previously seen it. Another doctrine admits the validity of such a sale, but allows the purchaser the faculty of refusing the goods after inspection. If the thing sold is not there, the fact of previous inspection suffices in the case of things ordinarily durable for that interval. If the whole of a thing may be estimated by partial inspection, it is enough to have seen a part, e.g. the outside of a heap of grain, or a sample. This is so also in the case of a natural envelope, such as the rind of a pomegranate, an eggshell, or the lower covering of nuts and almonds. Inspection of a thing means the inspection of those parts of it from which its quality may be judged. †A mere description of the thing as in the contract of salam is not enough for an ordinary sale. Consequently the salam, but not a sale, may be effected by a blind man. It is only, according to some jurists, when such person has become blind before reaching the age of discernment, that the contract of salam is forbidden him.

CHAPTER II.—ILLICIT GAIN

FOODSTUFFS cannot be legally exchanged for others of the same nature, unless : (1) it is a cash transaction ; (2) the two quantities are equal ; and (3) each party takes possession of what is due to him then and there.

If the foodstuffs exchanged are not of the same kind, e.g. corn and barley, the first and third conditions are still obligatory, but not the second. By foodstuff is understood anything that serves for the internal nurture of the body, whether as principal nourishment, seasoning, fruit, or medicine. Flours produced from different products of the soil are deemed to be of different kinds, as also liquors such as oil and vinegar. *The same rule applies to meat and milk from different animals.

Quantities are ascertained to be equal either by measure or weight, according to their nature—the custom of the inhabitants of the Hejaz at the time of the Prophet being observed with regard to this matter, or if it be not known the custom of the local market. Some jurists maintain one must always go by the measure, others by the weight ; others allow choice. Money is subject to the same rules as foodstuffs. Goods from which illicit gain can be derived may not be bartered for in a lump without specifying the exact quantity, even if after the transaction the quantities are ascertained to be equal. Equality must be ascertained when the products are mature and dry. Thus unripe dates cannot be bartered for other dates, ripe or unripe ; nor grapes for grapes or raisins. Products not intended to be dried, like cucumbers and some kinds of grapes, may not be exchanged at all with others of the same nature. Only one authority maintains that in this case an equality ascertained after plucking suffices to render the exchange valid. Equality cannot be ascertained after the substances have been converted into flour, ptisan or bread ; but only when the grains are still intact. However, in the case of oleaginous plants like sesame, equality can be ascertained either when the grains are still intact or after preparing the oil ; or in the case of raisins either while dry or after the preparation of vinegar or must. As to milk one has the choice between its ordinary state, butter or skimmed milk ; but not in any other condition, such as cheese or akit. Equality cannot be ascertained after products have been cooked, fried, or roasted ; but there is no objection to their being heated in order to separate them from other substances, as in the case of honey or butter from which wax or milk has thus been extracted.

A sale is void if the prohibition of illicit gain has been violated by both parties, or by one only. No distinction is made between the exchange of products of a different nature and of a different species. Thus one cannot barter a modd of preserved dates and a drahm for a modd of the same substance and a drahm, nor a modd of this substance and a drahm for two modds or two drahms, nor a certain quantity of good and debased coin for the same quantity of good or debased coin. It is forbidden to barter meat for an animal, whether of the same kind as the meat, *or not, and whether eatable or not.

CHAPTER III.—OTHER ILLICIT SALES

SECTION 1

The Prophet has forbidden the following sales :—

1. The sale of the services of a male animal required to cover a female. According to some authors this prohibition relates to the sale of male sperm, while according to others it refers to payment for the use of the male. Sperm may not be sold at all, whether the transaction is called a sale †or a hire.

2. The sale of younglings to be brought forth later from the foetus of an animal. No object may be sold by stipulating that the price shall not become due until such and such a foetus bears young.

3. The sale of an embryo, i.e. of what a female animal bears in the womb.

4. The sale of the product of a future project, i.e. of a being still within the loins of the male.

5. A “touch” sale, expression which means : (a) the sale, i.e. of a piece of cloth already folded, that is bought by merely touching it, and renouncing in advance the right of option accorded by law after seeing it ; or (b) a sale concluded by saying, “When you have touched this coat I have sold it you.”

6. A “throw” sale, i.e. if two persons mutually exchange their goods, and the sale is effected by this alone, without any preliminary examination on either side.

7. A “stone” sale ; effected by saying, “Of these pieces of cloth I sell you the one upon which falls this stone thrown in the air” ; or a sale that becomes irrevocable by throwing a stone ; or by stipulating, “I sell you such and such an object, and you will have a right of option until I have thrown this stone.”

8. A “double-face sale” ; i.e. one effected by the words, “I sell you such and such an object, either for one thousand pieces of money in cash, or for two thousand at the end of a year” ; or, “I sell you this slave for one thousand, if you will sell me your house for the same amount.”

9. Any “qualified” sale ; i.e. a sale on condition that the purchaser will sell or lend some other object to the vendor ; or the purchase of a cultivated field on condition that the vendor will reap the harvest ; or the purchase of a piece of cloth on condition that the vendor will make a coat out of it. †All these kinds of conditional sales are null.

The law does not forbid at a sale the stipulation of conditions that merely modify it, and do not affect the contract itself ; such as—a reservation of a right of option ; a stipulation that the vendor shall not be held to guarantee the absence of redhibitory defects ; a reservation of the right of plucking fruit ; the stipulation of a term for payment, of a security or of a personal guarantee for the payment of the price agreed upon, if it is not a cash transaction—provided always that there is no uncertainty as to the term, the security or the guarantee. It may also be stipulated that payment be made in the presence of witnesses, †without its being necessary at that time to designate the witnesses by name. If, under these circumstances, the purchaser does not deposit the necessary security, or the person designated does not bring it, the vendor has the right to relinquish the contract. The sale of a slave on condition that he will be freed, is quite valid ; †and the vendor has the right to proceed against the purchaser to enforce the enfranchisement agreed upon. †On the other hand, the sale would not be valid if the vendor reserved a right of ownership after the enfranchisement, or stipulated that the enfranchisement should be by will, or contract, or at some future time, e.g. a month.

The following stipulations are considered admissible :—

1. Any condition resulting from the very nature of the sale, such as taking possession, or redhibition ; or even a condition without any reasonable object (itself without effect), as, e.g. to take only a certain kind of food.

2. A stipulation that goods should have some special, useful quality, as, e.g. that a slave should know how to write, or that a beast should be with young, or have milk in the udder. Such stipulation confers on the party insisting on it the right to withdraw from the contract if the thing sold has not the stipulated quality. According to a single jurist a stipulation that a beast should be with young nullifies a contract.

†On the other hand, the law regards as null the sale “of a beast or a slave with the embryo.” It prohibits the sale either of the embryo alone, or of the beast or the slave “without its embryo.” It is illicit to sell in any way a slave pregnant with a free child. When a female is sold, the embryo is ipso facto comprised in the transaction.

SECTION 2

Some kinds of sales, though forbidden by the Prophet, are not necessarily null when concluded ; the prohibition referring only to accessory circumstances, not to the essence of the contract. Amongst these are cited the following :—

1. A sale concluded between a townsman and an inhabitant of the desert or of the country, in the following circumstances :—(a) when the townsman sees a stranger arrive with objects of prime and general necessity for sale at the current rate of the day, and is able to persuade him to transfer the whole to himself, with the avowed object of retailing them at a higher price ; and (b) when the townsman goes out to meet people bringing their goods to town, and buys these products before they are aware of the current rate. On learning the fraud of which they have been victims these people have even the right to cancel the contract.

2. Outbidding ; i.e. it is forbidden to outbid, as soon as the vendor has accepted the offer of another person, even though this may not yet be irrevocable.

3. A sale or purchase effected with the object of supplanting a competitor. It is blamable to persuade a purchaser to cancel a revocable sale, in order to sell him a similar object ; or to persuade a vendor to cancel a contract, in order to be able to buy the thing oneself.

4. Trickery, consisting in offering a higher price for something, not in order to obtain it but with the object of deceiving another person as to its value. †Under these circumstances, however, the person cheated has no right to cancel the sale.

5. A sale of dates or grapes to make wine of.

The law does not permit the sale of a female slave that involves her separation from her child before the latter has attained the age of discernment, or—according to one authority—the age of puberty. *Any sale or donation involving such separation is null.

A sale is also considered illegal where one buys goods giving at the same time a sum of money as earnest, which sum becomes part of the price if the purchaser is satisfied with the things, but is otherwise considered as a gift to the vendor.

SECTION 3

In the case of a sale of two objects at the same time, the sale of one of which is illegal, e.g. a sale of vinegar and wine, or of a slave and a freeman, or of one's own slave and that of another person, or of a slave without the consent of another co-proprietor, *the contract is valid with regard to what has been legally sold, without prejudice to the purchaser's right, if ignorant of the circumstances, to cancel the sale. Even if he knew of it, or would prefer the contract to remain valid, he has a right to claim a proportional diminution of the total price agreed upon. A single authority maintains that the purchaser cannot insist upon any such diminution if he prefers to keep the object which has been legally sold him. A vendor can never cancel a contract of this sort. The sale of two slaves is not ipso facto cancelled by the accidental death of one, before the purchaser has taken possession, at least according to our rite ; but the purchaser may decline to fulfil the contract, or, if he prefer, claim a proportional reduction of the price.

*Contracts of different kinds may be combined, as e.g. a contract of hiring with a sale or with a salam contract. In such a case the price agreed upon is divided proportionally between the obligations undertaken. Even in the case of a sale combined with a marriage contract, not only is the validity of the marriage admitted, *but also that of the sale, and of the stipulation of dower. Whether in any case there is a combination or a plurality of contracts depends upon whether one price only has been stipulated, or a separate and distinct price for each contract. If it is said, "I sell you this for so much and that for so much," two bargains have been concluded. Subject to this rule plurality may also be determined by the number of persons taking part in the transaction as vendors or purchasers ; and if two persons appoint one person to act for them, or one person appoint two agents, †it is the number of these agents that must be considered.

CHAPTER IV.—RIGHT OF OPTION OR CANCELLATION

SECTION 1

THE right of option, called majlis, i.e. "of the sitting," is the inalienable right to cancel a contract concluded by both parties, so long as they have not yet separated. This right of option obtains for all agreements of the nature of a sale, e.g. exchange of gold or silver or of foodstuffs, the contract of salam, mere transfer of a thing purchased, sharing, compromise for an equivalent, etc. It even exists if one purchases a slave of whom one is the ancestor or the descendant, and whose enfranchisement consequently take place ipso facto on that purchase. When, in these circumstances, it is admitted that the ownership of the slave remains with the vendor as long as the right of option lasts, or even that it remains in suspense during that interval, the doctrine must also be admitted that either of the contracting parties can cancel the agreement upon the spot. But if, on the contrary, it is held that the ownership of the slave is at once transferred to the purchaser by his taking possession, then it follows that the vendor alone enjoys a right of option. No such option exists in the delivery of a debt, nor in a marriage contract, nor in a gift, †whether accompanied or not by a remuneration, †nor in the exercise of a right of pre-emption, †nor in a contract of hiring, nor in a farm lease, nor in stipulating dower.

Neither does a right of option exist in the following two cases :—

1. If the parties declare their approval of the contract. If only one does so, he loses his right of option, but that of the other party remains, until he makes a similar declaration.

2. If the parties separate without any express reservation. A right of option remains, however, as long as the separation has not taken place ; even though the parties remain together for a long time, or get up and walk about together. Custom indicates what is to be understood by the word “separation.”

‡In the case of sudden death of one of the parties, his right of option is transferred to his heir ; similarly, in a case of sudden madness the right passes to the curator. If proceedings are taken and one party asserts and the other denies the fact of separation or cancellation, the presumption is in favour of the one that denies.

SECTION 2

The contracting parties may by special stipulation reserve a right of conventional option, i.e. the faculty of cancelling the contract within a certain time. Such stipulation may be made either by one of the contracting parties or by both. It is admissible in all agreements of the nature of a contract of sale, except only those in which possession must be taken upon the spot, as in the exchange of goods subject to the prohibition of illicit gain, and in the contract of salam. The faculty can only be reserved for a specified time, not exceeding three days, from the conclusion of the bargain, or—according to others—from the separation of the parties.

*The ownership of the thing sold remains with the vendor, if a right of option has been stipulated by him; or with the purchaser if the stipulation was his; and it remains in suspense if both made the stipulation. However, if the contract is not subsequently cancelled by an exercise of the right of option, the ownership of the goods is considered to have been the purchaser's from the time the bargain was concluded; while if, on the contrary, the contract is cancelled, the vendor's ownership is considered to have been uninterrupted.

Cancellation or approval of a sale concluded under reservation of a right of option should be announced in explicit terms, such as, "I wish the bargain to be cancelled," or "suppressed," or that "the goods be returned"; or "I approve the contract," or "I wish it to be carried out." Cancellation may also be manifested by facts indicating that one considers oneself owner of the goods, e.g. by cohabitation between the vendor and the slave he has sold, or by her enfranchisement; as also by a second sale of the goods, or by hiring them to another person, or by giving in marriage a female slave. †Similar acts on the part of the purchaser are considered as showing that he approves the bargain concluded; but exposing the goods for sale does not constitute an act of ownership, either on the part of the vendor or the purchaser, and consequently does not suffice to establish approval or cancellation.

SECTION 3 (1)

A purchaser has a right of option on account of defects in the thing bought, of which he has become aware only after taking possession, but which existed previously. The following, for instance, are redhibitory defects in a slave:—castration; tendency to debauchery, theft or desertion; incapacity to retain urine when lying down; a bad breath; a fetid odour from the armpits. An animal such as a horse or mule, etc., is considered to have redhibitory defects, if it is stubborn or bites. In a word any defect is called redhibitory that affects the substance or the value of the thing sold in such a way as to render it unfit for the use to which it is lawfully destined, at any rate if the object is usually exempt from such defect. No distinction is made between defects already existing at the time of the contract and those that may occur later; but defects originating after taking possession cannot give rise to redhibitory option; unless they are the consequence of some previous fact, e.g. if some bodily member of a slave has to be amputated under the law of talion for a crime committed before taking possession. †In this latter case the slave may be returned to the vendor ; but not if he dies of an already contracted malady. †On the other hand, redhibition is admissible if the slave has to be put to death for previously abjuring Islam.

*A sale under an express condition that the vendor shall not be responsible for redhibitory defects is permitted only in the case of animals and slaves, and only in regard to hidden defects existing at the time of the contract unknown to the vendor, who is otherwise fully responsible. Thus this stipulation does not affect the vendor's responsibility for defects supervening between the conclusion of the contract and taking possession ; †for this responsibility cannot be excluded from the agreement under any pretext, as during that interval the goods are at his risk and peril.

Should the purchaser not become aware of certain redhibitory defects until after the accidental loss of an object of which he has taken possession, or until after enfranchising a slave, he can still none the less sue the vendor for damages, i.e. he can claim a proportional reduction in the price. †Under these circumstances the value of the object is reckoned at the lowest rate obtaining between the contract and taking possession. And the right of redhibition remains also in the case of accidental loss of what has been given by way of price, in which case the purchaser can still none the less return any defective articles he may have received, and claim either objects analogous to those he gave by way of price or the value of those objects. But where a purchaser perceives the existence of defects only after transferring the property to a third person, †he is not entitled to any damage ; though the right of redhibition is renewed if the property returns to the ownership of the first purchaser. However, according to some, this last rule applies only to the case where an article is returned to the first purchaser by reason of redhibition.

Redhibition should be effected without delay, as quickly as custom requires. It is understood that if one becomes aware of some such defect while praying or at a meal, redhibition may be deferred until one has finished ; or until daybreak, if it occurs during the night. If the vendor or his agent is in the place the article should be returned either by the purchaser or some one acting on his behalf. But it is better not to concern oneself about the vendor but take the matter at once before the court. If the vendor is absent and has no representative in the place, there is all the more reason to adopt this latter course. †If possible, witnesses should be called to prove the fact of redhibition, and they should look after the object until it has been restored to the vendor or to the Court. †If it is impossible to call witnesses, cancellation need not be pronounced before meeting the vendor or his agent or coming into court.

After discovering redhibitory defects, use of the thing bought is absolutely forbidden. Thus the right of redhibition is lost if one continues to make use of the services of a purchased slave, or even if one leaves the saddle or shabrack on the back of a mount. But it is permissible to ride an animal back to the vendor if it is so mischievous one can neither lead nor drive it. In every case where the purchaser loses his right of redhibition in consequence of his own fault or negligence, he loses also all claim to damage.

The right of simply returning the defective article ceases when the latter is allowed to deteriorate still further in possession of the purchaser ; unless the vendor consents to take it back as if no deterioration had occurred, in which case the purchaser may either return it or keep it without compensation on the part of the vendor. But if, on the contrary, in consequence of the deterioration, the vendor declines to take back the object sold, the purchaser can only force him to do so if he offers to pay compensation for the further deterioration while in his possession ; or he can, if he prefer, keep the thing himself and claim damages for the original redhibitory defects for which the vendor was responsible. If the parties are in agreement as to the best way of arranging their difficulties in the matter, no one has any right to force them to adopt any other ; †but otherwise the court should authorise the arrangement proposed by the actual possessor who wishes to keep the thing in dispute. The purchaser should also inform the vendor without delay of any accident that may befall the article sold, so that the latter may be able to declare his wishes ; for if the purchaser puts off doing this, without valid excuse, he loses both his right of redhibition and his right to claim damage. If damage to the thing sold is necessary before redhibitory defects can be discovered, as for instance in the case of an egg, a coconut, or a melon, and one is not aware of the noisome or rotten condition of the thing until it is opened, right of redhibition remains intact, *and one is not liable for damage. But if it is possible to ascertain the existence of redhibitory defects in some way that does less damage to the goods, then the general rule relating to defects supervening after taking possession must be observed.

SECTION 3 (2)

Where two slaves with redhibitory defects have been bought together, both should be returned to the vendor. *Even if only one of the two is affected, both must be returned ; and the vendor may refuse to accept the one without the other. If a slave with some redhibitory defect has been bought from two co-proprietors, each may be proceeded against in proportion to his share ; *and, similarly, if two persons have purchased a slave from another, each may sue on his own account.

Where defects are asserted by the purchaser and denied by the vendor, the presumption is in favour of the latter, provided he confirms his statement on oath.

Any increase which continues to form part of the object bought, e.g. the fattening of an animal, must be returned with it in case of redhibition; but things that exist separately from it, such as the young of an animal, or the rent of a house, are unaffected. These latter belong to the purchaser, whether the redhibition takes place after he has taken possession or before. But children or young animals born of a mother already pregnant at the time of the contract must be returned.

Employing a slave as a domestic servant, or cohabiting with one not virgin does not prevent redhibition, provided of course the purchaser was at the time unaware of the defects. On the other hand, the deflowering of a girl after taking possession is considered a damage that renders simple redhibition impossible; if done before taking possession this even constitutes a crime against the property of another.

SECTION 4

It is rigorously forbidden to sell an animal put aside for a few days in order to increase the amount of its milk at the moment of sale. Such fraud gives the purchaser a right of cancellation, provided he makes use of it without delay. According to some authorities the right can still be exercised three days after discovery. If the purchaser has already consumed the milk from the animal, he should return the beast to the vendor together with a saa of dry dates, or—according to some—a saa of any kind of foodstuff forming the main ordinary nourishment in that locality. †A saa is the amount due, however much milk has been consumed. And this right of cancellation is not limited to cattle, but admitted for all animals serving for nourishment, and also for a female slave and a she-ass. Only, in these cases, it is not necessary to pay the vendor any compensation for loss of milk,—though this has been contested as to the female slave.

The following acts are considered to be of the nature of fraud and to give rise to a right of cancellation of sale :—

1. Damming irrigation water or mill water in order to let it flow at the moment of sale.
2. Painting the face of a female slave red; or dyeing her hair black, or curling it.

†But dirtying a slave's clothes with ink, to make a purchaser believe he knows how to write, is no ground of cancellation.

CHAPTER V.—PROPERTY SOLD, BEFORE THE PURCHASER HAS TAKEN POSSESSION

SECTION 1

THE vendor is responsible for the thing sold, until the purchaser has taken possession ; so that if it is accidentally lost, the contract is ipso facto cancelled, and the price need not be paid. *The purchaser cannot relieve the vendor of this obligation, as it is a rule of public interest. However, if the loss has been caused voluntarily and knowingly by the purchaser, this circumstance is considered to amount to a taking possession by him, and the responsibility consequently devolves upon him. But in the contrary case, i.e. if the purchaser has caused the loss involuntarily, there is the same divergence amongst authorities as with regard to a person who involuntarily eats food unlawfully taken from him by his host. The same rule that obtains in case of casual loss is applied by our rite to loss caused by the vendor ; *but loss caused by a third person does not necessarily imply a dissolution of the contract, but confers on the purchaser the right of either demanding the execution of the engagement or of withdrawing from it. In the first case the purchaser, in the second the vendor, can proceed against the third person.

If it is not a case of total loss, but only of a deterioration in the value of the object sold, the law establishes the following distinctions :—

When the deterioration accidentally supervenes before taking possession, and the purchaser declares he does not wish to make it a ground of cancellation, he cannot claim to have a part of the price remitted ; and still less of course where the deterioration is caused by himself. On the other hand, deterioration caused by a third person confers on a purchaser a right of cancellation ; or, if he does not wish to withdraw from the agreement, a right of proceeding against that third person. If deterioration has been caused by the vendor, our rite prescribes that the purchaser may choose between a cancellation and an execution of the contract, both without any claim to damage.

A purchaser is forbidden to resell anything bought before he has taken possession of it ; whether the second sale be to the original vendor or to some one else. Hiring, pledging or giving is prohibited as much as selling, so long as possession has not been taken ; but the enfranchisement of a slave may take place first. What is given in exchange for goods, by way of price, is subject to the same law as the goods themselves, at least if it is a certain definite object ; that is to say that the vendor cannot transfer its ownership to any one else before taking possession.

On the other hand, one may lawfully alienate, even before really taking possession, the following :—

1. What one has temporarily entrusted to the care of another by way of deposit.

2. Funds contributed to a society or company.

3. Funds contributed to a joint stock company.

4. A thing pledged, if one has paid the debt.

5. Property inherited.

6. The balance due from a guardian upon the majority of a minor.

7. An article one has lent for use.

8. Property bought at an auction sale.

For one is already owner of these things before actually taking possession.

Before taking possession it is unlawful to sell foodstuffs upon which one has advanced money, or to substitute other foodstuffs for those stipulated in the contract of salam or advance ; but it is permissible to replace the money advance by something else, at least according to the opinion maintained by Shafii in his second period. If, however, the money advanced, and the effects with which it is agreed to replace it, are capable of giving rise to some illicit gain, the mutual taking possession must be proceeded with at once. As an example may be cited the substitution of drahms, i.e. silver coin, for dinars or gold coin. †When, on the other hand, the things substituted and those for which they are substituted are not both of them capable of giving rise to illicit gain, e.g. drahms replaced by cloth, the law does not insist upon certain definite articles at the time of stipulation, and it is not necessary to take possession at once.

SECTION 2

One may also lawfully agree to replace, not only what one has borrowed, but also anything one has caused the loss of, and is consequently responsible for. In doing so the following distinctions should be observed, with regard to taking possession on the spot.

Except in accordance with the provisions of Chapter IV. of Book 12, *the sale of a credit to any one but the debtor is void. Thus one cannot purchase the slave of Zaid with a hundred pieces owed one by Amr. Neither may Zaid and Amr exchange debts owed them by a third person ; any agreement to that effect is void.

The taking possession of immovable property is not effected by a mere surrender of it to the purchaser ; the law insists that he must be put in the state of being able to dispose of it, after the vendor has removed his belongings. †If the two contracting parties are not present at the place where the purchased property is, whether movable or immovable, possession should be taken within a reasonable time. The taking possession of movable property is effected by simple delivery, or by conveyance to the place where the purchaser is. That is to say, if the sale has not been concluded at the vendor's it is enough to convey the goods to the place where the purchaser is ; but if the sale has been concluded at the vendor's, then this is not enough, and the things must be taken to the domicile of the purchaser. And further, where the sale takes place in the vendor's house, the purchaser cannot waive his right to receive the goods at his own house, seeing that the vendor has no benefit in keeping in his house what he has sold. If the vendor consents to the things remaining, he is considered to have lent the purchaser his house or his store for that purpose.

SECTION 3

The purchaser has no right to take possession of the goods before paying the price, unless the vendor has allowed him time for payment.

When something is bought by measure or weight, such as a piece of cloth or a strip of land so long, or a certain amount of cheese, the measuring or weighing must take place at the same time as the delivery. As example of a sale by capacity may be cited one concluded thus : " I sell you this piece of cheese at one drahm the saa," or " I sell you these ten saas of cheese for such a sum." If it is a question of the sale of a certain quantity of foodstuffs, etc., that the vendor can claim from Zaid and sells again to Amr in equal quantity, the measuring must take place twice, first to transfer the ownership of the goods from Zaid to the vendor, and then to transfer it again from him to Amr. The taking possession would be illegal if in these circumstances one simply said to Amr, "Take what Zaid owes me," and Amr proceeded to comply with this invitation.

SECTION 4

When the vendor refuses to deliver the goods to the purchaser until the latter has paid the price of them, and the purchaser on his part declares he will not pay before taking possession, it is the vendor who should take the first steps. One jurist, however, has maintained the opinion that it is the purchaser who should begin by paying ; another considers that there is no obligation upon either to begin, but whoever fulfils the agreement thereby obliges the other to do so also ; a third thinks that both parties should be forced to carry out the agreement simultaneously.

[If the price consists of a certain definite object, the first two of these opinions are inadmissible ; *and both parties should simultaneously deliver the articles agreed upon.]

After delivery by the vendor the purchaser should pay the price agreed upon, if he has it with him. If he has not, the following circumstances should be distinguished :—

1. If the purchaser is insolvent. In this case the vendor can declare him bankrupt ; the sale is ipso facto cancelled, and the vendor can reclaim the thing sold and delivered.

2. If the purchaser is solvent, and his property (a) is in the town or its neighbourhood. In this case the court may prohibit him from engaging in any further trade, until he has paid the debt, but the sale is not cancelled. But if his property (b) is at a distance that permits the abridgment of prayer, the vendor need not wait †but may either cancel the contract or if he prefer it await the arrival of the money, after having had the purchaser forbidden to engage in any further trade, as indicated under (a).

It must be understood, however, that this does not prevent the vendor always having a right to detain the object he is selling until payment, if otherwise he runs a risk of losing both the price and it. And the purchaser has the same right with regard to the price. So that the difference of opinion among jurists has regard only to disagreement between vendor and purchaser as to which of the two should begin the execution of a contract of sale, without prejudice to the adverse party.

CHAPTER VI.—SIMPLE TRANSFER ; PART TRANSFER ; TRANSFER AT A PROFIT, OR AT A LOSS

SIMPLE transfer consists in buying a thing and then saying to a third person who is aware of the price agreed on, “ I wish to transfer to you my rights and obligations under this contract. If he accepts a price must be paid equal to that agreed upon. An agreement of this sort is subject to the same rules and has the same legal consequences as an ordinary sale ; but it is unnecessary to mention any price as the grantee knows this already. Any subsequent reduction in the price made by the vendor in favour of the original purchaser goes to the entire profit of the grantee.

Part transfer is identical to simple transfer, with the sole difference that only a part of the thing purchased is transferred, not the whole. Part transfer is valid, not only where the part transferred is indicated, but also where a third person is made to participate in the sale, without expressly mentioning any particular portion of the thing sold. In the latter case each participant takes half ; though according to some authorities such a proceeding is illicit.

It is lawful to make a transfer at a profit, i.e. to buy, e.g., something for one hundred drahms, and then to offer to transfer it to a third person at a profit of "one drachm in ten," or "eleven for ten" ; while transfer at a loss consists in saying, "I sell you what I have just bought at a loss of ten for eleven," and in that case the difference between the price of the purchase and that of the transfer is one in eleven, or, according to others, one in ten.

If the transfer has been made "for the price of the purchase," the transferee owes only the price and nothing more ; but if the words used by the purchaser were "for what it has cost me," he owes, besides the price of the purchase, what the original purchaser has paid by way of remuneration to the measurer, the broker, the watchman, the cleaner, the repairer and the dyer he may have employed, and also the price of the dye and other substances he may have used to increase the value of the thing purchased. These expenses, however, are not taken into account if the original purchaser has himself cleaned, measured, or transported the article, nor if another person has done so gratuitously.

It is obligatory, in every transfer, that both contracting parties should be aware of the price of purchase, or what takes the place of it. ††Otherwise the agreement is void. The law admits a presumption in favour of a declaration by the transferrer with regard to price and term of payment, whether the price has been paid in coin, or other articles given instead, and with regard to redhibitory defects supervening while the goods were in his possession.

*If a transferrer declares he has bought the goods for one hundred pieces of money, while in reality he had them for ninety, he loses the ten pieces and any other profit he would otherwise have made ; but this does not give the transferee a right to cancel the agreement. †If, after an agreement has been concluded, the transferrer declares that the article transferred at a profit for one hundred really cost him one hundred and ten, and that thus the transferrer is really at a loss, the agreement is void, unless the transferee consents to accept the truth of this subsequent declaration of the transferrer. [†This circumstance does not render the transfer invalid.]

But if, on the contrary, in such circumstances the transferee does not accept the subsequent declaration of the transferrer with reference to the price, and the latter can allege no adequate excuse for his former erroneous statement, his later declaration is inadmissible, even if he could prove the truth of it. †His only remedy then is to call upon the transferrer to take an oath that he was ignorant of the real price of purchase. Where, however, the transferrer can allege an adequate excuse for his former erroneous declaration with regard to the price, he may at his choice either challenge the transferee to take an oath, or prove the truth of his later declaration.

CHAPTER VII.—SALE OF TREES, FRUIT, AND STANDING CROPS

SECTION 1 (1)

IF one says, "I sell you this land," or "this courtyard," or "this plot of ground," the buildings and trees upon it are ipso facto comprised in the bargain. This rule, however, according to our school, does not apply to the case of a pledge or security. Plants whose roots remain in the soil for more than one year, such as the katt and chicory are considered to be trees and consequently included in a sale of land ; but this is not the case with plants whose roots give only a single crop, like wheat, barley and other grain. Although in consequence the vendor remains owner of these plants, our school does not forbid the sale of a field that has growing grain on it ; but the purchaser can make this a cause of cancellation, if he was not aware of it. †Previous sowing does not in itself form an obstacle to the delivery of a piece of ground, and the loss or accidental deterioration of the crops renders the purchaser liable as depository, from the moment of surrender by the vendor. Planting shoots is the same thing as sowing. †If the purchaser does not renounce the purchase upon perceiving that the land has been sown, he loses the right to damage he would otherwise have on the ground that he had had no use of the land until the harvest.

The combined sale of a field and the crops on it is void, both as regards the land and as regards the crops ; though some jurists maintain that this rule is of doubtful application, so far as the land is concerned.

A sale of land includes the stones that may happen naturally to be upon it, but not those brought there by the hand of man. A purchaser has, however, no right to cancel the contract, if at the time of concluding the bargain he knew such stones were there ; but he may oblige the vendor to remove them. If the purchaser was unaware of the condition of the ground, the same principle should be observed, if the stones can be removed without injury to the soil. If this is impossible, the purchaser may, at his choice, either cancel the contract on the ground of redhibitory defects, or oblige the vendor to remove the stones and level the soil. As to the obligation of the vendor to indemnify the purchaser, under these circumstances, authorities are not in agreement. I prefer the view which admits that a reasonable indemnity may be claimed; of course only in a case where the stones are removed after possession has been taken, for before this a purchaser has no right to any compensation.

In a sale the following things are understood to be included :—

1. In the sale of a “ garden ” are included the ground, trees, walls, and—according to our school—the buildings, that may be in it.

2. In the sale of a “ village ” are included all buildings and empty ground within the circuit of the walls; ††but not the fields outside.

3. In the sale of a “ house ” are included the ground, and all buildings, including baths; but not movable furniture, such as pails, pulleys, and beds. Included are also fixed doors, with their hinges, washing-house vats, fixed shutters, fixed stairs, ††upper and lower mill stones, †and the keys of fixed locks.

4. In the sale of an “ animal ” is included any shoeing of iron or other material applied to the soles of the feet.

5. In the sale of a “ slave ” are included the clothes he is wearing. [†The sale of a slave does not include the clothes he is wearing.]

SECTION 1 (2)

The sale of a tree includes that of the roots and leaves; but as to the leaves of a mulberry tree authorities are not agreed. Such sale includes also the branches, except those already withered. A tree can be sold either on condition that it be torn up or cut down or on condition that it shall remain where it is. The latter is assumed, if no condition be mentioned. The sale of a tree does not extend to the soil in which it is planted, but the purchaser has a right to use the ground as long as the tree remains; and if the tree dies, he must remove it.

The fruit of a palm that has been sold belongs to the vendor or to the purchaser according to agreement. If no stipulation has been made, the fruit belongs to the purchaser if it has not been fertilised by the vendor, but otherwise to the latter. As to trees that bear fruit but no flowers, such as the fig and vine, the fruit belongs to the vendor if it has already appeared at the time of sale, otherwise to the purchaser. But in the case of fruit that grows out from flowers that then fall off, as with apples and apricots, it belongs to the purchaser if not yet formed, †and also even if formed, if the flower has not yet fallen. If the bargain is concluded later than this, the fruit belongs to the vendor.

When one sells “ the palm trees of a garden that have already produced spathes of which some are fertilised,” all the fruit is the vendor's, unless the purchaser has made a special stipulation reserving for himself the spathes not fertilised. †If, on the contrary, it is a question of the palm-trees, not of a single garden, but of two distinct gardens, of which only one has fertilised palms, then each must be separately considered. If the fruit remains the vendor's, he is obliged to gather it at once, if such is the agreement ; but otherwise he may leave it on the trees until the proper season for plucking it. Both contracting parties have a right to water the ground when necessary if it is profitable for the tree or the fruit, and neither may place any hindrance in the way of this being done ; but if the watering is harmful to the tree or the fruit, it can only be done by mutual consent. If watering is harmful to the tree only, but not to the fruit, or vice versâ, the contract should be cancelled if the two parties cannot agree about it, unless the injured party is willing to enter into an arrangement. Some jurists maintain, however, there is always a right of watering under any circumstances. The purchaser can compel the vendor to gather the fruit, or water the tree, if the tree only has been sold and the fruit absorb the sap.

SECTION 2

The fruit of a tree may be sold as soon as it has begun to ripen, either without expressing any condition, or on condition that it be gathered, or on condition that it remain some time longer on the tree. On the other hand, it cannot be sold apart from the tree until it has begun to ripen, unless it is stipulated that it must be gathered immediately, and the fruit so gathered prematurely is of some use. For example this is not the case with pears. Some authorities, however, maintain the validity of a sale of ripening fruit, unreservedly, if the purchaser is already the owner of the tree. [If, in such a case, the vendor has stipulated that the fruit must be plucked immediately, the purchaser is not obliged to carry out the obligation.]

A combined sale of fruit and tree is lawful, without the addition of any special agreement ; but a stipulation that the fruit must be plucked at once is in this case inadmissible. The law forbids a sale of green standing grain, unless it is stipulated that it be at once plucked out or reaped ; but the sale of grain, whether with the ground, or after ripening, is permitted unreservedly.

For the validity of a sale of ripening grain or fruit the law requires that the true subject of the bargain can be seen, i.e. that one can see the fig, the grape, or the barley. Products of the soil having hidden grains, such as corn in the ear or lentil seeds in their pods, cannot be sold without these envelopes. Shafii even advocated, in his second period, the prohibition of a sale with the envelopes. This prohibition, however, does not relate to products of the soil whose envelope is only removed at the moment of eating ; nor to those with two envelopes, such as nuts, almonds, and beans, which may lawfully be sold in their inner, but not in their outer, envelope. A single authority maintains, however, that a sale in the outer envelope is legal, if the products be not yet dry.

The first sign of maturity in fruit that does not change colour is the fact of its being seen from the outside to attain its full development, and of having acquired its agreeable taste ; and an appearance of red and black in fruit that changes. It is enough that a part of the fruit, however small, arrives at maturity, to render lawful the unconditional sale of that fruit. If the fruit of one or more gardens is sold, in some of which only maturity has begun, the rule given in the second part of the preceding section with regard to fertilisation must be observed.

A person who sells fruit beginning to ripen should, although remaining owner of the tree, continue to water it, as well before as after the transfer of the fruit to the purchaser, until the gathering. However, after the transfer of the fruit to the purchaser, the latter has the right to dispose of them ; and it is he upon whom the loss falls, in case of frost or other similar occurrence. This at least is the opinion entertained by Shafii during his Egyptian period. If the fruit deteriorates because the vendor neglects to water the tree, the purchaser has even the right to cancel the contract ; but in the case of fruit sold before the appearance of signs of maturity, under the express condition that the purchaser shall gather it immediately, any loss from deterioration caused by insufficient watering by the vendor falls, according to the best doctrine, upon the purchaser, if the latter delays the gathering agreed upon.

In general, the law does not permit a sale of fruit, even mature, in the case of a tree or plant that does not ordinarily yield its fruit all at one time, but at different intervals, so that new fruit appears on the same tree or plant along with that already grown, as e.g. in the case of figs, or of cucumbers. The validity of such a sale is admitted only—

1. On condition that the purchaser must immediately gather the fruit sold him.

2. In a case where the peculiarity exists only for a few scattered fruits. *But the purchaser always has a right of cancellation, †unless the vendor allows him to take the new fruit as well.

It is forbidden to barter—

1. Corn in the ear for husked corn ; an exchange called mohakala.

2. Dates on the tree for dry dates ; an exchange called mozabana.

On the other hand, as an indulgence, the law allows the contract called araya, i.e. the barter of dates on the tree for dry dates placed at the foot of it ; or the exchange of grapes on the vine for raisins ; provided in both cases that the amount is less than five wask. If the quantity be greater than this, the law admits the validity of such an exchange only if it takes place by two or more different transactions. The contract of araya necessitates an immediate taking possession by each party, i.e. the measuring and delivery of the dry dates on the one hand, and on the other the transfer of those on the tree. *An exchange of this kind cannot be effected with regard to any other fruit, except dates and grapes. Some authors maintain that only persons with insufficient money to buy green dates can have recourse to this form of contract ; but this is not so.

CHAPTER VIII.—DISPUTES BETWEEN VENDOR AND PURCHASER

WHERE the two contracting parties are agreed upon the validity of a sale ; but not upon its details, as e.g. the amount or nature of the price, stipulation of a time within which payment should be made, or the quantity of the goods sold ; and if neither party is able to prove his case, they should both take an oath as to the falsehood of what is alleged by the adverse party, and the truth of their own statements. The vendor is the first to be sworn ; though, according to one jurist, it is the purchaser ; and another thinks that they have an equal right to the priority. According to this last authority the court should decide according to circumstances who should have the priority. And some authorities maintain that the priority should be decided by casting lots. *A single oath, combining a denial and an affirmation, is sufficient on the part of each, but the denial must always be pronounced first. Thus one should say, "I did not sell for this sum, but I sold for that."

††When the oath has been taken by both parties, the contract is not considered as being immediately dissolved. The court should first endeavour to persuade the parties to a reconciliation. If this is unsuccessful, then each of the parties has a right to cancel the contract, or, if necessary, the court decrees its dissolution. Some maintain that cancellation must always be decreed by the court. Upon cancellation, however effected, the purchaser must return the thing bought ; or its value, if he has already disposed of it either by conversion into immoveable property or by enfranchisement or by sale, just as if it had been accidentally destroyed. *The value of an article is that it had on the day it was lost. In case of accidental deterioration, but not total loss, the purchaser must all the same return the article to the vendor, and indemnify him for the loss in its value.

Disputes between the heirs of the contracting parties are regulated by the same principles as disputes between the parties themselves.

If a dispute has arisen, not about the details, but about the very nature of a contract ; as, for example, when one of the parties asserts, " I sold you the article for so much," and the other replies, " No, you gave it me ;" no affirmative oath is then necessary, and each party need only swear that he denies his opponent's assertion. After this, the one who has received the donation must return the article received, together with any increase or profit he may have derived from it. †If one of the parties maintains and the other denies the legality of a sale, the presumption is in favour of the former, if he confirms his statement on oath. If, after a cancellation of a contract in the manner referred to, the purchaser brings to the vendor a slave with redhibitory defects as the one he purchased and the vendor asserts that it was another that he sold and delivered, the law admits a presumption in favour of this latter statement. †Similarly, in the contract of salam, it is the creditor who enjoys this advantage.

CHAPTER IX.—SLAVES

†A SLAVE who has not been designated by his master to carry on commercial transactions, can buy nothing without first obtaining his master's authorisation. Consequently a person who has sold anything to such a slave without the necessary authorisation, can claim back the goods, not only if they are in the slave's possession but also if the master has them. If the goods are accidentally lost while in possession of the slave, the latter is personally responsible for the payment of the price, even after his enfranchisement ; but if they are so lost while in the master's possession, the vendor can claim payment either from the latter, or from the slave after his enfranchisement. A debt contracted by a slave is subject to the same rules as a purchase made by him.

A slave authorised to transact business in general can enter into any engagement up to the value of the things entrusted to him ; but if the authorisation extends only to specified acts, he may not pass the limits prescribed. Even a slave authorised unconditionally may not of his own initiative conclude a marriage, nor engage his own services, nor authorise a slave of his own, nor give away for nothing the things entrusted to him, nor enter into commercial relations with his master. Desertion does not necessarily cancel an authorisation : for this the master's withdrawal is required. On the other hand, a slave is not regarded as having been authorised, merely because his master has not objected to his transactions. The law insists upon a formal declaration on the part of the master. An affirmation of an authorised slave, with regard to his commercial undertakings, is admissible in a court of law.

A person who knows that a certain individual is a slave should not enter into commercial relations with him, until he has ascertained if he has been duly authorised. This can be done either by asking the master, or by requiring the slave to furnish proof of the position he claims, or by learning the matter from public notoriety. This public notoriety, however, is a controverted point. In any case an oral affirmation by the slave to the effect that he has been authorised is insufficient.

When an authorised slave has received the price of an article he has sold and it is accidentally lost while in his possession, the purchaser can, in case of a legal seizure of the article, cite as guarantor either the slave or his master. Some authorities, however, maintain the contrary opinion so far as regards the master ; others consider that the citation of the master is inadmissible unless the slave's goods have been seized. The same divergence of opinion exists upon the subject of the master's responsibility for the payment of the price, in case of seizure of an object bought by an authorised slave. In general the slave himself cannot be seized for a debt of a commercial nature ; nor can payment be exacted from the master ; but things supplied by the latter alone constitute the joint security of the creditors, as well as profits realised by the slave in other ways, as by hunting, etc. Everything that a slave, even if authorised, acquires, belongs ipso facto to his master ; he can acquire nothing for himself, even if his master wished personally to transfer to him a right of ownership.

BOOK 10.—SALE BY ADVANCE

SECTION 1

THE salam or advance is a sale of goods that have not been seen, but are specified in the contract. Besides the conditions necessary for an ordinary sale, there are required for the legality of a salam the following additional conditions :—

1. The payment of the value advanced must take place on the spot. It is permissible to promise an advance at first in vague terms, provided it is afterwards specified with precision, and paid upon the spot ; but it is not permissible to transfer, as an advance, a debt due from a third person, even if the latter pays immediately. There is no objection to the person who receives the advance touching it and depositing it with the person who made it. It need not consist of coin ; and may even consist of the use of some object, but possession must still be taken on the spot. In the case of dissolution of contract of salam, what has been advanced may be reclaimed, where it is some particular object still existing, though a few jurists maintain that the advance may then be replaced by other things of value. This faculty, however, is limited in their opinion, to cases where the objects advanced were not specified in the contract, but afterwards, though upon the same occasion. *Inspection of what is given by way of advance suffices to ascertain the quantity.

2. The goods upon which the advance has been given must be regarded as a debt due by the person receiving their value in advance. Consequently, if one says, e.g. “ I advance you this piece of cloth for this slave here,” there is neither a salam nor an ordinary sale. But if one says, “ I buy from you a piece of cloth of such and such a description, for these pieces of money,” to which the other party replies, “ I sell you the piece of cloth,” it is an ordinary sale, or according to others, a contract of salam, that has been concluded.

3. According to our school the place of delivery must be indicated ; at any rate if the salam is effected in a place which is either unsuitable for it, or would necessitate much expense in transport. Otherwise no stipulation as to place of delivery is required. Delivery of the goods can be effected either at once or within a given time ; but if no time is agreed upon, it should be done at once. Others maintain that an omission to stipulate a time of delivery nullifies the salam. In all cases, if the delivery is not effected at once, a time must be determined on, either according to the months of the Arabs, or according to those of the Persians or Greeks. A mere enumeration of a certain number of months, not mentioning any particular calendar, is held to refer to the lunar year. In case of an agreement concluded in the middle of a month, its remaining days are taken into account ; so that, for example, a term “ of one month ” expires thirty days later. †The time may also be indicated by saying “ at the festival ” or “ at the month of Jumada.”

The conditions permitting one legally to receive an advance on goods are four—

1. The goods should be of a nature to admit of their delivery at the term stipulated. Consequently an advance may be received for goods coming from another place only when they are regularly brought for sale to the place of delivery ; otherwise such a course would be inadmissible. When an advance has been given on produce to be found everywhere, but which happens to be unprocurable at the moment stipulated for delivery, *the contract is not necessarily cancelled, but the creditor can at his choice either claim its cancellation, or have patience and wait until the things arrive. †A creditor never has any right to cancel the contract before the expiry of the term fixed, even though he may know for certain that the goods cannot be delivered him within the time agreed.

2. There must be a precise specification of the amount, either by measure of capacity, or by weight, or by number, or by measure of length, except as follows :—Produce ordinarily sold by capacity, may be specified by weight, or vice versa ; but the quantity may not be specified in two ways. Thus one may not stipulate for one hundred saas of corn to weigh so many pounds. Melons, tomatoes, cucumbers, quinces, and pomegranates are estimated only by weight ; while nuts and almonds are calculated either by weight, †or, when the sizes vary very little, by measure. Bricks are sold by number, or weight, but not by measure. In the latter case the contract is invalid, unless it is the local custom, †when it becomes a regular sale. An advance cannot be given upon a certain quantity of fruit from some village specially mentioned ; †but this may be done in the case of a large village which is sure to have a sufficient supply at the due date.

3. The quality must be known, or at least those essential qualities on which depends the object of the purchase. They must be mentioned in the contract, without, however, making an enumeration so meticulous as to cause great difficulty in finding goods to correspond to the description. Consequently a salam is forbidden with respect to articles with which this is impossible. Such is the case, for example, with a combination of qualities, each with a particular object, as in the eatable known as harisa, the medicine majun, the perfume called ghaliya, shoes, or a compound antidote. †On the other hand a salam is lawful in the case of goods which, though composite have a single particular object. Instances of these are the materials known as attaba and khazz, cheese, akit, honey, date vinegar and grapes ; †but not bread, at least according to most jurists.

4. The things should not be difficult to obtain, by their very nature—like game, in places where it is rare—nor of a quality rarely met with, though of an article itself not at all rare, such as pearls of an enormous size, precious stones of a certain shade of colour, a slave with her sister or child, etc.

Domestic animals, and slaves, can be dealt with in a contract of salam. In the case of slaves their nationality should be specified, as, e.g. “a Turkish slave”; or their colour, stipulating, for example, “a white slave,” and mentioning whether he should have a tawny or a ruddy complexion. Besides this, when dealing in slaves, sex, age, and approximate height should be indicated ; but it is not necessary to specify whether a slave has brown eyelashes, or is fat, etc. In the case of camels, horses, mules and donkeys, sex, age, colour and species are mentioned ; in the case of birds, species and size of the body ; in the case of meat it must be stated if it is beef, mutton or goat, and if it is a castrated animal, or one with milk, or one for fattening. It should also be mentioned if the meat comes from the leg, shoulder, or rib. Bones must be accepted in customary proportion with meat.

As to cloth, its nature, length and breadth must be mentioned, and the quality of the stuff determined, whether it is coarse or fine, hard or soft, rough or delicate. Unless otherwise agreed upon the material is assumed to be unbleached. An advance may be given on washed cloth, and on material of which the threads have been dyed before weaving, as is the case with striped cloth. By analogy the validity of an advance on cloth dyed after weaving may also be admitted. [†Most authorities deny the legality of an advance upon this material.]

fruit should be mentioned, and whether they are old or fresh. Wheat, barley, and other cereals, and beans, are subject to the same rule as dates. The things necessary to be known when stipulating about honey are—whether it is from the mountains or the town, summer or autumn honey, white or yellow ; but it matters little whether it is old or fresh. It is forbidden to give an advance upon what has been cooked or roasted, but there is no objection to doing so upon goods heated by the sun. *An advance is also illegal upon the heads of slaughtered animals, and upon things having individuality, such as worked pots, skins of animals, earthen jars, saucers, bottles, lanterns, kettles ; but it is lawful when given, e.g. upon the small square vessels called satal, or on pots or saucers, etc., of metal cast in a mould—upon things, in a word, that are made in the mass and resemble one another. †It is not necessary to mention whether the things are good or bad, for even if nothing is said about it one is assumed to have promised that they are in good condition. Both the contracting parties must be aware of the quality of the goods ; and a third person should also be aware of it, in order that they may appeal to his decision in case of disagreement.

SECTION 3

The substitution, for the thing stipulated, of another different in nature or kind, is totally prohibited. Some jurists, however, maintain the legality of a substitution, provided the difference is only in kind ; but they admit that the other party is not obliged to accept anything but what was agreed on. It is even permissible to offer, but never obligatory to accept, an inferior quality to that stipulated. †The person who has given the advance cannot refuse to accept produce of the same kind as, but of a superior quality to, that promised him.

If the debtor brings the goods before the time agreed upon, the creditor may refuse to accept, if he has a valid reason for so doing, e.g. if it is an animal he will have to feed, or if a hostile incursion is apprehended at the moment ; but otherwise he cannot refuse, especially if the debtor has good ground for anticipating delivery, e.g. if he wishes to redeem a pledge, *or even if he merely wants to discharge his obligation.

If, after expiry of the term agreed upon, a creditor meets his debtor elsewhere than at the place stipulated, he cannot prevent the latter fulfilling his engagement upon the spot, if the transport of the goods would involve some expense ; ††nor can he in such a case recover the value of the goods for breach of contract. But the creditor may refuse to accept the things, if the place of meeting is not a safe one. †In all other cases the creditor is bound to accept the goods, even though the place be not that agreed upon.

SECTION 4

A loan is a meritorious act on the part of the creditor, and is effected by the following words :—" I lend you this," " I advance you this," " Take this and give me something similar in exchange," or, " I make you owner of it, till you pay me an equal sum." The law requires for the validity of this agreement †that the offer should be accepted, and that the lender should be capable of disposing of his property freely. Anything that can be made subject to a contract of salam can be lent, *with the single exception of a female slave, with whom the lender can lawfully have intercourse. †On the other hand what cannot be made the subject of a contract of salam, cannot be lent. If the things lent are measurable, an equal quantity of similar things must be returned ; but if the things lent are not measurable, then things resembling them must be returned ; or, according to some jurists, the value of these. If the lender meets the borrower at a place other than that where the contract was made and asks the return of the loan, his demand is admissible ; but if the transport of the object borrowed would cause expense, he can claim only its value at the place of agreement.

The lender may not stipulate for a return of produce of a better quality than that lent ; nor for interest of any sort or kind ; and if the borrower adds anything extra, when returning what was borrowed, it is pure generosity on his part. A stipulation that produce of an inferior quality to that lent shall be returned, and a stipulation that the borrower shall in his turn lend something to the lender, are void ; †but the contract remains otherwise valid. It is the same with the stipulation of a term of payment, if entirely in favour of the debtor ; †but if it is in the creditor's favour, for example, if the loan is made at a moment when a town is about to be sacked, and payment is to be made when quiet has returned, then the stipulation is equivalent to a return of produce of better quality, and consequently the contract itself is void. A creditor may legally stipulate for a pledge or personal security for the return of the loan.

Ownership of things lent is transferred only by taking possession ; or, according to one authority by a disposal on the part of the borrower, †though this does not prevent the lender being able to claim their return, as long as they are still undisposed of in the borrower's possession.

BOOK 11.—PLEDGE OR SECURITY

SECTION 1

SECURITY cannot be legally given except by mutual consent of the parties interested, i.e. by offer and acceptance. There may be added a stipulation, of the very essence of the contract, to the effect that the creditor shall have a right of preference on the sale of the thing pledged ; or a stipulation tending to strengthen the contract, as, e.g. that it should be concluded in the presence of witness ; or even a stipulation without any reasonable object. But a stipulation that would prevent the creditor exercising his right would nullify the contract. A stipulation profiting the creditor to the detriment of the debtor, e.g. allowing the former exclusive and unlimited use of the article, is null, *and consequently nullifies the contract. *A stipulation that all increase in the thing shall remain pledged with him is unlawful, and causes the illegality, but not the nullity of the contract. The contracting parties must have the free disposition of their property ; consequently the goods of a minor or a lunatic cannot be given in security by the guardian or curator, except in case of absolute necessity or obvious advantage. It is only on the same condition that a guardian or curator may stipulate a pledging of property in order to secure the payment of debts due to the persons in their charge, for under ordinary circumstances these debts should be recovered as soon as possible.

†The thing given as security should be something definite and precise. An undivided share in something owned in common by several persons may be given in security ; or even a slave without her child, or, vice versâ, the child without its mother, although in these cases a sale would be unlawful, and consequently in case of an execution sale mother and child must be put up to auction together. In this latter case the proceeds are divided between creditor and debtor in proportion to the value of the mother and of the child. First the mother alone is put up to auction, and then both together ; the difference gives the value of the child. The pledging of a slave guilty of a crime, or of an apostate slave, is subject to the same rules as their sale. The pledging of a slave to be enfranchised under the provisions of a will, and that of a slave whose enfranchisement may become obligatory before the satisfaction of the debt, are void, according to our school.

In the case of pledging of things liable to rapid deterioration that may be preserved in a dry state, like dates, drying must be resorted to. If this is impossible, giving such produce in security is only lawful in the case of a debt due immediately, or due before deterioration is likely to commence. Otherwise the contract may be effected only on the express condition that the thing shall be sold and the proceeds of the sale remain pledged ; and even then the sale may only take place at the moment it is feared deterioration will begin. The proceeds thus remain pledged, instead of the thing itself. A stipulation tending to exclude the right to sell under these circumstances nullifies the security, in the same way as an omission to stipulate with regard to the sale and the price, at least when it is known that deterioration will occur before the due date. *If this fact is not known, the absence of such a clause does not invalidate the contract. If something has been pledged which, though not naturally liable to rapid deterioration, is accidentally exposed to such an occurrence, as for instance wheat that has become damp, the security remains valid, in spite of the accident.

It is lawful to borrow a thing in order to pledge it, a proceeding which one authority regards as coming under the same rules as a gratuitous loan, *but most consider as a real security. In any case one must mention the nature, amount, and details of the bond and of the other sureties ; and if the thing lent is accidentally lost when in the creditor's possession he is not liable for it. The owner of an article borrowed in this way cannot claim to have it back once it is in the creditor's possession. On the expiry of the term allowed for payment, or, if the contract admits of it, at once, the owner must, on the creditor's demand, sell the article lent, if the debtor has not yet paid. The owner of the article can then, of course, seize the debtor's goods and recover the amount of the sale.

Security may be given only for a definite, obligatory debt. Consequently it is not permitted to a person who desires in that way to secure the execution of some real obligation, such as the restitution of some object unlawfully usurped or borrowed ; or to secure some future debt, such as the repayment of a sum of money he intends to lend some one. Security is given in the following words :—" I lend you these pieces of money, provided you pledge me your slave." To this offer the answer is, " I accept the loan, and grant you the security asked for." Or the offer may be made thus, " I sell you this article for so much, provided the coat is pledged to me," and the answer, "I buy the article, and grant you the security asked for." One may not secure by a pledge the periodical payments resulting from an enfranchisement by contract, nor the price stipulated for contract work before it is finished, or, according to others before it is begun, because these are not as yet definite and obligatory debts. On the other hand, security may lawfully be given for the payment of the price of a thing sold during the period of the right of option. The payment of a debt may be secured by two pledges even when successive; but according to the doctrine adopted by Shafii in Egypt, one may not pledge with a creditor an article already pledged him for another debt.

The security becomes irrevocable only when the creditor has taken possession of the object pledged. Possession may, however, be taken by the creditor's agent. The creditor may not appoint the debtor or his slave as his agent for this purpose. Authorities are not agreed as to whether he may so appoint the debtor's generally authorised slave; but he may certainly appoint the slave undergoing gradual enfranchisement. The pledging of an article already in possession of the creditor, either as deposit or because illegally usurped, becomes irrevocable only from the moment when he could have taken possession of it, if he had not had it already. *And in such a case the law requires that the debtor should declare that the change in the nature of the possession has taken place with his full consent. Subsequent pledging can never relieve a creditor from the consequences of any usurpation of which he may have been guilty; but he is freed from them ipso facto if the owner entrusts the article to his care as a deposit. The security is ipso facto revoked if the debtor disposes of the thing pledged, before the creditor has taken possession, in a way which causes him to lose the ownership of it, e.g. if he gives it away, or pledges it to some one else, provided it is effectively taken possession of. The same consequence is recognised by law if, before possession has been taken, the debtor begins the contractual enfranchisement of his slave, *or provides for his freedom in his will, or if a female slave is rendered pregnant by him; but not if he merely cohabits with her, or gives her in marriage to some one else. †Neither is security nullified by death, nor by lunacy, of one of the contracting parties, before possession has been taken; nor by a liquid that has been pledged becoming fermented; nor by the flight of a pledged slave.

After the creditor has taken possession, the debtor can no longer dispose of the pledged object, so as to lose the ownership of it. As to the validity of an enfranchisement authorities are not agreed. *As a rule it is considered valid in the case of a solvent debtor, who should in that case pledge the value of the slave at the moment of enfranchisement. But if the debtor is insolvent, and consequently unable to execute the intended enfranchisement †the slave is not thereby freed, even though afterwards redeemed. The pledging of a slave who is to be enfranchised at a certain date, or who has been conditionally enfranchised is lawful ; and the expiry of the term, or the fulfilling of the condition, before the due date of the security, has the same effect as a simple and voluntary enfranchisement. If the term does not expire, or the condition is not fulfilled, until after that date, ††the enfranchisement takes place ipso facto, whether the master is solvent or not.

After the creditor has taken possession, the debtor can no longer—

1. Pledge the thing to another person.
2. Give a pledged female slave in marriage.
3. Lend the thing pledged ; at least where the debt is due at once, or at a term expiring before the loan.

4. Cohabit with a pledged female slave. A contravention of this precept involves the consequence that a child born of this cohabitation is considered free. Upon the question whether the mother becomes free by this maternity there is the same difference of opinion as with regard to the simple, voluntary enfranchisement of a pledged slave. †But it is agreed that in these circumstances a female slave is ipso facto enfranchised by reason of her maternity, upon the expiry of the due date of the security, even if the debtor is insolvent ; and that the latter is bound to pledge the value of the slave, if she dies in childbirth.

A debtor remains owner of a pledged article, and can make what use of it he likes, provided he does not diminish its value. He may ride a pledged beast, or live in a house he has given in security. On the other hand, he may not build on or cultivate pledged land ; but if he has already done these unlawful acts, he is not obliged to root up what has been planted, or take down the buildings either before or after the debt has become due, unless in the latter case the value of the ground with the plantations or constructions on it is insufficient to pay the debt, and the value of the land will be increased by their removal. When it is possible for the debtor to use the thing pledged, without its being actually in his charge, it should remain in the creditor's possession ; but if this is impossible it should be intrusted into the charge of the debtor, if he demands it, to be held on sufferance. The creditor has the right to have this restitution effected before witnesses, if he has reason to doubt the debtor's honesty.

A creditor may always allow a debtor to dispose of a pledged article, even in a manner not otherwise permitted by law ; but this authorisation may be revoked at any time before the debtor has made use of it. If under these circumstances a debtor has disposed of a pledged article, not knowing that the authorisation has been revoked, he is in the same position as an agent who has acted in ignorance of the revocation of his appointment. But a creditor cannot give a debtor permission to sell a pledged article before the debt is due, whether this is done in order so to obtain an earlier payment, or on the understanding that the proceeds will be pledged instead of the article itself.

SECTION 3

When the security has become irrevocable by possession having been taken, the creditor has a right to keep the article pledged, without prejudice to what has been said in the preceding section, as to the use which the debtor can make of it. The parties may if they like agree to intrust the article to the care of a third person of irreproachable character ; or to two such persons, at the same time stipulating for a joint or separate performance of their duties by the depositaries. †If nothing has been stipulated with regard to this, neither can do anything in the matter alone. If a depositary is dead, or has ceased, by notorious misconduct, to be worthy of confidence, the contracting parties can deposit the article where they please ; or if they cannot agree about it, the court may order its sequestration.

A creditor may insist on the sale of a pledged article if the debt has not been paid by the due date ; and he is entitled to payment out of the proceeds, in preference to any other person. The sale is effected by the debtor or his agent, but never without the creditor's previous authorisation. If the creditor refuses the required authorisation the court will notify him that in default of his authorisation the debtor will be released from his obligation. When, on the other hand, it is the creditor who claims either the payment of the debt or the sale of the article, and the debtor refuses, the court will order the latter to fulfil his obligation or sell the article, and if he persists in his refusal after this order, the court may itself proceed with the sale without the debtor's concurrence. ‡But the creditor can never effect the sale in the absence of the debtor even with his consent. When it has been agreed that the sale shall be effected by a depositary, the latter may if necessary proceed with it without the debtor's concurrence, keeping the proceeds as depositary, i.e. at the debtor's risk, until the creditor has taken possession. In case of a legal seizure of the article pledged and sold in this way by a depositary the purchaser may cite as guarantee either the depositary or the debtor, who is in any case ultimately liable towards the depositary. This citation as guarantee is admissible even if the proceeds of the sale are accidentally lost when in charge of the depositary. A depositary may sell a pledged article only at a reasonable price, and for cash, in locally current coin. If after the sale, but before the expiry of the time of option, another person bids more, the first bargain should be cancelled and the thing sold to the highest bidder.

A debtor must provide for the up-keep of a thing pledged, and a creditor has a right to have this enforced by the court. On the other hand, a creditor may not prevent a debtor from improving or repairing the article ; for example a debtor may have his pledged slave bled ; for the property is his, and he has only intrusted it to the creditor as a deposit.

The loss of a pledged object does not affect the debt ; and as to the responsibility of the creditor, it does not matter whether the security is valid or not, for in any case it is a deposit intrusted to his care.

It is illegal to stipulate that the thing pledged shall be considered as sold to the creditor upon the expiry of the term allowed for payment of the debt. Such stipulation renders illegal both security and sale.

A thing pledged remains on deposit until the due date ; consequently there is a presumption in favour of the creditor's statement on oath in any proceeding against him for loss of the article ; but not, according to most authorities, if it is a question of the restitution of a pledge.

A creditor who intentionally cohabits with a female slave pledged to him, is guilty of the crime of fornication ; and the excuse cannot be admitted by the court that he was ignorant of the prohibition of intercourse with such person, unless he has recently become a Muhammadan, or was brought up in the country far from the society of men acquainted with the law. †He may allege as an excuse that the debtor gave him permission ; and in this special case, though not guilty of fornication, he is liable to the slave for dower, if he forced her to cohabitation, and the child is his, and free from its birth. And, finally, he owes the debtor the value of the child as damage.

When a pledged article is lost by the fault of a third person, and the creditor receives from that person another article in its place, it is regarded as the thing pledged. Any proceeding against the individual in question to oblige him to replace the original pledge, must be taken by the debtor. †If he declines to make good his right in the matter, the creditor can do nothing as against the third person. Similarly, if a pledged slave is assassinated by a third person, the debtor alone can claim an application of the lex talionis ; but the contract of security is cancelled ipso facto. But if, on the other hand, there is only occasion for inflicting a pecuniary penalty, either because the debtor has pardoned his slave's assassin, or because the homicide was not intentional, neither debtor nor creditor can of their own initiative remit the penalty.

The security given does not extend to increase from the thing pledged, if this increase consists of what has individual existence, like the fruit of trees, the young of animals, or the children of slaves. However, if an animal with young or a pregnant slave has been given in security, and the pregnancy continues until the debt falls due, *beast and slave must be sold as they are, with their offspring, if already born. *Where the pregnancy does not occur until after the security has been given, though it may exist at the moment of sale, the mother alone is pledged, and the creditor has no claim to the offspring.

SECTION 4

When a pledged slave commits a crime involving a penalty under the law of talion, the rights of the injured party have the first preference, and the security is cancelled by the capital penalty, or by a legal sale of the slave to recover the price of blood. The capital penalty has the effect of cancelling the security, both if imposed at the instance of the debtor as owner of the slave, or at that of a third party; ††but where the debtor, not a third party, claims, from whatever motive, only a pecuniary penalty, then the security is unaffected, and the slave remains pledged as if nothing had happened. When a slave pledged by his master kills another pledged to the same master, both securities are cancelled by the execution of the criminal; but when there is ground only for a pecuniary penalty, the master of the delinquent can claim this amount in place of the dead slave pledged to him. The culpable slave must then be sold, in spite of the security, and the proceeds remain pledged, by law, with the master in place of the dead slave. According to others, however, a sale is unnecessary, and the slave who has committed the crime, replaces ipso facto the dead slave. If murderer and victim were both of them slaves pledged to the same creditor for a single debt, he must resign himself to this diminution in his security. If the two individuals were pledged for two distinct debts, he may transfer to the remaining slave the debt for which the security has been lost to him, if he has good reason to do so.

A security is cancelled by the accidental loss of the thing pledged. The article itself is released by a renunciation on the part of the creditor, or by the remission of the debt. As a security is indivisible, the article remains pledged as long as the debt is not either remitted or paid in full. On the other hand, when half the share in a slave is pledged for one debt, and the other half for a second debt, a remission of one of them releases the half share. A slave owned jointly by two masters and pledged by them, is proportionately released by a remission granted to one only.

SECTION 5

In all disputes between debtor and creditor about anything pledged, or about the quantity of it, the presumption is in favour of the former's assertion, if substantiated on oath ; provided that it is not a security which the debtor was obliged to effect. For if, e.g. in a sale, one of the parties has stipulated that the other shall pledge him something in order to insure the due execution of the contract, both parties must take an oath. If in any proceeding brought against two persons who together pledged a slave of whom they were joint owners, for a debt of a hundred pieces of money, one admits the fact and the other denies it, the slave is considered to have been pledged only on the part of the owner who admits, i.e. for fifty pieces ; while the other owner has the advantage of a presumption in his favour, provided he substantiates his denial on oath. This presumption, however, like any other, can be legally disproved, and the owner who admits may even be called as a witness to this effect, in order to show the falsity of his partner's assertions.

In any proceeding with regard to the taking possession of the thing pledged, the following distinctions must be observed :—

1. The article is in the debtor's possession ; or it is in the creditor's, but the debtor says he usurped it. In both these cases the law admits a presumption in favour of the debtor, on oath ; †and it is the same if he states that he delivered it to the creditor, but not as a pledge.

2. The debtor, having admitted that the creditor took possession of the article as a pledge, withdraws this admission as being untrue. In this case the debtor may only insist that an oath be administered to the creditor ; though other jurists maintain that he cannot even do this, and that the claim of the creditor should be at once allowed, unless the debtor can give some adequate explanation of his previous admission. Proof on his part that this admission had been based on false documents, would be regarded as a satisfactory explanation.

If one of the two contracting parties alleges that a pledged slave is guilty of a crime, and the other denies it, the presumption is in favour of the latter, on oath. Even if the debtor declares that the crime was committed before possession was taken, *the law still admits a presumption in favour of the creditor's denial on oath. †But in these circumstances the oath of the creditor does not in any way affect the debtor's obligation towards the injured party. This obligation consists, at the debtor's choice, either in the value of the slave or in the indemnity due for the crime, whichever is most advantageous for him. If in such a case the creditor should refuse to be sworn, the court should administer the oath to the injured party, not to the debtor himself ; and after the oath has been taken the slave should be sold for the damage, but not to reimburse the creditor to whom he was pledged. And lastly, if the creditor has consented to the sale of a pledged slave who is guilty of a crime but afterwards asserts that he withdrew his consent before the sale took place, while the debtor alleges he did not do this until after the sale, †the presumption is in favour of the creditor.

When a debtor owes two debts, each of a thousand pieces of money, one only being secured by a pledge, he may declare, when paying one thousand pieces, that he is thereby clearing off the most onerous debt, and the law will presume that this is the truth. If he has omitted to make this declaration at the time of payment, he may do so afterwards ; though some authorities maintain that in this case the security is proportionally distributed.

SECTION 6

At the death of a debtor his debts must be paid, so far as the amount of his assets allow, the latter being regarded as the joint security of the creditors. Only one author maintains that the estate can be seized for debt in the same way as the person of a slave for the pecuniary consequences of a crime committed by him. *The estate is distributed amongst the creditors in proportion to their claims, unless there is some legitimate cause for preference, which is in any case independent of the amount due. †Where the heir has disposed of the estate, without there appearing to be any debt, and a properly authenticated debt is subsequently established, as e.g. by the redhibition of some article sold ; the dispositions made by the inheritor are not ipso facto nullified, but they must be revoked, if there is no other way of paying the debt. It is undisputed that the inheritor can keep the estate and pay the debts from his own means. The obligation to pay the debts so far as the estate will allow, does not in any way affect the rights of the inheritor ; and the profits of the estate, of a separate character, such as those realised from the labour of slaves or from births subsequent to the opening of the succession, belong to the inheritor, and cannot be included when determining the amount seizable for the payment of the debts.

BOOK 12.—BANKRUPTCY, ETC.

CHAPTER I.—BANKRUPTCY

SECTION 1

A PERSON whose debts exceed the value of his property should be declared bankrupt, upon the demand of his creditors, but bankruptcy should never be declared on account of debts not yet due. *A declaration of bankruptcy for debts due does not render other debts not yet due claimable before the due date. If a person's debts are counterbalanced by his property, and he can also gain a livelihood by his labour, there is no ground for a declaration of bankruptcy. †This is so also if he cannot work, and consequently his support is a charge upon his assets. A bankruptcy is not declared on the initiative of the court, but as has been said on the demand of the creditors. If all the creditors do not support the application, the total of the debts due to the petitioning creditors, taken together, should amount to a sum sufficient to authorise the declaration. ‡Proceedings in bankruptcy may also be begun upon the demand of the debtor.

An immediate consequence of bankruptcy is that the debtor becomes ipso facto dispossessed of the administration of his property ; while the court should in the presence of witnesses explain to him the measures taken with regard to the matter, so that he may abstain from any further disposition of his property. Only one jurist maintains that a sale, donation, or enfranchisement made by a bankrupt should remain suspended until it becomes clear whether these dispositions can be maintained without prejudicing the payment of the debts. If this is the case they should be regarded as valid, according to this jurist, but not otherwise. *On the other hand, most authorities maintain the nullity of these arrangements, for the same reason as for all others. †A declared bankrupt cannot transfer his property to his creditors, in order to free himself from his obligations, without the permission of the court ; ‡though there is no objection to his taking an advance on goods he promises to deliver by a certain date, nor to his making a purchase and stipulating for a delay in payment. These future obligations are on his own personal responsibility, and have nothing in common with his property that has been seized. Bankruptcy also leaves intact purely personal rights, such as legal capacity to marry, repudiate or divorce a wife, claim an application of the law of talion, or grant a pardon in accordance with it. An admission made by a bankrupt, concerning a right or obligation that has become effective before the bankruptcy, *binds the creditors ; but they are not obliged to take into consideration an admission regarding obligations that become effective only at a later or indeterminate date, †unless it has reference to a crime. A bankrupt can of his own accord return goods he has just bought, on account of redhibitory defects, if such redhibition profits the estate. †But he is prohibited from dealing with anything he may obtain afterwards ; either by hunting, or by a testamentary disposition, or by purchase—at least when it is admitted that this last contract is not absolutely null when effected by a bankrupt. †The bankruptcy of a purchaser does not give a vendor the right to cancel a bargain, if he has knowingly entered into it ; he cannot even claim the goods back ; otherwise, both cancellation and reclamation are permitted him. †If the law forbids this reclamation on the part of the vendor, neither can he prove as creditor for the amount of the price.

SECTION 2

After the declaration of bankruptcy the court should hasten to sell the bankrupt's property and distribute the proceeds amongst the creditors. First of all are sold things liable to deteriorate, then slaves and domestic animals, then other movable property, and lastly immovable property. The sale takes place in presence of the bankrupt and the creditors, each object being sold at the market where such things are usually sold ; and nothing can be sold except at a reasonable price, payable immediately, in locally current coin. A creditor who has stipulated for some particular article is not obliged to take coin, and if such article is not among the assets it must be purchased to satisfy him. If, on the contrary, the creditor does not insist on the very thing stipulated for, the debt can be paid in coin ; except in the case of a contract of salam, for this contract does not admit of any similar conversion, even by consent of the parties interested. The court, when proceeding to the sale of the bankrupt's property, should never deliver it before receiving the price ; and money coming from the sales and recoveries should be immediately divided amongst the creditors, unless the sums are so small as to make this impossible. In the latter case distribution may be deferred until the amount in hand has been increased by the sale of other objects, or the recovery of other debts due to the estate.

In order to proceed to this distribution, the law does not require that the creditors present must prove that there are no others ; but a creditor who only presents himself after a distribution retains all his rights to his share in what remains of the assets. According to some authorities the previous distribution should in such a case be annulled.

If the bankrupt sold an article before the declaration, and this article is subject to legal seizure by a third party, while the price paid has been already spent, the purchaser can only prove like an ordinary creditor ; but if the article has been sold by the court after the declaration of bankruptcy, a seizure gives the purchaser the right to claim back the price as a privileged creditor. Only one authority maintains that a purchaser can never enjoy this privilege.

The support of persons dependent upon the bankrupt is a charge upon the assets until the distribution is finished, unless the bankrupt is himself capable of supporting them by his labour. †But all the property of the bankrupt must be realised. It is even necessary to sell his house and any slave who may be working as his servant, without any regard to the state of his health or to the rank he occupies in society. All that should be left him is a bundle of clothes sufficient for decency, i.e. a shirt, a pair of trousers, a turban and a pair of slippers ; to which in winter should be added a cloak. There is also exempted from sale the food necessary for the nourishment of the bankrupt and his family until the distribution is over.

After the final distribution the bankrupt need not work or hire out his services as domestic servant or workman, in order to pay what remains of his debts ; †but his creditors may oblige him to put out to service his female slave enfranchised by reason of maternity, and to lease out property realised in her favour. A bankrupt who says he is in a state of absolute insolvency, or who after the distribution of his property declares he has no more at all, must, if this is denied on the part of the creditors, prove the truth of his assertion ; at least this is so in the case of commercial debts, like those arising from a purchase or a loan. †In all other cases the law allows a presumption in his favour, provided he substantiates his declaration on oath. Proof of absolute insolvency can be furnished at any time ; but the witnesses called to establish it must have an accurate knowledge of the private life of the bankrupt. They must declare positively and expressly that the bankrupt is "absolutely insolvent." A merely negative deposition, e.g. that the bankrupt "possesses nothing," is not enough. When the bankrupt's insolvency is established in this way the creditors have no right to demand bodily restraint, nor that the bankrupt be adjudged personally as a pledge ; they must wait until he has collected sufficient money to pay his debts. In the case of a stranger whose financial position is accurately known to nobody, and who consequently cannot prove his "absolute insolvency," the court should appoint some one to examine the state of his affairs, and this expert should then appear as a witness if he thinks the evidence of absolute insolvency to be conclusive.

SECTION 3

A vendor can, in case of bankruptcy, break the contract and claim back goods the price of which has not yet been paid him. †This right must be exercised without delay, for the reclamation is not admissible as soon as the bankrupt has disposed of the thing bought, either by cohabitation in the case of a female slave, or by enfranchisement, or by sale. This right of reclamation is not confined to a sale properly so called, but extends to all contracts involving the transfer of property for an equivalent. It is, however, admitted only under the three following conditions :—

1. That the time for payment has fallen due.

2. That payment cannot be obtained on account of the bankruptcy ; †for there is no ground of reclamation where the bankrupt's property is sufficient to meet all his engagements, but he nevertheless refuses to pay ; or where payment cannot be obtained because the debtor, though solvent, has absconded. On the other hand, the vendor may not be deprived of his right to cancellation and reclamation if the creditors wish to keep the goods at the price agreed upon between him and the bankrupt.

3. That the bankrupt purchaser is still the owner of the property ; for there is no right of reclamation if he is no longer its owner, or if he has entered into a contract of enfranchisement with a purchased slave. On the other hand, the right of reclamation is not affected by the fact that a bankrupt has given in marriage a purchased slave.

If the goods have been accidentally damaged, the vendor has the choice of either taking it back as it is, or claiming, for the payment of the price, his share of the assets, like any other creditor. If the deterioration in value is due to him or to a third person, he may choose between the property as it is, or a claim as ordinary creditor for the amount agreed upon, minus the deterioration. †Deterioration due to the bankrupt purchaser is regarded as accidental, so far as reclamation is concerned.

In the case of a sale of two slaves, one of whom dies after the purchaser has taken possession, and the purchaser then goes bankrupt, the slave still living may be claimed back, and for the dead slave the vendor may claim his share in the assets as an ordinary creditor. According to the opinion of Shafii in his second period, the right of reclamation in this case is not invalidated by the fact that a part of the price has already been paid to the vendor. So that if the two slaves were of the same value, and the vendor has already received half the total price agreed, he may still claim back the living slave for the amount still due. Only one jurist maintains that he must in such a case keep the part payment already received, and claim his share of the assets, for the other half, as an ordinary creditor.

When the property has undergone an increase inseparable from it, as in the case of an animal that has become fat, or a slave that has learnt a trade, the vendor profits by its reclamation; but when the increase has an individual existence, like the fruit of trees or the young of animals, the purchaser keeps it, and the vendor can reclaim only the original thing and nothing more. In the case of a slave's child, an increase separable by nature but not by law, the vendor may claim it along with the mother, on paying its price; or if this is not convenient, both must be sold, and the price fetched by the mother paid to the vendor. According to others, however, reclamation is altogether inadmissible in such a case. If a slave is pregnant at the time of reclamation, but not at the time of sale, or vice versa, †the vendor's right extends both to mother and child. The fruit of the date palm hidden in its envelope, or that already formed by means of fecundation is subject to nearly the same rule as the embryo hidden in its mother's womb and the child just born, i.e. it is better to include it in the reclamation. In the matter of the reclamation of a piece of ground which has been sown or built upon by the bankrupt, he, the vendor and the creditors may by common agreement proceed to pluck up the shoots or remove the buildings if they think fit. The ground is then returned to the vendor in its primitive condition. But if the creditors or the bankrupt object to this uprooting or removal, the vendor has no right to enforce it, but must receive back the land with the crops or buildings on it. Thus he only has a choice between two courses: either to appropriate crops and buildings on paying their value, or to uproot or remove them at his own risk, and deliver them to the bankrupt, plus damage, if any. *In no case can the vendor claim back the land, even if he abandons to the bankrupt crops and buildings.

If the property consists, for example, of corn that the bankrupt has mixed with other corn of the same or an inferior quality, the vendor can claim back the same quantity of the mixture; *but if on the contrary the bankrupt has added corn of a better quality, reclamation is inadmissible. Corn ground by the bankrupt, or a coat cleaned by him, without in either case any increase in value, are subject to reclamation, and the vendor need pay nothing extra for the work done. *But if the value is increased, the corn or the coat should be sold, and a part of the price proportionate to the increase in value should be returned to the bankrupt.

Where the bankrupt has stained the cloth purchased in some dye belonging to him the three following cases are to be distinguished :—

1. The value of the cloth is increased by exactly the value of the dye. In this case the bankrupt becomes part owner of the cloth, for the amount of the value of the dye.

2. The increase in value is less than the price of the dye. In this case the bankrupt cannot profit by more than the increase in value of the cloth.

3. The increase in value is greater than the price of the dye sold by itself. †In this case the bankrupt takes the whole of the increase.

Where the bankrupt has purchased from one and the same person both cloth and dye, the vendor reclaims simply both, unless the value of the cloth, after manipulation, exceeds the value it had previously. In this latter case reclamation is impossible, and the vendor can claim his share in the distribution of the bankrupt's effects, like any other creditor.

Where cloth and dye have been purchased from two different persons, the law admits three distinctions—

1. The value of the dyed cloth does not exceed the previous value when undyed. In this case the vendor of the dye loses his right of reclamation.

2. The value of the dyed cloth exactly equals the sum of the values of cloth and dye. In this case the two vendors should jointly reclaim the cloth, and become co-proprietors of it.

3. The value of the dyed cloth is greater than the sum of the values of cloth and dye. †In this case the bankrupt takes the whole of the increase in value.

CHAPTER II.—INCAPACITY OF LUNATICS, MINORS, AND SPENDTHRIFTS

SECTION 1

The incapacity of a bankrupt in relation to his creditors ; that of a debtor with regard to an article pledged by him ; that of a sick person who may not deprive his legitimate heirs, by testamentary disposition, of more than a third of his property ; that of a slave whose property belongs to his master ; and that of an apostate, whose goods are confiscated for the benefit of Moslems ; all these will be found treated of in those parts of my work dealing with these special classes of individuals. Here it remains for me to speak of the incapacity of lunatics, minors, and spendthrifts.

A person in a state of lunacy is incapable of administering his property, and not responsible for what he says. His incapacity ceases with its cause. The incapacity of a minor ceases at puberty only if his intelligence is then sufficiently developed to allow of his being intrusted with the administration of his property. The age of puberty is fixed by law for both sexes at fifteen years completed, unless in the case of a boy nocturnal pollutions have already manifested themselves. But whatever may be the physical development of the body, a child is never considered to have reached puberty before the age of nine. When the hairs of the pubis begin to grow it is a sign of puberty in the case of an infidel child †but not in that of a Moslem. As to girls, menstrues and pregnancy are also signs of puberty.

The intelligence of a minor is considered to be sufficiently developed for him to manage his property, under the following circumstances :—

1. When he is able to perform his religious duties properly.
2. When he behaves himself reasonably in his affairs.

3. When he abstains from everything incompatible with an irreproachable character.

4. When he is not a spendthrift ; i.e. he does not waste his substance by allowing himself to be deceived in commerce by obvious frauds, by throwing his money into the sea, or by ruining himself in illicit pleasures. †On the other hand, prodigality does not include expenditure on charity or good works, nor even exorbitant expense on the table or the toilet.

The degree of intelligence of a minor should be estimated in different ways, according to the different categories of persons. Thus the son of a merchant should be examined with regard to purchase and sale or his aptitude at a bargain ; the son of a farmer should undergo inquiry as to his knowledge of cultivation and the proper employment of labour for that purpose ; and the son of an artisan should give proof that he understands his trade ; while a girl should show herself apt in all that has to do with spinning and cotton and the best way of protecting food from the cat, etc. This examination should be undergone at least twice ; according to some before the minor has reached the age of puberty, and according to others after. †Some insist upon a previous examination, maintaining that engagements entered into by a minor before puberty are invalid. †But according to these authors, the pupil should be given, before his majority, an opportunity to prove the development of his intelligence, for example, by making a bargain ; though the guardian and not the pupil is the person who must actually conclude it.

The minor who, having attained the age of puberty, has an intelligence insufficiently developed to be entrusted with the management of his property, remains in a state of incapacity ; otherwise his incapacity ceases ipso facto on his attaining his majority. His property is then intrusted to him ; though others maintain that the court should in all cases decree the cessation of the guardianship. A person who, immediately upon attaining his majority, begins to waste his substance, should be formally declared incapable ; only a few jurists maintain that incapacity recommences ipso facto under guardianship as before.

†A person who has attained majority cannot be pronounced incapable owing to notorious misconduct.

An adult afflicted with idiocy should be placed under the care of the court, or according to others under that of the person who would be his guardian if he were a minor. This difference of opinion is also manifested with regard to an adult who is mad. A person in a state of incapacity through idiocy can neither sell, buy, nor enfranchise slaves, nor make a donation, nor marry without the consent of his curator. If he buys or borrows anything, and if after delivery it is lost when in his possession, he is not responsible either during or after his incapacity, whether his condition was or was not known to the injured party. He may marry with the consent of his curator, †but under no circumstances may he meddle with the management of his property or admit the existence of debts contracted before or since his incapacity. Neither is his admission of any value *as to any damage caused by him ; but it is taken into consideration if it relates to an offence punishable by a definite penalty or under the law of talion. He can, moreover, repudiate or divorce his wife, pronounce an injurious assimilation with regard to her, or disavow a child by means of anathema. As to religious practices an idiot is subject to the same law as other believers ; but he cannot personally take part in the distribution of what he owes in charity ; and if he wishes to perform an obligatory pilgrimage, the curator should intrust to some reliable person what is required for his maintenance on the journey. Moreover, the curator may forbid his undertaking a voluntary pilgrimage, if the expense would exceed his ordinary maintenance, even if he has already begun it ; and as our school considers the idiot as a person prevented from continuing his act of devotion, his ihram ceases ipso facto.

[If it is admitted that the expiatory sacrifice due in these circumstances may lawfully be replaced, the idiot should fast instead of sacrificing a shah or giving food to the poor, as he is incapable of disposing of his property. However, if he is able to gain on the way what is enough to cover the extra expense of a voluntary pilgrimage, his curator is not legally entitled to prohibit this act of devotion.]

SECTION 2

A father is the guardian of his children during their minority. In default of the father the guardianship reverts to the father's father, and then to a testamentary executor appointed for that purpose by the father or father's father, and as a last resort to the court, which, however, may depute some reliable person as administrator. †A mother can never be guardian in her own right, but the father or father's father may so appoint her by will.

A guardian should manage the affairs of a minor like a good father. Thus he should in building use clay and bricks baked in a furnace, not bricks dried in the sun or plaster. He will not sell immovable property, unless it is absolutely necessary or the advantage is obvious; but he may alienate movable property, even by exchange or on credit, if his ward's interest requires it. In the case of a sale on credit, however, he should always have the transaction certified by witnesses, and stipulate for security. As to a right of pre-emption, he should exercise it or not as his ward's interest requires. He may pay what is due by the minor as legal alms; and should furnish him with what is necessary to enable him to live decently.

When a ward, after attaining majority, makes a claim against his father or father's father, alleging that the latter has not acted as a good father of a family with respect to the sale of his property, the guardian has a presumption in his favour if he takes an oath; but if the claim is against a testamentary executor or an administrator appointed by the court, the presumption is in favour of the ward.

CHAPTER III.—COMPROMISE, AND RIGHT OF WAY

SECTION 1

COMPROMISES are of two kinds; the first, those come to between two litigants, is itself divided into two kinds—

1. A compromise about an obligation admitted by the other party, or legally established in some other way. When in these circumstances there is a consent to accept an object not claimed in the place of one claimed, this consent is regarded as similar to a sale, though the word “compromise” may have been used ; and consequently there must be observed all the rules of a sale, such as the right of pre-emption, redhibition for defects, prohibition from disposing of the article before taking possession, and the necessity of mutually taking possession, if both are capable of giving rise to illicit gain. When one consents to accept, instead of the thing claimed, the use of something else, this consent has the effect of a contract of hiring, of which all the particulars must be exactly observed. And lastly, if one consents to accept only a part of what one might claim, this consent is regarded as a true donation, subject to the law ordinarily governing such kinds of contract. But in all these cases †the word “compromise” and not the word “sale” must be employed. Moreover, if one says to some one, “Give me such and such a thing by way of compromise instead of your house,” †this proposal has no legal effect unless there has already been some dispute about the house. There is, however, no objection to replace a debt in this way by some definite object. If, in these circumstances, it is on both sides a question of things giving rise to illicit gain, a mutual taking possession must take place at once ; †otherwise this is not necessary, at least if what is given in exchange for the article originally due is something definite. If, on the other hand, one debt is substituted for another, the latter must be immediately converted into some definite object ; though we have seen that authorities are not agreed as to taking possession in such a case. When compromising in such a way that one accepts the part payment of a debt, one really grants a remission as to what is left ; and in this case one may make use of the word “remission” or “diminution,” just as well as of the word “compromise.” A permission granted to the debtor to pay in a certain time what is due immediately, or vice versa, is quite invalid ; but this does not prevent the debtor being able, with the exceptions mentioned, to anticipate payment of a debt due at a certain time. On the other hand, one may accept, by way of compromise, five pieces of money paid at once, instead of ten paid by a certain date ; for in this case it is not the same sum that the debtor has to pay, these five pieces paid at once dispensing him from paying the rest. But the inverse compromise to this is not permissible, that is, one may not stipulate for ten pieces at a certain date instead of five immediately.

2. A compromise about an obligation not established by an admission or in any other way. Such a compromise is invalid when the denial of the opposite party relates to the obligation itself, †even partially. †A phrase such as “I propose to compromise upon the subject of the house you are claiming,” cannot be regarded as an admission.

The second kind of compromises consists of those concluded between the plaintiff and a third party. Now it is a perfectly lawful compromise when some third party declares to the plaintiff, "The defendant admits his obligation and has authorised me to come to a compromise with you." An agent has also power to compromise, in these circumstances, on his own account, for then it is as if there had been on his part a preliminary purchase of the thing in dispute. When the defendant's agent declares that the latter totally denies the claim, the compromise between the plaintiff and the agent upon the subject of litigation has the same effect as the purchase of something unlawfully usurped; that is to say the agent has concluded of his own accord a compromise whose validity depends upon whether the plaintiff can have the thing delivered him. A compromise is in any case invalid if the defendant denies the obligation, and his agent has not communicated this circumstance to the plaintiff.

SECTION 2

It is forbidden to make use of a public way, serving as communication between two places, in such a manner as to obstruct the passage. Thus it is forbidden to construct at one's house a balcony opening upon the road, or to make a covered passage between two houses; though both are lawful if at such a height as to allow of a man standing upright to pass underneath. If it be a road along which riders and caravans habitually pass, the balcony or the roof of the covered passage must be of sufficient height to allow of the free passage underneath of a camel carrying a litter, including the baldachin and its supports. It is forbidden—

(1) To compromise upon the subject of these rights, relating to any public way; or

(2) to construct a bench upon the public road, or plant a tree on it. According to other authorities, however, this precept does not include benches or trees that do not in any way obstruct the free passage of the road.

If it be a question, not of a public road, but of a blind alley, access to it is forbidden to persons not living there; †and even these should obtain the previous permission of their neighbours. By a person living there is understood the occupant of a house with a door in the blind alley, but not a person whose house merely adjoins it with a bare wall. †Each inhabitant of the blind alley has a right to that part of it only comprised between the corner of the public road and his house door. The inhabitants alone have the right to make doors leading into the blind alley, for entrance and exit; †persons who have only a bare wall on it may not pierce this wall, unless they carefully nail up any door they may make there. An inhabitant whose house already has one door opening on the blind alley, may not make another further from the corner of the road, without his neighbour's consent. Even if it is nearer the corner the new door may not lawfully be made without the knowledge of the neighbours, unless at the same time the old one is shut up ; in this latter case no one has any right to object. †Nor have the neighbours any right to object if the owner of two houses proposes to make a door of communication between the two, whether the doors of these houses open on to two different blind alleys, or whether one opens into a blind alley and the other into the street. In all cases where neighbours wish to oppose the opening of another door, they may compromise for a sum of money. Every householder has a right to make new windows opening on to a blind alley, in order to get more light.

A wall between two properties is either a party-wall or not. If it is not a party-wall, the neighbour may not place beams against it without the knowledge of the owner, at least, according to what was admitted by Shafii in his second period ; nor can he force the owner to allow him to do so. If the owner permits him to do so without payment, it is as if he had lent him the use of the wall ; and he may at any time withdraw this permission, without being liable for damage, †even though the neighbour may have already begun his intended construction. If the owner withdraws his permission, he may at his choice either permit the building for a consideration, or he may insist upon its demolition, and claim damages for any injury done to the wall. Some authorities, however, maintain that the owner may only claim compensation under these circumstances, and cannot insist upon demolition. If, on the other hand, it is for a consideration that the owner has granted permission to rest upon the wall beams supporting some construction, e.g. if he has rented out for this purpose the use of the top of the wall, he must keep to the articles of the contract of letting. †If the following expressions have been used :—"I sell you the top of my wall to support your building," or "I sell you the right to build upon it," it is a sale combined with a contract of letting ; and the owner, once the construction has begun, has no longer under any circumstances the right to demolish the wall. Even if the wall falls down and the owner rebuilds it, a neighbour who has bought a right of construction upon the original wall can exercise his right upon the wall newly erected. It is necessary that the portion of the wall concerned should be specified by mentioning both length and width, whether the permission has been granted for a consideration or not. There should also be indicated the nature and the height of the walls of the building it is intended to build upon the wall in question, and the nature of the roof with which it is to be covered. When permission is asked to build on another's land, it is sufficient to indicate the area of the proposed building.

As to a party-wall, according to the theory adopted by Shafii in his second period, neither of the part-owners has a right to rest beams on it without the other's consent ; nor to fix a bolt in it, nor open a window, except on the same condition. Each part-owner may, however, support things against it, or open a shop for goods, so long as the wall is not damaged. Such acts are lawful also in the case of a wall which is not a party-wall. A part-owner may not oblige his neighbour to contribute to the repairing of a party-wall, at least according to the opinion adopted by Shafii in his second period ; but if the wall falls into ruin, he may rebuild it at his own cost and his own profit. In this case he obtains exclusive possession of it, and may dispose of it as he pleases, either by making it serve as a foundation for other buildings, or by demolishing it ; and if the neighbour should then object to its demolition, and offer to pay his share in the expense of rebuilding and up-keep, he cannot be forced to agree to this proposal. Where, however, one of two part-owners of a party-wall fallen into ruin wishes to rebuild it with the débris to which both have equal right, the other may object to this ; but if they help each other and build it together their joint rights in the party-wall become as before. It is permissible for one of the part-owners to grant to the other who alone undertakes to rebuild it, a larger share in the party-wall than he had before ; for in that case these increased rights are considered as being the reward of his labour.

One may grant to one's neighbour, for a consideration, the right to deflect a course of water, or to throw snow, upon property of which one is the owner.

When two proprietors dispute about the ownership of a wall between their properties, and the buildings belonging to one of them are so closely fixed in to the wall, that both must have been constructed at the same time, he is regarded as the owner of the wall ; otherwise they must be looked upon as joint owners. Consequently the wall must be adjudged in this case to that party who is able to prove his ownership ; and if neither can do this, the court should administer an oath to both of them. If both, or neither, substantiate their statements on oath, the wall should be declared a party-wall ; but if one only does so, the wall should be adjudged to him. The circumstance that one of two neighbours has rested beams on a disputed wall, cannot of itself add weight to his claim. The flooring between two storeys of a house belonging to different persons is subject to the same law as a wall between two properties. It is necessary to consider if the floor can have been made after the construction of the upper storey. If this is the case, it is presumed that the floor is, so to speak, a party-floor ; but if it is not so established, the floor is presumed to belong to the proprietor of the lower story.

CHAPTER IV.—TRANSCFERENCE OF DEBTS

For the validity of a transference the law requires the consent of the transferrer and of the transferee, †but not that of the debtor. A person who owes nothing, however, cannot be made the subject of such a transference ; though some authorities maintain that this is possible, with the consent of the person in question. A debt transferred must be obligatory. It can refer to things sold by weight or measure †or otherwise. It is lawful to transfer the price of a sale during the period of option, either by the purchaser designating to the vendor a third person who will pay him the price agreed upon, †or by the vendor designating a third person to whom the purchaser should pay the money. A slave undergoing enfranchisement by contract may designate to his master another person who will make him the periodic payments ; though the master may not transfer to any other person his claim upon the slave for these same payments. The amount and nature of a transferred debt should be known, as in the case of the original debt. Only one jurist admits the legality of a transference of camels due as the price of blood, both on the part of the claimant and of the debtor. A debt extinguished by transference must be of the same nature and amount as the transfer ; †the due date of both must be the same ; †and they must both refer to the same coin or goods.

A debtor who pays his creditor by transferring him a claim, is thereby free of the debt ; and the person whose liability is transferred is at the same time freed as regards his first creditor, while becoming responsible towards the transferee. Consequently, the transferee cannot proceed against the transferrer, even if he meets with difficulty on account of the bankruptcy of the other party, or by reason of his denial confirmed on oath. Even if the latter is already a bankrupt at the moment of the transference, without the knowledge of the transferee, the latter has still no claim against the transferrer ; though other authorities allow him this remedy if the transfer was on the express condition of the debtor's solvency.

A transfer by a purchaser, as to the price agreed upon, *is annulled by a restitution on account of redhibitory defects ; but, according to our school, a similar transfer by the vendor stands good, even though the goods are subsequently returned him on account of such defects. A transfer with regard to the price of a slave sold is also null, if the interested parties, i.e. the vendor, purchaser, and transferee, are agreed that it is really a free man they have disposed of by mistake, or if one of the parties proves this in court. When, in such circumstances, the transferee alone denies to the slave the liberty admitted by the vendor and purchaser, the latter have the right to insist upon the transferee confirming upon oath his ignorance of the liberty of the person in question ; and it is only after taking this oath that the transferee can claim from the purchaser payment of the price transferred.

In case of a dispute between two persons, one of whom contends that he appointed the other his agent to take possession of something due by a third party, while the other maintains that the debt was transferred to him and he acted not as agent but as transferee, or if the case turns upon the question whether the word "cede" used by the parties implies a mandate or a transfer, the one who asserts the fact of an appointment as agent has a presumption in his favour, if his statement is confirmed on oath. All authorities, however, are not agreed in admitting this presumption in the latter case, i.e. where the dispute is about the meaning of the word "cede." If one of the parties in litigation maintains that he transferred his claim to the other, while the latter asserts that he was merely authorised to receive the sum due, the law presumes that this latter statement is the truth, if confirmed on oath.

CHAPTER V.—GUARANTY

SECTION 1

A PERSON who is incapable of managing his affairs cannot be a surety. A guarantee on the part of a bankrupt has the same effect as a purchase by him ; †and that on the part of a slave without his master's authorisation is considered void. If a master has authorised his slave to go surety, indicating as guarantee what the slave gains by his labour, or some other thing, it is the property indicated which is liable to seizure ; ‡otherwise the following rule must be observed. In the case of a generally authorised slave, everything he actually possesses and everything he has gained after his authorisation may be seized ; but in the case of a slave not authorised to trade, the profits of his labour are alone liable. †It is necessary that the surety should know the creditor, but the latter need not accept or even subsequently approve him. It is generally agreed that one may go surety for a person without his consent ; ‡one need not even know him.

A guaranty can only be given for a debt, which must be—

1. Certain ; though in his first period Shafii accepted the validity of a guarantee on a future obligation. Our school also admits a guarantee as to the indirect consequences of a sale, even after payment of the price ; i.e. one can go surety to the purchaser for the return of the price paid by him, in case of a legal seizure, redhibition or deterioration.

2. Obligatory. One may not go surety for the periodic payments arising out of an enfranchisement by contract ; †but one may do so for payment due by reason of a contract of sale, even during the continuance of a right of option. A guaranty relating to the payment of a contractor is regulated by the same principles as a security with reference to a similar obligation.

3. Known. This, at any rate, is what Shafii decided in his Egyptian period, when he also gave it as his opinion that the remission of an unknown debt is null, unless it is a case of camels due as price of blood, †in which latter case he also admits the validity of a guaranty. †An agreement in the following terms :—“ I go surety for so-and-so’s debt up to an amount of from one to ten drahms is not regarded as a guarantee for an unknown debt, and one is then liable for the maximum. [†In such a case one is responsible for a maximum of nine drahms.]

SECTION 2

Our school admits the validity of personal security. One can go surety for the person of a debtor without knowing the amount of the debt. In every other case personal security can only be given where an ordinary guarantee can also be given. Our school admits personal security even for a person liable to a penalty depending upon the will of the injured party as under the law of talion, or liable to punishment for defamation ; but a third party can never go bail for the person of a criminal liable to a definite punishment, i.e. one that cannot be remitted. One may go bail for the person of a minor, a lunatic, a man in prison, an absent person and even a dead man.

In this last case it is necessary to produce the corpse, for its identity to be established by witnesses ; but in other cases a personal bail has for its effect that one has undertaken to bring the debtor alive to the place where he has to pay his debt, at least if such place has been previously indicated, or if not to the place where the guarantee was given. The guarantee has been fulfilled once the debtor is brought to the place, so that the creditor is able to seize his person. It has been fulfilled also if the debtor presents himself of his own accord and places himself at the disposition of his creditor, in order to fulfil his engagement ; but a mere appearance of the debtor is not enough, unless he declares he comes to answer to his bail. When one has become bail for a debtor, who subsequently absconds, and nobody knows where he is, there is no longer need to produce him ; and the guarantor, even if he has already made inquiry as to the debtor's whereabouts, may still insist on a delay necessary to enable him to go and look for the debtor and procure his return. When this is over, the guarantor may be imprisoned, unless he brings the debtor. Some jurists maintain, however, that in these circumstances the guarantor can never be obliged to bring the debtor, if the latter has gone away as far as will permit of an abridgment of prayer. †If a debtor is already dead and buried at the moment when a guaranty was given for his person, the guarantor is not responsible for the payment of the debt ; and personal security is in such a case null and void, even if a clause has been added to the effect that the guarantor shall be liable for the payment of the debt, where the burial of the debtor prevents his being brought. †And, finally, personal security is not valid without the debtor's consent.

SECTION 3

For the validity of a guaranty, ordinary or personal, such words must be used as clearly indicate the obligation undertaken, as " I go bail for what so-and-so owes you," or " I take his debt on myself," or " I undertake it," or " I answer for his person," or " I become bail, security, guarantor, responsible for bringing you the debtor ; and if I do not bring him, I will pay for him." But if, on the other hand, one says, " I will pay the money or bring the debtor," it is a mere promise and not a personal guaranty. †Guaranty, whether ordinary or personal, cannot be made conditional ; nor may the exact moment of the debtor's appearance be lawfully specified. But it may be stipulated that the debtor shall be brought immediately, or that he shall not be brought before the end of the month. One may also guarantee payment by a certain time of a debt due immediately, as well as the immediate payment of a debt due on a certain date. †The guarantor need never pay off a debt before the date agreed upon between him and the creditor.

A creditor may at his choice seize either the guarantor or the original debtor. †He cannot accept the security on condition that the principal debtor shall be free from seizure. The guaranty ceases with the principal debt, and consequently the guarantor is released by a remission of the original debtor. On the other hand, a release of the guarantor does not affect the obligation of the original debtor. Upon the death of the principal debtor, or of the guarantor, the death is recoverable from the goods of the deceased ; but the position of the survivor is unaffected. A guarantor, on proceedings being taken against him, may cite the original debtor, and force him to discharge his debt to the creditor, unless he has gone security without the debtor's knowledge ; but† the guarantor cannot proceed against the original debtor, before the creditor claims payment. A guarantor who pays, without reference to the debtor, may still sue the latter if guaranty and payment were effected with his consent. But if the debtor disapproved these, the guarantor has no remedy against him. †The debtor's consent to the guaranty renders him liable to the guarantor ; but not his mere consent to payment by the latter. †If a guarantor has persuaded a creditor to accept debased money instead of the good pieces due by the debtor, or a coat worth fifty pieces instead of one hundred pieces, he can claim from the debtor no more than he has actually paid.

If one discharges another's obligation without his knowledge and without any guaranty, one is not substituted for the creditor so as to be able to proceed against the debtor ; but the debtor's consent to payment by a third party not a guarantor involves this substitution, whether or not such a right has been expressly reserved. †This right of substitution remains intact, even where the creditor and the third party convert the debt into another of a different nature.

The law requires that before proceedings are taken, either under a guaranty or by right of substitution, that payment took place in presence of two male witnesses, or of one male and two female witnesses ; or even of a single male witness—but in this last case the guarantor or substitute should take an oath. If there are no witnesses, the payment made by the guarantor or the substitute, in the absence of the debtor, gives him no right to proceed, whether there is †or is not a rejoinder on his part. Our school, however, admits such right to proceed, even without witnesses, where payment is substantiated by a declaration of the creditor, or where it has taken place in presence of the original debtor.

BOOK 13.—PARTNERSHIP

FOUR kinds of partnerships are to be distinguished—

1. Personal (sherkat-al-abdan), a contract by virtue of which some persons unite for the exercise of their trade or profession, as a partnership of two or more porters or workmen so that their profit is held in common and divided amongst them. Such a partnership does not require equal contribution, nor that the partners should all have the same trade.

2. Universal (sherkat-al-mofawada), in which the profit gained by each partner is held in common by all, and all are jointly responsible for the debts of each.

3. Commercial, in participation (sherka-al-wujuh), in which two persons, well known as merchants, each buy goods as if for himself, under particular conditions as to time of payment ; the goods being then sold in common and the profits divided between the two.

All these three kinds of partnership are null and void.

4. Particular (sherka-al-inan), which alone is permitted, provided that the share of each partner is expressly indicated. †Thus a partnership of this kind cannot exist where there is merely an agreement to combine and nothing more. No particular partnership can take place except between persons capable of appointing or being appointed an agent.

The share capital must consist of things sold by measure or weight, and not otherwise. Some jurists even maintain that these contributions must consist in gold or silver coin. All agree that the shares must be mixed together so as to be indistinguishable. This cannot take place unless the contributions are of the same nature and quality. Thus one partner cannot bring good coin and another debased. These rules, however, apply only to the common stock collected to form a conventional partnership ; for if two persons obtain anything as undivided property in some other way, as by inheritance, sale, etc., and allow each other unrestricted right to trade with it, this is a perfectly legitimate partnership, without, however, there being any combination of funds subscribed, and without there being any question of things sold by measure or weight. It follows therefore that the rule that the funds of a partnership must consist of things sold by measure or weight can be eluded by a mutual and partial exchange of the things contributed, combined with an authorisation to dispose of them at pleasure. The law does not insist that the share contributed by each partner shall be equal ; nor even that the exact amount must be known at the time of the contract of partnership.

No partner may dispose of the common funds, except in a reasonable manner. Thus he cannot of his own accord sell either on credit or for any coin not legally current in the place ; and he is personally responsible if he allows himself to be deceived by any obvious fraud. Neither can he take with him on a journey partnership funds ; nor send them to a commission agent, without the permission of the other partners.

Each partner has a right to terminate the contract of partnership at any moment ; but can then no longer dispose of the common funds. This rule, however, must be understood in the sense that if one partner says to another, " I release you from our contract," or " You can no longer dispose of my share in the common funds," he is not himself released from his obligations towards the partnership. A partnership terminates upon the death, lunacy, or disappearance of one of the partners.

Profit and loss must be shared in proportion to the contribution of each partner, without regard to the value of the labour of each. Any stipulation to the contrary would involve the illegality of the contract. But in these circumstances the partners retain a right of action against each other for any salary that may be due for their respective services, and what dispositions they may have made with regard to the common funds remain intact. And any profit made or loss incurred, before the legality of the contract was called in question, must be shared in proportion to the capital contributed.

Each partner is considered as the depositary of the common funds intrusted to him ; which implies that his word is presumed to be true as to restitution, deterioration or accidental loss of such property. If he alleges some visible cause of the loss, he need only prove that the accident took place, his word being enough to show the accident did also cause the loss of the object in dispute. If one partner possesses something he says is his, while another says it belongs to the partnership or vice versâ, the presumption is in favour of the person in possession ; but if he asserts that the thing belongs to him in consequence of a division amongst the partners, the presumption is in favour of the party that denies this fact. And finally there is a presumption in favour of a partner who asserts that a thing was purchased, either for the partnership or on his own account, against any other partner who maintains the contrary.

BOOK 14.—PRINCIPAL AND AGENT

SECTION 1

For the validity of an appointment as agent, it is necessary that the principal should have the right to do in person what he authorises his agent to do, whether it concerns his own property, or something else of which he has a right to dispose. Thus a minor, a lunatic, a woman—as to marriage—or a person in a state of ihram, cannot appoint an agent ; but a guardian may do so on behalf of his pupil. A blind person, though incapable of himself buying or selling anything because he cannot see it, may nominate an agent for this purpose.

An agent must himself be capable of doing on his own account what he is appointed to do for another. Consequently, neither a minor, nor a lunatic, nor—as to marriage—a woman, nor a person in a state of ihram, can be appointed an agent.

There are, however, certain circumstances in which one may rely upon the word of a minor, e.g. when in the name of his parents he allows some one to enter the house, or when he brings a small present from them. †A slave may be appointed an agent to receive a woman in marriage, but not to give her away.

The object of an appointment as agent must be—

1. The property of, or a right acquired by, the principal. †Thus, for example, the appointment of an agent to sell a slave one is about to purchase, or to repudiate a woman one is about to marry, is considered null and void.

2. An act which may be performed by another person. Consequently, to appoint an agent to perform one's religious duties is unlawful, with the exception of the pilgrimage, visit, distribution of charity and sacrifice. An agent may not be appointed to depose as a witness, take an oath of continence, pronounce an anathema or other oaths for an injurious comparison. On the other hand, sale and purchase, donation, contract of salam, security, marriage, repudiation, and in general all civil conventions may be effected or revoked through an agent. Similarly, an agent may accept what a third party owes his principal ; he can fulfil the latter's obligations, appear in court for him either as plaintiff or defendant, *and by occupation in his name acquire possession of an object not belonging to any one, as e.g. by clearing waste land, by hunting, or by picking up dry wood. A judicial confession should be made personally by the interested party, †and cannot be made through an agent ; but it is permissible to apply by agent for the application of a penalty that may be remitted, as under the law of talion, or of a penalty for defamation. Only a small number of authorities refuse to allow this unless the principal is present.

3. Known ; at least in part, for complete precision is unnecessary. Thus, an appointment as agent in the following terms is invalid :—" I give you general authority as my agent in business, important or otherwise," or "for all my affairs," or "I intrust my property to you." On the other hand, there is no objection to an appointment as follows :—" I appoint you my agent for the sale of all my property, and the enfranchisement of all my slaves." It follows also from this principle that when giving any one power of attorney to purchase a slave, the kind must be specified ; or, in the case of a house, its situation ; but in †neither case is it necessary to mention the price.

The principal must make use of words that leave no doubt as to his consent. Thus, for example, he should say, "I appoint you my agent for such and such a business," or "I intrust it to you," or "You will be my agent ;" and consent is also sufficiently expressed by saying, "Sell this for me," or "Enfranchise such and such a slave." For the validity of an appointment as agent the law does not require an express acceptance on the part of the agent ; though some authorities maintain the contrary opinion, in a case where the principal has merely indicated the nature of the contract, as, for instance, by saying, "I appoint you my agent." Where, however, the principal has disclosed the nature not of the contract but of the act, by saying, e.g. "sell" or "enfranchise," even these authors do not insist upon an express acceptance.

†An appointment as agent cannot be made to depend upon a condition ; but there is no objection to the business confided to the agent being made so to depend. †The words, "I appoint you my agent and you will be so again after I have revoked the appointment," constitute a valid power of attorney for the present, but it lapses upon revocation, for there is then a new appointment depending upon a condition. †The same principle applies to the cancelling condition ; whether, i.e. the revocation of the appointment may or may not be conditional.

An agent appointed to effect a general sale may accept in payment of the price only such coin as is legally current in the locality. He may not sell on credit ; nor may he allow himself to be deceived by any obvious fraud—such a fraud, that is, as is seldom capable of deceiving an average person. In any case the agent is personally responsible to the principal for damage, when there has been delivery of the goods. If the power of attorney specifies that a sale shall be at a fixed time, the same rule must be applied ; †but it is quite legal to leave the time to the discretion of the agent, who should then guide himself by what is usually stipulated as to the time. An agent appointed to sell a thing cannot buy it for himself, nor for a minor of whom he is the legal guardian ; †but there is no objection to his selling it to his father or to his adult child. A power to sell implies a power to receive the price and deliver the goods. A delivery of the goods before the receipt of the price is at the agent's risk. An agent appointed to buy must not purchase a thing with redhibitory defects, except on his own responsibility. If the object is worth the price stipulated, in spite of redhibitory defects, the purchase is chargeable to the principal, if the agent was unaware of the defects, †but not otherwise. If the thing is not worth the price paid, the purchase does not bind the principal, if the agent knew of the defects. If he was not aware of them, the agreement rests intact, except for the right of option, which in these circumstances the law allows both to principal and agent.

An agent, if able to carry out his instructions, may not delegate a third party to do so, without his principal's consent ; but if he is unable to conclude the affair through incapacity or on account of his social position, such delegation is quite lawful. It is so also where there are many agencies that one person cannot execute alone ; but in this case our school admits delegation only for that part of his duty that exceeds the agent's power. A power of delegation accorded by the principal in explicit terms, such as, "Choose a substitute for yourself," does not affect the position of the substitute, who remains always the agent's agent. †Consequently his authority terminates either by a revocation of his appointment by the agent, or by a revocation of the latter's own appointment. Where, on the other hand, the principal says to the agent, "Choose me another person to replace you if you should require a substitute," and the agent chooses such a substitute, the latter becomes the direct agent of the principal. †And it is the same where the principal has accorded a faculty of substitution, without indicating whether the substitute is to act for him or for his agent.

[1. In all cases where the substitute acts directly for the principal, an agent cannot revoke his appointment ; nor is his appointment ipso facto revoked by the revocation of the agent's appointment. On the other hand, the agent is equally independent of the substitute.

2. Even where an agent has a right of delegation, he can appoint as substitute only a person worthy of confidence ; unless the principal has indicated some particular person.

3. †Where an agent has made use of his power to appoint as substitute a person worthy of confidence, who is afterwards guilty of notorious misconduct, he cannot of his own accord revoke his appointment.]

SECTION 3

If in an agent's power of attorney there is a formal injunction to sell, either to a person specially mentioned, or at a certain date, or at a particular place, the agent must act in conformity with this clause. Authorities, however, are not in complete agreement as to the place, especially if the agent is unaware that such place has been indicated with a particular object. A power of attorney to sell for "one hundred pieces of money" does not imply any authority to sell for less ; but the sale may be effected at a higher price, unless expressly forbidden by the principal.

Where an agent had been appointed to purchase a shah of a certain quality for a dinar received for that purpose, and he buys for that price two shahs of the required quality, but neither of them is worth the price, the principal is not obliged to confirm the purchase. *He would be bound to confirm it, if each of the two shahs had the value mentioned, and in that case the ownership of the property would be transferred to the principal by the fact of his agent's taking possession. Where a principal instructs an agent to give some definite object in exchange for the goods, and the latter buys on credit, †for vice versâ, the purchase has no effect as against the principal. An agent who does not conform to his principal's instructions, with regard to the sale of his property or an exchange for some definite object, disposes of the goods of another in such a way as to cause the nullity of the contract. A purchase effected by an agent without naming his principal, and on his own responsibility, does not affect the latter ; ‡and it is the same where the vendor says, "I sell you this thing," and the agent answers, "No, I buy it for so-and-so." Finally, according to our school, an agreement expressed as follows :—"I sell this to your principal Zaid," to which the agent answers, "I buy it for him," is null and void.

An agent is considered as the depositary of everything intrusted to him in virtue of his appointment as agent ; and, even where he does not act gratuitously, he is responsible for loss or accidental deterioration only if he has exceeded his powers. †However, an error of this sort upon his part does not of itself involve the revocation of his appointment. In all cases the immediate consequences of a contract concern only the agent who has effected it, and not the principal. Thus the inspection of the goods, the irrevocableness of the contract upon the separation of the parties, and mutual taking possession upon the spot, are the affair of the agent, not of the principal.

The price agreed upon may be recovered by the vendor in the following ways :—

1. If the price has been left by the principal to the agent, the vendor may cite both of them.

2. If this is not so, and the price consists of some definite object, the vendor can cite only the principal.

3. If neither of these suppositions is the case, the vendor can cite only the agent ; at any rate if the principal entirely denies the agency, or declares he knows nothing about it. †Where, on the other hand, the appointment is admitted by all the interested parties, the vendor may cite both principal and agent, even though the price is not a definite object. In such a case the agent is regarded as the principal debtor, and the principal as his security.

In case of a legal seizure the purchaser has a remedy against the agent if the latter has received the price, even though this price may have been accidentally lost when in his possession, †and even though he may have informed the purchaser he was not acting on his own account. The agent may in his turn proceed against the principal. [†The purchaser has also the right to proceed directly against the principal in case of a legal seizure.]

SECTION 4

An appointment as agent may at any moment be revoked by the principal ; and the agent on his part may also at any moment give it up. A revocation pronounced in presence of the agent, as, for example, in the following words :—"I cancel the power of attorney," or "I annul it," or "I release you from it," operates as an immediate dismissal of the agent. A revocation in the agent's absence has the same effect, though one authority maintains that in such a case the revocation has no effect until communicated to the agent. An agent may give up his appointment, as, for example, by saying, "I resign," or "I return you your power of attorney." The appointment terminates of itself where either party loses a right to dispose of his own property, as by death or loss of reason, †or by temporary loss of consciousness following upon a fit. It ceases also of itself when the article which the principal has instructed his agent to dispose of no longer belongs to him. A mere disavowal of an agent by his principal who has forgotten his engagement, or who wants to conceal his intentions, does not involve a dismissal ; but this is certainly involved in a premeditated disavowal, with no other object in view.

In the case of a dispute as to the essential nature of an appointment as agent, e.g. where the agent maintains that the principal instructed him to sell something on credit, or to buy it for twenty pieces of money ; while the latter contends that it was to be sold for cash, or bought for ten pieces ; the presumption is in favour of the principal, if he takes an oath.

The law considers as null and void a purchase effected by an agent—

1. Of a female slave for the price of twenty pieces of money ; if the agent tells the vendor he has been instructed to buy at that price, and the principal afterwards states on oath that he said only ten pieces.

2. For a price consisting of a definite object belonging to the principal ; if the agent declared either before or after the purchase that it was not on his own account, but for another, and the principal afterwards disavows this on oath. However, the nullity in this case occurs only where the vendor admits he was informed of the fact that he was dealing with an agent ; for if this is denied by the vendor on oath, the purchase remains and the agent is personally responsible for payment. If the sale is not effected for some definite object, but on credit, the principle to be followed is still the same ; that is to say, the purchase is void if the agent has disclosed his true character to the vendor and this is admitted by the latter ; but the agent is himself liable if he has not done so, for the vendor states on oath he did not know it. Finally, in all cases where the purchase remains chargeable to the agent, the law recommends the court to persuade the principal to give an explanation of his disavowal to the agent, e.g. by saying, “ If I had instructed you to purchase this slave for twenty pieces of money I would have resold her to you with pleasure for that amount which seems to me exorbitant ; ” to which the agent may reply, “ I buy her,” with the object of thus acquiring a female slave with whom cohabitation is permitted him.

Where an agent maintains he has not exceeded his powers, and his principal asserts that he has, there is a presumption in favour of the latter ; or, according to one authority, in favour of the former. There is general agreement that an agent’s declaration must be accepted when he affirms upon oath that a certain article in his possession has been accidentally destroyed, or that he has restored to his principal what the latter intrusted to his keeping. Where an agent does not act gratuitously, some authorities are of a different opinion, so far as concerns restitution. If the agent maintains that he effected the restitution by means of a messenger of the principal, the messenger’s word is presumed to be true, and not that of the agent ; ††and in that case the principal is not required to pronounce upon his attorney's declaration. Where an agent contends that he received the price of a sale and that it was accidentally lost, and the principal denies these facts, there is a presumption in favour of the latter, so long as the delivery of the goods has not yet taken place ; after this our school admits a presumption in favour of the agent. Where some one has been instructed to pay a debt, and says he has done so, but the creditor denies receiving the money, the latter has a presumption in his favour, provided he takes an oath. An appointment as agent is never presumed ; consequently an agent must always prove his assertions, if contradicted by his principal, with the exception of the special cases mentioned in which his word is believed. ††On the same principle the administrator of an orphan's property is obliged, if the fact is contested, to prove that he has handed over all that remains in his hands to his ward upon his attaining his majority.

†Neither an agent nor a depositary can refuse to hand over to the owner what they hold of his, under the pretext that such restitution must take place in the presence of witnesses, for their word suffices to establish this. But a person holding by usurpation, or any one enjoying no legal presumption in his favour as an agent does, may refuse restitution except in the presence of witnesses.

If a person asserts that he has been instructed by some one having a right to do so to take possession of property in possession of a third party, whether as payment of a debt or as restitution of a definite object, the debtor may pay the debt or restore the object to the agent, if he sees fit to acknowledge the character he claims. However, according to our school, he cannot be obliged to pay the debt or restore the object to the agent, unless the latter proves his right to act as agent. †On the other hand, in such a case, if the claimant states he is acting as transferee, the restitution or payment is obligatory, unless the debtor denies. [Our school acknowledges a similar obligation where the claimant derives his right from his being an heir, and the debtor admits this.]

BOOK 15.—ADMISSION

SECTION 1

AN admission is valid only when made by a person who can dispose freely of his property. Thus an admission by a minor or a lunatic is null and void. But where an individual, regarded as a minor, admits having attained puberty in consequence of nocturnal pollutions, he must be believed, without being sworn, if he has attained an age at which emission is legally presumed to be possible. Where, on the other hand, a minor says he has reached his majority, on no other ground than his having attained the required age of fifteen, he must prove this circumstance. The consequences of an admission made by an idiot or a bankrupt have already been dealt with. An admission by a slave, asserting upon his part an obligation to undergo a purely corporal punishment, is accepted in a court of justice ; but his admission relating to an offence for which a pecuniary penalty may be imposed, involves only his own personal obligation, if it is contested by his master. The slave is bound to discharge this obligation upon his enfranchisement, but the admission does not render him liable to seizure. Moreover, a slave's admission in a civil matter is not accepted at all, if it relates to his master's rights or property, unless in the case of a slave generally authorised to trade. In this latter case it is accepted, and the slave must discharge the resulting obligation, either out of the profits he has realised, or out of the funds intrusted to him by his master. A sick person's admission upon his deathbed is valid, according to our school, whether made in favour of some third party or in favour of one of his heirs. An admission made before a last illness enjoys no right of priority over one made on a deathbed, if it is a matter of two admissions about the same thing in favour of two different persons. †Nor is there any right of priority where a person, in health or on his deathbed, makes an admission in favour of some one ; and after his death his heir makes an admission about the same thing in favour of some one else.

An admission is of no value if obtained by violence. The person in whose favour an admission is made should be capable of possessing and exercising rights over the thing it refers to. Thus an admission made in favour of an animal is invalid ; but an obligation would be created by the following words :—" I admit owing such and such a thing to its master on account of that animal," or " I admit owing to the child of which Hind is pregnant such and such a thing which the child will be able to claim as inheritance or legacy." This admission is equally invalid if some cause is assigned that cannot legally exist ; but it is valid if the cause has not been expressed. †A denial on the part of the person in whose favour an admission is made, results in the ownership of the property not being transferred. A revocation of an admission followed by such denial must be accepted, if the admission was an error, and the denial is immediately followed by the revocation.

SECTION 2

An admission is usually made in the following words :—" Such and such a thing belongs to Zaid ;" and if it is about a debt, " I am his debtor," or " I owe it him." An admission with regard to real property or some definite object should be made as follows :—" The thing belonging to so and so is with me," or " I hold it." If one merely says to some one, " You owe me a thousand pieces of money," and the other merely answers, " Weigh it," " Take it then," " Weigh the money," " Take it," " Put your seal on it," or " Put it in your purse," this cannot be considered as an admission ; but it does amount to an admission if he answers, " Certainly," " Yes," " You are right," " You have given me a receipt for it," " I have paid you," or " I admit it." The words, " I admit," without adding " what," or " I will admit my debt," i.e. in the aorist tense instead of the past, do not constitute an admission ; but the words, " Certainly," or " Yes," in answer to a question such as, " Don't you owe me this sum ?" do so. However, authorities are not agreed as to the answer, " Yes." †There is an admission also where one says to some one, " Pay me the thousand pieces you owe me," and he answers, " Yes," or " I will pay you them to-morrow," or " Let me have a day's time," or " Let me have time to sit down," or " To open my purse," or " To look for my key."

SECTION 3

An admission must refer to something not belonging to the person making it. Thus, an admission as to " my house," or " my coat," or in the words, " My claim upon Zaid I admit belongs to Amr," is null and void. In the phrase, " I admit such and such a thing now belongs to so-and-so, but until I made this admission it belonged to me," the first part implies an admission, and the second is considered as null. And secondly the thing with reference to which the admission is made must be in the possession of the person making the admission, since the consequence of the admission is that he is obliged to deliver the object. However, the admission will be valid even where the thing, at the moment of the admission, is not yet in the possession of the person making the admission ; provided he obtains possession of it before the time fixed for the delivery.

An admission that the slave of a third party is free, renders the person making it liable under it, if afterwards he obtains possession of the slave by purchase. If the admission is to the effect that the slave is already free, the purchase must simply be considered as a ransom. But if otherwise, that is if the admission is merely of an intention to enfranchise the slave of a third party, the purchase is considered a ransom only on the part of the person making the admission, but an ordinary purchase on the part of the owner, at least according to our school. Consequently to the vendor alone belongs the right of option, both that called "of the sitting," and that which is the effect of a special agreement.

An admission need not refer to a known object. Thus, if one admits owing somebody "a thing," the creditor must be contented with whatever the debtor says he meant, provided only that it is "a thing" in the legal acceptance of the word, i.e. a thing of some value and capable of being owned. †He would even have in these circumstances to content himself with some valueless thing, if of the same kind as e.g. a grain of corn ; or with an object which, though not capable of legal ownership, may be acquired and possessed, such as a trained dog, manure, etc. Only those things of which the acquisition and possession are forbidden, e.g. a pig or an untrained dog, may be refused as having no legal utility. A debtor cannot discharge an obligation resulting from any such admission by performing an act of mere politeness, e.g. by visiting his sick creditor, or returning his salute. An admission of owing some one something "of value," "of high value," "of great value," or "of much value," involves an obligation merely to give something not entirely valueless ;—†for instance, even a female slave enfranchised on account of maternity ;—but a dog, or the skin of a dead animal, would not suffice. The expression "I admit owing him so much," is equivalent to "I admit owing him something" ; while the simple repetition of "so much," or "thing," in an admission, have no consequence at all. If, on the contrary, one says, "a thing and a thing," or "so much and so much," uniting the words by the conjunction, one owes two distinct things.

If one says, "I owe you such a drahm," or "I owe it you," one owes only a single drahm ; but one owes two, according to our school, if one says, "such and such a drahm," putting the word "drahm" in the accusative singular. And according again to our school, one owes only a single "drahm," when the word is in the nominative or the genitive, or where the conjunction "and" has been omitted. An admission expressed as follows, "a thousand plus a drahm," may be explained as though the word "thousand" did not refer to drahms, but to something else. ††But "twenty-five drahms," can refer to nothing but drahms. ††A modification to the effect that "the drahms I admit are drahms of an inferior weight," must be accepted; but if the drahms current in the locality are not debased coin, the modification must immediately follow upon the admission. Such a modification may be made later only where the drahms current in the locality are not of the usual weight. At least Shafii so decided. An admission in the words, "I owe him from one to ten drahms," †involves an obligation to pay nine; but an admission of "one in ten" means eleven if the preposition is used in a conjunctive sense, and ten if in an arithmetical one; though otherwise, i.e. if used in the ordinary sense, it means only one.

An admission of owing "a sword in a sheath," or "a coat in a box," does not imply the sheath or the box; and similarly an admission of owing "a sheath containing a sword," or "a box containing a coat," does not involve the contents. And so too, if one admits owing "a slave with a turban on his head," ††one is not supposed to have included the turban; but, on the other hand, one owes everything spoken of when the admission is of "an animal with its saddle," or "a coat adorned with embroideries."

The expression "a thousand pieces of money in my father's inheritance," implies an admission that the estate is burdened with a debt of this amount; but the expression "a thousand pieces of money in the inheritance my father will leave me" is considered as a mere promise of a future donation. Moreover, if one admits owing any one "drahm," and repeats this last word without saying anything else, one owes a single drahm; but if one repeats the word "drahm," and adds the conjunction "and," then one owes two. By saying "a drahm and a drahm and a drahm," one owes two for the two first times the word is pronounced. The third has no effect if used only to confirm the obligation resulting from the other two. On the other hand, a third drahm must be paid in the following cases:—

1. If the third drahm was pronounced with the intention of creating a new obligation.

2. †If the third was pronounced with the intention only of confirming the admission in the first.

3. †If the third was pronounced with no special intention.

An admission made in vague terms, e.g. "something and a coat," obliges the debtor to specify more precisely the object of his admission when required to do so by the creditor; ††and should he refuse to do so the latter may force him to do so by having him committed to prison. When the debtor specifies the object of the admission in a more precise manner, but the creditor contends that this declaration is made in bad faith, the latter must prove his allegation, for he is the plaintiff, and the presumption is always in favour of the defendant. An admission of "a thousand" pieces of money, followed by a second admission of "a thousand" pieces, involves the payment of only one thousand pieces; and where these two admissions do not refer to the same sum, the smaller is ipso facto included in the greater. On the other hand, the two admissions give rise to two distinct obligations where the particulars are not the same; or if one first says, "I received ten pieces of money on Saturday," and then afterwards, "I received ten of them on Sunday."

*An admission constitutes a novation, or substitution of one obligation for another; consequently the words, "I owe him a thousand pieces of money for the wine or the dog he sold me," or "I owe him a thousand pieces of money I have already paid him," result in the person using them having to pay the sum admitted.

If one says, "I owe him such and such a sum as the price of a slave purchased by me, of whom I have not yet taken possession, and I will pay him as soon as he has delivered me this slave," our school considers the sum mentioned as the price offered for the slave, though the payment is not obligatory before delivery takes place. According to our school nothing is due upon the admission of a debt of a thousand pieces of money under the restriction "If God will"; but an admission of a debt creates an obligation, even if it is added that nothing is owing. On bringing one thousand pieces of money, after admitting owing this sum, and saying, "Here they are, as a deposit," *one has the presumption on one's side, provided one takes an oath, where the opposite party contends having yet another credit of the same amount; while on the contrary our school admits a similar presumption in favour of the creditor, where the debtor, on remitting him the amount, does not use words implying a deposit, but speaks to him of "my obligation," or "my debt."

[†Where it is allowed that one can validly declare afterwards that the sum one admits owing was remitted to the creditor only as a deposit, it follows that from the time of the original admission the debtor has a claim against the creditor for loss, and that he can demand restitution of what has been, as it were, intrusted to the latter's good faith. If one has used the expression "six thousand pieces of money are with me," or "I have them upon me," one still has the presumption in one's favour if one afterwards maintains that it was only a deposit, or if one alleges that the sum mentioned has been restored or accidentally lost.]

An admission of a sale or a gift followed by a taking possession of the object does not admit of a subsequent retraction upon the ground that the contract was illegal or the admission the result of an error. All that the debtor can do is to have an oath administered to the creditor in whose favour the admission was made; and it is only if the latter refuses to be sworn that the court may tender the oath to the debtor, who can then free himself from the debt by taking it. When one admits "that a certain house belongs to Zaid," and afterwards corrects oneself and admits "that it belongs to Amr"; or when one admits that one has illegally usurped "the house of Zaid," and subsequently declares "that it was the house of Amr"; the house should be delivered to Zaid, *but Amr can claim the value of it.

An admission may be accompanied by all sorts of exceptions, provided that the clauses containing them are pronounced at the same time as the admission and do not render it illusory. Thus if one says, "I owe him ten, less nine less eight pieces of money," one owes nine. Such a clause of exception may even refer to a thing of a different kind from that admitted, for instance, "I owe a thousand pieces of money minus a coat," in which case the value of the coat must always be considered less than the sum mentioned. A clause of exception is also admissible with reference to definite objects, i.e. one may admit, e.g. "This house is his, except this room," or "These drahms are his, except this drahm." However, with regard to this last class of objects, jurists are not all in agreement, though the great majority adopt the admissibility.

[In saying, "These slaves belong to so-and-so, except one," one makes a valid admission, but one should immediately declare which one is intended. ††If, in such a case, all the slaves die except one, and the person who made the admission declares that this was the slave he intended to except, the presumption is in his favour, if he confirms on oath the truth of his words.]

SECTION 5

An admission of paternity is admissible only on condition that it is in conformity with law and common-sense; thus, one cannot recognise a child that is notoriously another's. The interested person must consent to the admission if legally capable of doing so ; thus an admission does not establish paternity with regard to an adult who opposes it, unless it is legally proved in some other way. †A minor legally recognised as a child cannot annul this by his mere denial upon majority. It is permissible to recognise one's child after death, or during minority, for after attaining majority ; and this recognition is sufficient to give one a claim upon the estate. Where an adult is recognised as their child by two different persons, the paternity is established of the one he accepts as his father. The consequence of a similar recognition in the case of a minor will be explained in the book about foundlings. A declaration on the part of a master " that the child of one of his slaves is his " is sufficient by itself to establish filiation, *but not to enfranchise the slave on account of maternity. The same rule applies to a declaration as follows :—" Such and such a slave belonging to me is the mother of my child." On the other hand, the words, " She conceived while belonging to me," implies enfranchisement on account of paternity. The child of a slave who has frequently shared her master's bed, has no need of special recognition in order to establish filiation. The child of a married slave is the child of the husband ; and in such a case a recognition of paternity by the master would be null and void.

A recognition of relationship, such as, " so and so is my brother," or " my paternal uncle," establishes that relationship, if made under the conditions just mentioned, and provided the person whose paternity is involved is dead. Such recognition is permissible †even though the deceased denied the imputed paternity ; but in every case it is necessary that the person making the declaration should be the deceased's universal heir. †A declaration, however, that one considers a certain individual as one's brother, gives him no claim to any share in the estate, not even to a share in the portion of the person making the declaration. †An adult heir can never of his own accord establish filiation between a third party and the deceased, if there are other heirs, minors. If filiation is admitted by one of the heirs and denied by another, it remains established if the one denying it dies, leaving no other heir except the one who admits it. †And it is established also where, after the father's decease, his son, universal heir, admits that persons of unknown descent are his brothers, while these persons recognise their own filiation, but deny that of the person who makes the admission. †Lastly, where the known heir is excluded from the succession by a person whose relationship he admits, i.e. if e.g. he admits " that his deceased brother left a son," the admission has reference to family rights, but gives no claim to the succession.

BOOK 16.—LOAN

It is necessary that a lender should be legally capable of disposing gratuitously of his property, and that he should have a right to convey the use of the object lent. Thus a lessee or a tenant may lend what they hold as such, ††but not a borrower. There is, however, no objection to the latter allowing a third party the use of a thing borrowed, instead of using it himself. Things that are not consumed by use can alone be the subject of this contract ; whence it follows that a female slave may be lent as a servant, or to a woman, or to a man within the prohibited degrees, but not to a man who can legally cohabit with her. It is blamable to lend a Moslem slave to an infidel.

†The law insists that the lending should be expressly mentioned, e.g. by the words, “ I lend you,” used by the lender, or “ lend me,” said by the borrower. It is sufficient if only one of the two parties has thus expressed himself, provided that the other has shown his consent by his conduct. By saying, “ I lend you my horse on condition that you feed it,” or “ on condition that you lend me yours,” one does not effect a loan, but an irregular contract of hiring, for which a reasonable payment should be made.

The cost of restitution of the thing lent must be borne by the borrower, who is liable for damage if it is even partly destroyed, except by mere usage, even though no negligence can be imputed to him. But where, on the contrary, the thing lent is lost or damaged merely by usage, †the borrower is not responsible ; though even in this case some authorities consider that he is. †A person who borrows something from a lessee or a tenant is not responsible as a borrower, but just as if he were himself the tenant or lessee. Nor would there be any responsibility where a principal lends his agent an animal which dies in the latter's possession in consequence of work ordered by the principal ; nor where an animal dies in the possession of a trainer, to whom the owner intrusted it for the purpose of being trained.

A borrower can use the thing borrowed only in accordance with the agreement. Thus, if a piece of land has been lent to be sown with corn, it may be sown also with similar cereals, unless this has been expressly forbidden ; but if it has been lent to be sown with barley, it cannot be sown with a grain like wheat, which is more prejudicial to the soil. A permission to sow in general is lawful, and gives a borrower the right to sow what he likes. Permission to build or plant implies a right to sow ; but not vice versâ. ††Permission to build neither implies nor is implied by permission to plant. ††Lastly, it is forbidden to lend a piece of land without stipulating the use to which the borrower may put it.

SECTION 2

The lender has the right to demand back, and the borrower to return, the article lent, whenever they please, even where one of them had stipulated for a definite period. To this rule there is one exception ; where a piece of land has been lent for the interment of a corpse, it cannot be taken back until the remains have been duly buried.

Where the owner takes back a piece of land lent for building purposes or for sowing, with no time of restitution mentioned, the borrower is obliged to demolish the buildings or uproot the crop only if this has been specially stipulated. In default of such stipulation the borrower cannot be obliged to do so ; and if he does so of his own free will, †he need not level the ground. [*Levelling is obligatory under these circumstances.]

Where the borrower refuses to demolish buildings or uproot crops without compensation, the owner cannot force him to do so, but may choose one of two courses. He can either leave them on the land, charging the borrower a rent ; or himself carry out the demolition or uprooting, compensating the borrower for the loss of his buildings or his crop. Some authorities maintain that the owner of the land can also appropriate the buildings and crops, paying their value to the borrower. If the owner has not declared, on taking back his land, whether he prefers to retain the buildings or crops, paying compensation to the borrower, or whether he prefers to have them removed, he cannot have them removed later without paying compensation. This rule applies just as well where the borrower pays the compensation of which we have spoken, as a rent, †as where he does not pay it. And some authors maintain that if the owner refuses to decide, the court should sell the land with everything built or sown on it, and pay the owner and borrower their proper share out of the proceeds ; †but the majority are of opinion that the court should not interfere until both parties have declared their wishes with regard to the buildings and the crops. During this period, however, the owner may visit and utilise his land, while the borrower may not visit it without the owner's permission, merely for the sake of amusement, †though he cannot be prevented from going there at any time to water the crop or repair the buildings. Both lender and borrower retain their right to sell what belongs to them; though, according to some jurists, the borrower can only sell his crop or buildings to the owner of the land. A loan, in which a definite time of restitution is specified, is subject to the same rules as regards demolition and uprooting as the loan for an indefinite period with which we have just dealt. Only one authority maintains the contrary opinion, i.e. that in these circumstances the borrower is not liable for any indemnity if, upon the restitution of the land, he wishes to demolish or uproot what he has built or sown. ††An owner who has lent his land with the avowed object of having it cultivated by the borrower, without stipulating for any particular time of restitution, should always, when taking back the crops, leave them standing until the next harvest. ††In this case, however, he can charge a rent for the whole period that may elapse between the restitution and the harvest. Where, on the other hand, the owner has stipulated for a specified time of restitution, and the harvest does not occur before this, the borrower should uproot his crop on the expiry of the term, at any rate if the delay is caused by his own fault, if e.g. he did not sow the field at the usual time. Where a torrent has carried away the crop on to another's seed field, the crop belongs to the original owner, †but he must remove it upon the first notification.

Where a person mounts a horse and says to the owner, "You have lent it me," and the owner replies, "No, I have hired it to you," as well as in a similar dispute between the owner of a field and the sower, our school admits a presumption in the owner's favour. A similar presumption is admitted by our school in the owner's favour where the possessor of something says, "You lent it me," and the owner answers, "No, you usurped it." Whatever may be the result of the proceedings whenever in these circumstances the thing in dispute is destroyed before restitution, the holder is always responsible, either as borrower or as usurper; †with this difference, that a loan involves responsibility only for the value of the thing when lost, and not for the maximum value it may have reached during the period of possession, nor for its value on the day upon which possession was taken of it. Where an owner claims, on account of usurpation, a higher value than the thing had on the day it was lost, he must take an oath as to the surplus value.

BOOK 17.—USURPATION

SECTION 1

USURPATION includes all acts of encroachment, in bad faith, upon the rights of another. Thus the following categories of persons must be considered usurpers :—

1. One who mounts another's beast, or sits upon another's carpet, even without moving it.

2. One who enters a house and drives out the owner ; or without entering himself prevents the owner from entering. This last precept has been contested, though not strongly.

3. A tenant who prevents the owner of a house from entering his room, though leaving him in the peaceable possession of the rest. This act, however, constitutes a usurpation of the room only, not of the whole house.

4. One who enters a house intending to take possession of it, even though the owner may not be there at the moment. If the owner is there, and is not driven out, the fact of entering in this way amounts to a usurpation of half the house. Where, however, the person entering is physically weaker than the owner, the act does not imply a usurpation.

A usurper should immediately restore an object he has taken possession of. He is responsible for any injury, even if accidental, that may happen to it while detained by him, in the same way as if he had caused the loss of an object in some one's lawful possession. Thus a person who opens a sack lying on the ground, so that the contents escape ; or opens one placed upright, so that it falls down and the contents escape in this way ; is in either case liable for damage. If, however, in the latter case, the sack does not fall down in consequence of being opened, but the loss is caused by the wind or some other fortuitous cause, such as an earthquake, he is not liable. A person who opens a bird cage and then shakes it to make the animal fly out, is responsible ; but if he merely opens the cage *he is responsible only when the bird flies away at once, and not when it remains some time inside the open cage.

A person who derives possession from a usurper is responsible for the accidental loss of what he thus holds, even if unaware of the usurpation ; with this distinction, however, that if he knew of it he must be considered as having usurped the thing from the original usurper, and to be just as responsible as he is ; while if he was ignorant of the illegal manner in which it was come by, his responsibility is of the same degree only where the cause of his possession implies such responsibility. Therefore responsibility for accidental loss is admitted, where the third party has obtained the object from the usurper by way of loan, but not where it has been obtained as a deposit. But when a person who has received something from a usurper causes its loss exclusively through his own fault, the responsibility rests upon him in all cases, even though the usurper may have pressed him to take possession of it. Thus the responsibility is admitted of *an individual who is hungry and eats of a plate passed him by a usurper ; and, carrying this principle further, the usurper's responsibility ceases if he passes the plate to the owner and the latter eats it.

SECTION 2

The responsibility of a usurper, in the matter of the life of a slave, can never exceed the value of the individual at the moment of death, without distinguishing between death caused by the usurper, and accidental death. Injuries, not involving payment of a legal indemnity in the case of a free man, are compensated for by payment of the diminution in the slave's value. No attention is paid to whether these injuries have been caused by circumstances not under human control, or whether they are intentional, at least according to Shafii's original opinion. On the other hand, according to the opinion adopted by Shafii during his stay in Egypt, compensation for the intentional injuring of a slave, in such a way as to be liable to the payment of a legal indemnity, is subject to the laws that regulate the " price of blood " for a free man, though this compensation should be estimated according to the value of the individual. Thus, for example, for the loss of one hand, half the slave's value should be paid, just as in the case of a free man half the " price of blood ; " without taking into consideration whether or not the value of the slave has undergone a similar diminution.

Compensation due for domestic animals consists, according to circumstances in payment of the value of the animal or a sum amounting to its diminution in value. As to other things liability differs according as they are or are not sold by measure or weight, and consequently can or cannot have an advance paid on them. †Such are water, sand, copper, precious metals in an unrefined state, musk, camphor, cotton, grapes, flour, but not the perfume called ghaliya, nor the medicine called majun. Compensation for the loss of articles such as these consists in restitution of similar things, whether the loss was intentional or fortuitous ; only if they cannot be procured is payment of the value permissible. †This value is always fixed at the maximum from the moment of usurpation until the time when the impossibility of procuring an equivalent was perceived. If the measurable things usurped have been taken to another town, the owner may still demand restitution ; he can even insist upon the value being paid immediately, until the usurped articles are brought back ; but on their arrival the price provisionally paid must be returned. When the measurable articles have been destroyed at the place they were taken to, the owner can claim an equivalent in either place ; and if there are no equivalents at the place where the demand is made, the usurper is liable for their value at the place where they are the dearer. ††However, an owner who meets a usurper at a place other than that of the loss, can only claim restitution of similar things there, if they do not involve expense for transport, as in the case of coin. If this is not the case he cannot claim at this place the restitution of similar things, but the usurper owes him simply their value at the place where they were lost. Finally, as to things not sold by weight or measure, the usurper always owes their maximum value in the period between the day of usurpation and that of loss ; while in the case of intentional destruction of things not so sold and not usurped, the responsible person is liable only for the value ascertained on the day of the crime. To this rule only one exception is admitted ; when a slave or a domestic animal is wounded, and death ensues without its being possible to attribute it directly to the wound, there is due the maximum value between the day of the crime and the day of death.

A loss of usurped wine involves no liability. It is unlawful to transfer usurped wine to an infidel subject of a Moslem prince, unless he has manifested an intention of drinking it immediately or selling it. However, as long as the usurped wine still exists, its restitution is obligatory, and this last rule even applies to juice of the grape not destined to fermentation, where this juice has been usurped to the owner's prejudice, if he is a Moslem. The same rule applies also to idols and to instruments of gaming or music, which one should break before returning, without incurring any liability. †However, if the owner asks the holder of these things for their return, they should not be all at once rudely shattered ; but the different parts should be detached so as to return to their original condition, and it is only where the owner himself has rendered this impossible, that they may be destroyed in a more rapid manner.

In case of loss, either by his own fault or by accident, the usurper should not only compensate the proprietor up to the value of the thing, but owes him in addition an indemnity for the use he has made of it, at least in the case of something the owner could have leased out in the meantime, such as a horse, a slave, and so on. In the case of a female slave, the usurper owes this indemnity only if he has cohabited with her, and that she has died as a consequence of this. †It is the same with services rendered by a free man, during the period of usurpation. If it is not a question of the loss of the thing usurped, but of its deterioration, not caused by the usurper's usage, the latter, on restoring it is still liable for damage, plus an indemnity by way of rent for the use he has made or might have made of it. This principle must be applied also when the deterioration has been brought about by the usurper, e.g. where a usurped coat has been worn.

SECTION 3

††A usurper who declares that the thing in dispute has been lost, has a presumption in his favour ; provided he takes an oath to that effect, if the statement is contested by the owner. †In this case the owner must be contented to claim damage, according to the principles enunciated in the preceding section. The same presumption is established in the favour of a usurper, on oath, if contested by the owner, as to the value of the article, as to the clothes worn by a usurped slave, and as to the latter's natural defects ; but, on the other hand, the owner enjoys a presumption in his favour, if he maintains on oath the existence of accidental defects in the slave.

A usurper who restores something in dispute at a moment when its price has gone down, owes nothing by way of damage for this diminution in value. Thus when one has usurped, e.g. a coat of the original value of ten drahms that has gone down to one drachm, and has besides worn the coat until it is no longer worth more than half a drachm, one must pay back five drahms as damage, having regard to the rule that requires payment of the maximum value.

[†The usurper of a pair of shoes worth ten drahms, one of which is accidentally lost, so that he can restore only the other worth alone not more than two drahms, owes eight drahms as damage. This sum is due also where the loss is not accidental, but caused after usurpation, or while in the owner's possession.]

Deterioration of such sort as to lead to total loss, e.g. the use of cheese to make harisa, is legally regarded as the same. A single author maintains that even in that case the thing usurped should be restored as it is, together with an indemnity for the deterioration. Where a usurper slave commits a crime punishable by a fine for which his person may be seized, the usurper is liable up to the full value of the slave or of the sum due, whichever is the more advantageous for him, without prejudice to his liability towards the owner, in case of the slave's death. Under these circumstances the injured party has none the less the right to proceed by seizure against the usurper. Should he prefer to take similar action against the owner, and recoup himself out of what the latter has received from the usurper as damage, the owner can take fresh proceedings against the usurper to recover what he has had to pay the injured party. Similarly the owner has a claim against the usurper where, after the return of the slave, he has had to put him up for sale, in order to pay what was due for an offence committed during the period of usurpation.

The usurper of a field, who has removed earth from it, must restore it as it was at first. He must return the earth, or other earth of the same quality. The restitution of the earth that has been removed is obligatory, even without any demand from the owner, if it would be profitable to him. †Otherwise the usurper must wait for the owner's permission. The same principles must be followed if the usurper has dug a well, or filled up one that already existed. If the field has been re-established by the usurper in its original condition, and no permanent deterioration has been caused to it, damage cannot be claimed from the usurper, who is liable merely for reasonable compensation as rent, for the time employed in removing all traces of the usurpation. On the other hand, in the case of a permanent deterioration caused by removal of earth, the usurper owes damage in addition.

†A usurper of olive oil, etc., who has boiled the liquid so that part has evaporated without the total value being diminished, must, all the same, in case of restitution, compensate the owner for the amount lost. In the case where the value of the oil has diminished in consequence of the operation, without diminution in quantity, the usurper still owes damage. Diminution in quantity accompanied by a diminution in the value of the remainder renders it obligatory to compensate the owner for what has evaporated, and return him the rest with damages, if the diminution in value is ever so little greater than that caused by the diminution in quantity alone. †Stoutness acquired by a slave during usurpation cannot be held to compensate for a previous leanness during the same period ; but if a slave who, during usurpation, has lost knowledge of his profession or trade, is in a condition to take to it again, the owner cannot claim damage for this. The fact that the slave has learnt a new trade or profession with the usurper does not in any way affect the latter's liability for knowledge lost.

†If usurped must ferments and then changes into vinegar, the vinegar must be returned to the owner with damages, when the value of the vinegar is less than that of the must. †When impure things, that consequently cannot be claimed back, such as wine that changes to vinegar, or the skin of an animal that has died a natural death and is afterwards tanned, have been usurped, the wine or tanned skin, although it has lost its impurity owing to the usurper, nevertheless belongs to the person from whom it was usurped.

SECTION 4

No increase in the value of a usurped article, consisting in simple amelioration, such as the cleaning of a coat, goes to the profit of the usurper ; and the owner may even insist upon his restoring the thing to its original state, if this is possible, together with any damages that may be due. Where, on the contrary, the increase in the value of the thing has a separate existence, such as a building or a plantation, the usurper should in all cases restore the land to its original condition. †A person who dyes a piece of usurped cloth with his own dye, may be obliged to remove this dye if it is possible. If it is impossible, and the value of the cloth has not been increased by the addition, the usurper can claim nothing, but damages may be claimed from him if there is ground for this. Where, on the other hand, the dyeing has increased the value of the cloth, owner and usurper become its co-proprietors.

If a thing usurped has been mixed with something else belonging to the usurper, it should be separated from it if possible. If this separation is impossible our school considers the thing as destroyed, that is to say the owner can claim from the usurper either a return of the value or something of the same kind not so mixed. Thus a beam that has been usurped and used in building must be removed, even if it has been used in building a ship. The claim, however, cannot be immediately complied with, if made at a moment when the removal of the beam would cause danger to the persons or goods confided to the captain's care.

Cohabitation knowingly practised with a usurped female slave renders the usurper liable to the penalty for fornication ; but not if unknowingly. In both cases, however, the usurper owes dower, unless the cohabitation was accomplished with the woman's full consent. In this latter case †nothing is owing, and the woman is liable to be dealt with severely, if she has knowingly committed the crime. Cohabitation with a female slave purchased from a usurper, has the same consequences, so far as the purchaser is concerned, both as regards the penalty and the dower, as if the usurper himself had been guilty of it. The purchaser has no claim against the usurper for payment of the dower. When a usurper, or some one who has purchased from him a female slave, renders her pregnant, knowing that she was forbidden him, her child becomes the slave of the owner without regard to paternity ; but if it was done unknowingly, the child is free, and considered to be the father's legitimate offspring. In this case, however, the father owes to the mother's owner the value of the child at the time of its birth.

Where, under these circumstances, the child's father buys the mother in good faith from the usurper, he has a claim against him ; although, in general, the purchaser of anything usurped has no claim against the usurper, if the article is destroyed in his possession in a manner which renders him directly responsible towards the owner. *The same principle is followed in the case where the article has not been destroyed, but has only deteriorated. *Neither has the purchaser any claim against the usurper for payment of the indemnity due to the owner for his usage of the article ; †but such claim is admitted for damages paid to the owner, whether for accidental loss or for injury caused, e.g. to a piece of land by demolition of buildings or uprooting of crops, if there was ground for such damages. A usurper who has paid damages for a purchaser can never claim them from him ; even in a case where the latter could have claimed them from the former ; but he may do so if the damage was incurred by the purchaser's own fault.

[Every person who derives his possession from that of the usurper, is subject to the same rules as have now been shown to apply to the first purchaser of a usurped object.]

BOOK 18.—PRE-EMPTION

SECTION 1

THIS right does not exist in reference to movable property, but only with regard to land and what is naturally included in it, like buildings and trees, †and fruit not artificially fertilised. There is no right of pre-emption in the case of a hojra supported on a roof, †even a roof held in common ; †nor in the case of anything that cannot be divided without lowering the value, such as a bath or a mill.

Right of pre-emption exists only in favour of a co-proprietor of the immovable property sold. Thus, where there are two houses belonging to two different persons, both houses having a common outlet to the public road, neither of the two proprietors can, in case of sale, exercise a right of pre-emption with regard to the other's house, on the ground of common ownership of the outlet. ††He cannot even exercise a right of pre-emption with regard to the common outlet, unless the purchaser has another at his disposition, or can open a door upon the public way. There is a right to pre-emption only in the case of transfer of ownership for a consideration and irrevocably, and the transfer must be later than the acquisition of the pre-emptor's rights. Consequently pre-emption is admissible in the following cases : transfer by sale, dower, compensatory price, compromise in the matter of a crime, periodical payment, rent, advance. From these principles ensue the following conclusions :—

1. When, in a sale, a right of option has been stipulated, either by the two contracting parties, or by the vendor alone, a co-proprietor cannot exercise his right of pre-emption before the expiry of the optional time. Where, on the other hand, the purchaser alone has reserved a right of option, *the right of pre-emption can be immediately exercised, at least when it is admitted that in these circumstances the ownership is acquired by the purchaser at the moment of the contract.

2. *When the purchaser, on perceiving that the thing bought has redhibitory defects, wishes to return it to the vendor, while the pre-emptor wishes to accept the thing and waive the redhibition, the latter may exercise his right independently of the rupture of the original sale.

3. If two persons jointly buy a house, wholly or in part, neither can dispossess his co-proprietor by way of pre-emption.

4. *If a piece of land belongs to three co-proprietors, and the first sells his share to the second, the third cannot, by exercising his right of pre-emption, acquire the whole of the part sold, but only in proportion to his original share.

In pre-emption the transfer of ownership is effected without any adjudication on the part of the court ; the price need not be brought ; and the presence of the original purchaser is unnecessary. All that is required is the verbal declaration of the pre-emptor, such as, " I appropriate the whole of the land," or, " I take possession by right of pre-emption." In order that the pre-emption should have full effect, the law requires also that the price of the re-purchase should be delivered to the purchaser. On making this delivery of his own accord, or in consequence of an injunction, the pre-emptor becomes proprietor of the portion he wants. It is, however, also permissible that the purchaser may consent to allow credit to the pre-emptor for the amount of the re-purchase, and that it be pronounced by the court. In both cases delivery of the price of repurchase is unnecessary in order that the ownership of the property claimed should be transferred, although, in the latter case, that ownership can only pass to the pre-emptor on condition that he is present at the sitting, and shows that his claim is well founded. And finally, according to our school, ownership of a portion of an immovable property that the pre-emptor has not yet seen is never transferred.

SECTION 2

As to the compensation due to the purchaser by the pre-emptor, the law admits the following distinctions :—

1. When the purchase has been effected for a price consisting in things sold by measure or weight, the pre-emptor should indemnify the purchaser with similar things.

2. When the purchaser has given in exchange something not sold in this way, the pre-emptor should return him the value, i.e. the value the thing had on the day of sale, or according to others its value on the day the right of option expired, and on which consequently the sale became irrevocable.

3. *When the purchase has been effected on credit, the pre-emptor can at his choice either pay at once and take possession of the immovable property, or he can wait until the term has expired and do so then.

In the case of a combined sale of a portion of an immovable and of some other object, the pre-emptor can exercise his right all the same, provided that he pays what may be considered the price of his portion, in proportion to the total value of the sale.

A portion of an immovable property transferred as dower is subject to a right of pre-emption on the part of a co-proprietor, for a price valued according to the proportional dower the woman in question could claim; and the same rule is observed with regard to a transfer as compensatory price in case of divorce. When the sale of an immovable property subject to pre-emption takes place for a contract price, and this latter is accidentally lost, the owner cannot exercise his right of pre-emption. Where, under these circumstances, the co-proprietor indicates the exact amount which has been paid in this way for the property, while the purchaser declares he knows nothing of it, the latter should confirm his ignorance on oath, and the claim is dismissed. †Neither can it be entertained, where the co-proprietor maintains before the court that the purchaser really knows how much he has paid, without any further indication on his part as to the exact amount.

A subsequent judicial seizure of what the original purchaser has given by way of price, nullifies both sale and pre-emption, at least where the price is some definite thing liable to seizure. Otherwise the things given as price may be replaced, and both the sale and the pre-emption hold good. A right of pre-emption remains unaffected by a seizure of what the pre-emptor has given the purchaser in compensation, whether this is a consequence of the pre-emptor's ignorance, †or whether he knew of the danger. A disposal of the purchased property by the purchaser, by way of sale, wakaf, lease, etc., is not ipso facto annulled by a subsequent pre-emption, but the pre-emptor can demand the cancellation of a disposal which, like wakaf, would render illusory a right of repurchase. In the case, however, of a disposal on the part of the purchaser, which, like a sale, admits of subsequent pre-emption, the person in whose favour this right originally existed may at his choice either exercise it with regard to the second sale, or demand the cancellation of that one, and exercise his right with regard to the former.

In case of dispute between purchaser and pre-emptor upon the subject of the price, the presumption is in favour of the purchaser's statement; and the same is the case where the latter denies the purchase or the status of co-proprietor upon which the plaintiff bases his right of repurchase. †This presumption, however, is destroyed, and the repurchase takes effect, if in these circumstances the co-proprietor who has sold maintains the purchase denied by the purchaser. And it is to this co-proprietor that the pre-emptor then owes the compensation originally due to the purchaser, unless the co-proprietor admits having already received the price. If he does admit it, in spite of the purchaser's denial ; authorities are not agreed as to whether the compensation should be left in the hands of the co-proprietor pre-emptor, or whether the court should seize and keep it for whoever finally establishes his claim to it. This controversy is the same as that we have spoken of, about a confession that is denied by the person in whose favour it is made.

Where several co-proprietors have a joint right of pre-emption, they should exercise it in proportion to their respective shares ; though, according to one jurist, they should do it by heads. When one co-proprietor sells the half of his share in a property, and then the second half to another person, it is understood that the right of pre-emption with regard to the first half belongs to the other of the original co-proprietors ; but if the latter waives his right, the purchaser who has become owner of the first half, shares with him a right of pre-emption with regard to the second half. †A renunciation on the part of one of the two co-proprietors possessing a joint right of pre-emption, prevents him from making any later claim ; the other co-proprietor should then decide, either to exercise his right upon the whole of the property put up for sale, or to renounce his part also. Thus he may not merely exercise his right in proportion to his own share ; but the repurchase being indivisible, even a partial renunciation by one of the parties results in a devolution of the full and entire right of pre-emption to the other. When, of two persons having right to pre-emption, only one is present, he can at once exercise the right in its entirety, on condition of allowing the other to participate in it upon his return ; †though he may instead postpone the repurchase until his co-proprietor's arrival. If two persons have bought in common a share in immovable property, the pre-emptor can exercise his right either against the two together or against one of them ; †but where two of the co-proprietors have sold their respective shares to a single person, the pre-emptor should exercise his right separately with regard to what has been sold by each of his co-proprietors.

*A right of pre-emption should be exercised without delay, and the person having this right should speedily declare his wishes in the matter, in conformity with custom as soon as he has learnt of the sale. If that is impossible through sickness or absence or fear of enemies, he should appoint an agent to act for him, or, if he cannot find one, call witnesses and announce in their presence his intention of exercising his right of pre-emption. The right of pre-emption lapses †if no agent is appointed, or no intention expressed before witnesses, where this might have been done ; but a person at prayer, at the bath, or at a meal can postpone his declaration until he has finished. A prolonged delay involves the loss of the right of pre-emption, even although the pre-emptor declares that he did not believe the person who brought the news of the sale, at any rate if it was brought him by two persons of irreproachable character, for even by a single person worthy of confidence. He is permitted to disbelieve in the truth of the news of the sale only where it is brought him by persons whose deposition would not be accepted in a court of law. However, if the co-proprietor learns that the sale has taken place, e.g. for a thousand pieces of money, in consequence of which price he renounces his right of pre-emption ; his right remains intact, in spite of his renunciation, if it subsequently transpires that the sale was concluded for five hundred only ; though, on the contrary, it remains irrevocably lost if it afterwards appears to have been concluded for more than a thousand. Neither is there any loss of the right of pre-emption where the pre-emptor, meeting the purchaser after learning of the sale, salutes him, saying, " Peace be with you," or " God bless you in the acquisition you have made." However, all authorities are not in agreement as to the consequences of an exclamation which, like the latter, contains an invocation of the name of God.

†There is no right of pre-emption, if, after a sale by one of the co-proprietors, the other, who is thus entitled to appropriate the entire property, has himself sold his share also to a third party, even though this sale was effected in ignorance of the other.

BOOK 19.—JOINT-STOCK COMPANIES

SECTION 1

A JOINT-STOCK company is called kirad, or Modaraba. It exists between two persons, one of whom supplies funds to the other to trade with, on condition that the former has a share in the profit. The law requires that these funds :—

1. Consist in gold or silver coin ; consequently the company has no legal existence where the funds are given in the form of bullion, or gold or silver ornaments, adulterated coin, or goods.

2. Are of a known amount and consist in coins of known value ; though others maintain that it is sufficient to indicate the amount, e.g. “ the contents of one of the two purses.”

3. Are remitted to the managing partner ; for the money may not be left in the hands of the person who furnishes the funds.

It may not be stipulated that the sleeping partner should take part in the management, †† though his slave may be employed in the affairs of the company. The powers of the responsible partner are limited to trading and what depends on it, such as exposing for sale, and placing the stuffs in their covers or rolls. Thus when one forms a joint-stock company with some one in order that he may buy wheat and sell it after grinding and baking into bread, or when one instructs him to buy cotton thread and sell it after weaving, the company is ipso facto invalid. † Neither can one instruct the managing partner to buy certain specified goods, nor such as are of a rare kind, nor to trade with only one specified individual.

It is not necessary to stipulate any period of duration for the company ; and if it is stipulated that after a certain time the responsible partner cannot dispose further of the funds, this stipulation will even involve the illegality of the contract. There is, however, no objection to instructing him to abstain from certain specified proceedings, e.g. to buy after a certain lapse of time.

Both partners, sleeping and managing, share in the profits to the exclusion of all others. Consequently the words, “ I form a joint-stock company with you, and all that you gain will be yours,” do not constitute a legal association ; though others maintain its validity. It is the same if the words used are "all the profit shall be mine;" though, according to others, this constitutes a commission agency. Besides this the share of each partner in the profits must be mentioned in their respective proportion. Thus one cannot associate with some one by stipulating, "You will have a part of the profits," or "a part in the profits," without indicating what part; †but one can do so by providing that "the gain shall be common to both of us," and then each partner can claim half. ††Although it is admitted to be a legal contract when the person who provides the funds says to the manager, "Half the gain will be yours," †if he says, "Half the gain shall be mine," and nothing more, the association is invalid. And this would also be the case if it were stipulated that one of the partners should have ten pieces of money from the profits, or should take all the profits of a certain nature.

SECTION 2

For the contract to be valid there should be an offer by one of the parties and acceptance by the other; though, according to some authorities, acceptance need not be formally announced, provided it exists in fact.

The relations between the managing partner and the sleeping partner are the same as those between agent and principal. †A managing partner cannot in his turn form a joint-stock company with a third person, participating both in the management and in the profits, even if the original provider of the funds authorises it. Without his authorisation such secondary association is considered wholly illegal, i.e. any dispositions the third person may make are considered to be those of a usurper; †and this principle is carried still further, for if the second managing partner buys on credit for the company, any profit that may result from this purchase goes entirely to the original manager, who owes nothing to the second except remuneration for his services, if there is occasion for this. It is, however, well known, that, according to the opinion of Shafii in his second period, a usurper who has effected a similar sale can keep the profit for himself. Only a few authorities maintain that in these circumstances the profit belongs also to the second managing partner who has obtained it. A purchase effected by the second managing partner, not on credit, but for cash, or for some specified thing belonging to the company, is absolutely null and void. There is, however, no objection to one person associating himself with two others by furnishing them with funds, either of the same or of different amounts; and similarly two persons supplying funds may associate themselves with a single managing partner. In the latter case the profits are shared between them in proportion to their capital, after deducting the share of the managing partner. In all cases where a joint-stock company is illegal, dispositions made in good faith by the managing partner remain intact ; but the profit is for the person who supplied the funds, who owes the manager reasonable remuneration for his trouble. †It is only in a case where the contract is invalid owing to the sleeping partner reserving all the profit for himself, that the manager can claim nothing.

The managing partner should administer the society's affairs like the good father of a family ; he is responsible if he allows himself to be caught by any obvious fraud. He is forbidden to sell on credit without the sleeping partner's authorisation, but he can alienate by exchange, and cancel a bargain on account of redhibitory defects, or keep a thing bought in spite of its redhibitory defects, as circumstances require. Redhibition is a right of the person who supplies the funds just as much as of the manager, and where the two are not agreed about the redhibition of a thing bought, that course should be adopted which offers the greater advantage. The managing partner can never in any case, on account of the company, enter into commercial relations with the person who provides the funds. He must not purchase goods to a larger amount than the capital of the company ; nor must he buy a slave whose enfranchisement would be obligatory for the sleeping partner, except with his consent. †This rule applies also to the purchase of a slave married to the latter. In all cases where the managing partner effects a forbidden purchase, the person supplying the funds is not bound by it ; but the managing partner is personally responsible if it was on credit. The managing partner cannot take the capital of the company with him on a journey without the authorisation of the sleeping partner, nor can he use it for his personal expenses whether at home *or on a journey. He must act in conformity with custom, e.g. he should place in covers or rolls the stuffs in his shop ; he should at once personally ascertain the weight of precious or light articles, such as gold or musk, but this is not necessary with heavy or voluminous merchandise.

A managing partner may credit himself with the salary of employees, for any work he is not obliged to do himself as managing partner. *His share of the profits becomes his property only upon division, not upon his merely drawing up a balance sheet. Fruit, the young of animals, profit realised from slave labour, and the dower of a female slave given in marriage, belong to the person who supplies the funds ; though others consider them as forming part of the profits of the company. Losses caused by a fall in price are deducted from the profits if possible, and should be compensated for in the same way. †This principle should be followed also in the case of a loss of part of the capital, whether by accident, usurpation or theft; fall on condition that the loss is incurred after the managing partner's administration has begun, for any previous loss constitute a diminution of the capital supplied.

Each partner has a right to withdraw from the company, which is terminated ipso facto by the death or madness or even by the unconsciousness of one of the partners. After the dissolution of the company, on the wish of one of the parties, it is the managing partners' duty to proceed to the payment of the debts and the realisation of the capital, at least if it consists of merchandise. Only a small number of jurists maintain that realisation is not obligatory, at least if no profit is expected from it.

If the sleeping partner withdraws a part of the money before a profit and loss account has been drawn up, this fact constitutes a diminution of the total capital of the company; if after then it is a diminution both of the capital and of the profits. Where, for example, the capital is a hundred pieces of money, and the profit twenty, and the sleeping partner wishes to withdraw twenty more, a sixth of the sum claimed must be taken from the profits, all without prejudice to the share in the profits stipulated for by the managing partner. The remaining five-sixths are taken from the capital. If the sleeping partner wishes to withdraw a part of the capital of the company, and it appears that the company has incurred a loss, the loss must be shared both on the sum claimed and on the rest of the company's capital; but under these circumstances any profits which may subsequently be realised do not render it necessary to compensate the sleeping partner for the proportional diminution of the sum he wished to withdraw. Where, for example the capital of the company is one hundred pieces of money and the loss twenty and the sleeping partner expresses a desire to withdraw twenty more, this sum is diminished to a quarter, that is to five, and the capital of the company is thus reduced to seventy-five.

The declaration of the managing partner, confirmed on oath, is presumed to be true, when it relates to:—

1. The absence of any profit, or the total of the profit.
2. His purchase of a thing for the company, or on his own account.
3. The absence of any prohibition by the sleeping partner to effect a particular bargain.

4. The total amount of the funds supplied.
5. The loss of any article belonging to the company.
6. †The restitution of the sums or articles of value supplied.

In case of dispute as to the share in profits stipulated for by the managing partner, both parties should take an oath, and the court then awards the managing partner a reasonable remuneration for his trouble.

BOOK 20.—FARMING LEASES

SECTION 1

A FARMING lease (mosaka) is lawful only if concluded by a person enjoying a right to dispose of his property ; consequently a minor or a lunatic is incapable of effecting it except through his guardian or curator. Plantations of palms or vines are alone subject to this contract ; though Shafii in his first period admitted similar leases with regard to all kinds of fruit trees. Besides this a farming lease cannot be effected on condition that the cultivator shall plough the field and share the produce with the owner, whether the seed is provided by the one or the other. Such leases are called respectively mokhabara and mozaraa. But if between the palms there are bits of uncultivated land, a contract of mosaka may be combined with one of mozaraa, provided it is the same cultivator in each case, and that it would be difficult to proceed separately to the watering of the palms and to the ploughing of the intermediate portions of uncultivated land. †In the case of such a combination the law insists that the two contracts must be considered as forming one only, without the mozaraa predominating ; but with that exception it matters little whether there is much uncultivated land between the trees or only a small portion. †Nor is it necessary that the fruit should be shared between cultivator and proprietor in the same proportion as in a division of the harvest. †A contract of mokhabara, one, i.e. by virtue of which the cultivator gives the seed, is never lawful, even as an accessory to a contract of mosaka.

Where, in defiance of the law, a contract of mokhabara is effected by itself, all the produce of the field belongs to the owner, who owes the cultivator nothing but a remuneration for his labour, and for the animals and implements used in ploughing. If necessary, however, both cultivator and proprietor may be made to share in the profits of the crop, without its being requisite for the latter to remunerate the former when recourse is had to one of the following ways of eluding the law :—

1. The cultivator has hired his services to the proprietor for half the seed, under condition of sowing the other half to the profit of the owner who on his part lends him half the field.

2. The cultivator lends his services to the proprietor for half of both the seed and the field, under condition of sowing the other half of the field with the rest of the seed.

SECTION 2

It is necessary that the fruit of the trees should become the exclusive and common property of the proprietor and the cultivator, and that the share of each should be proportionally determined as in a joint-stock company. Moreover, a contract of mosaka can be legally effected, *even after the appearance of the fruit, provided it is before the first signs of maturity, but the cultivator may not be given palm shoots for planting on condition that the trees become the common property of himself and of the owner. It is only after the shoots are already planted in the soil that the cultivator may be promised a share of the future fruit as a remuneration for his labour upon the trees, if at least a period of time has been stipulated equal to that in which the trees planted usually bear fruit. When on the contrary the time stipulated is shorter than this the whole transaction is illegal; though some authorities maintain its validity even then, provided the time is not so very short as to render it wholly impossible that the fruit can be gathered before the end of it. One of the joint owners of a plantation can undertake to look after the trees of the whole of it by himself, provided that he reserves to himself a certain quantity of the fruit, exceeding the portion that is his by right.

The law requires also :—

1. That the cultivator shall not take upon himself obligations of any kind not relating to the cultivation.

2. That the cultivator alone does the work, and occupies the garden or the orchard.

3. That the length of continuance of the labour is known. It may be stipulated, for example, that the contract shall expire after a year's time, or that it shall last longer. †But the length cannot be lawfully determined by the words : “until the fruit comes to maturity.”

The words by which the contract may properly be expressed are : “I give you charge to water these palm-trees for so much,” or “I cede you my plantation to be taken care of.” The cultivator must then manifest his consent, without its being necessary to announce in detail in what the work is to consist.

In default of special agreement to the contrary, the contract relates to everything that is usually comprised in it; i.e., the cultivator must not only do all that is necessary to enable the fruit to ripen, but must also undertake all the work that has to be repeated each year, such as watering, cleaning the channels for the water, upkeep of the little reservoirs at the foot of the trees, fertilisation of the flowers, weeding, removal of dead branches hurtful to the development of the trees, construction of trellises for the vines, according to usage. †He must also protect and shelter the fruit, and also pluck and dry it. On the other hand, everything that is required in order to preserve the trees themselves, and all work that is not repeated each year, like the construction of walls and new water channels, is the duty of the owner. Neither party can withdraw from a contract of mosaka ; consequently the cultivator who runs away before the expiry of the contract remains none the less liable for damage to the owner, even though the latter voluntarily undertakes to look after the garden. The court should engage another person at the cultivator's expense, to take care of the plantation, if the owner is not disposed to undertake it personally ; and if the owner is unable to take the matter before the court, he can engage a workman of his own initiative. By doing so, however, he loses his right of proceeding against the absent cultivator, unless he has the cost of cultivation established by witnesses. If the cultivator dies the contract becomes part of the estate, and his heirs should continue it ; but they have the choice either to cultivate the plantation in person, or to employ workmen to do so. If it is established that the cultivator has committed some fraudulent action, the owner may appoint an overseer ; and if this is insufficient, may engage another person to complete the work at the cultivator's expense. Finally, in case of a judicial seizure of the fruit, the cultivator can always insist that the owner shall pay him a reasonable salary.

BOOK 21.—CONTRACT OF HIRING

SECTION 1

THE two contracting parties are subject to the same conditions as the vendor and purchaser. The contract is formulated by the words, "I give you this on hire," or "I make you lessee," or "I cede you the use of it for a year for so much;" to which the other party replies, "I accept," "I take," or "I wish to be the lessee of it." †The contract may also be expressed in the words, "I hire you the use of it," but not by saying, "I sell you the use of it."

The contract of hiring is of two kinds. It may either refer to a particular thing, such as the rent of immovable property, or the hiring of an animal or slave specially indicated; or it may refer to something not yet determined, such as the hiring of an animal of which only the species is described, or the hiring of some one's services for some work indicated in a general manner, for example to sew or to build. When one says to a workman, "I engage you to make such and such a thing," this hiring applies to a specified object; though according to the opinion of some authorities this is a contract of hiring of the second kind. Between the two kinds there is first of all this difference that the contract of hiring of the second kind cannot exist unless the rent or the workman's salary is paid at once; while this is not necessary in a contract of hiring of which the object is certain and specific. In the case of the latter the payment can be made either in cash at once or at a fixed date if such is the agreement. If nothing has been agreed upon as to this, the payment should always be made at once, and the ownership of the sum given as rent, etc., passes at once to the tenant or the workman. In all cases the law requires that the rent or the salary shall be known; consequently it cannot consist of a field or the upkeep of an animal. One cannot hire one's services to skin an animal stipulating for its skin as salary; nor stipulate for a right to a part of the flour, as reward for grinding corn; nor for the refuse that passes through the strainer in sifting grain. ††But it is permissible to engage a woman to give suck to a child slave, and to grant her at once a part ownership in it.

The use to which the thing hired is put, or the labour, should be of a nature of which the price can be legally fixed. Consequently one may take on hire :—

1. The services of a hawker, telling him he will not need to tire himself, provided there is a sale for the goods.

2. †Gold or silver coin, to be used as ornaments.

3. A dog for hunting.

It is necessary that the person letting on hire should be in a condition to deliver the gratification he engages to supply. From this it follows :—

1. That one cannot hire out a runaway slave ; nor goods that a third party has usurped.

2. That a blind man cannot hire himself out as a watchman.

3. That a field with no means of irrigation and as a rule insufficiently watered by rain cannot be taken for sowing. For the renting of a field for sowing is possible only if it has means of irrigation, or if there is usually sufficient rain to water it, or if there is †usually an accumulation of snow sufficient to be used for this purpose.

If a precept of the law renders the use of an object impossible, one should act as if it were a physical impossibility. Thus one may not lend one's services to take out a sound tooth ; a woman undergoing menstruation may not be engaged as servant in a mosque ; †and a married woman may not be engaged as nurse, etc., unless she obtains her husband's permission.

A term may be stipulated for the use of a thing or the engagement of personal services, if the object of the contract is not some specific article ; e.g. one may say, " I engage you to take such and such a thing to Mecca, on the first of such month ; " but it is not permissible to hire some particular thing, in order to make future use of it. †There is, however, no objection to one's letting one's house for a second year to the tenant of the first year, before its termination ; and hiring out by turns is also lawful. By this last is meant either that one hires one's mount to some one to use for a part of the way only, or that one hires it to two persons to use alternatively on different days. In these cases the respective rights should be clearly announced in the contract before allotment.

It is also necessary that the use should be known, and that its duration should be limited to a particular period, such as the rent of a house for a year ; or that the duration should be limited by the nature of what is stipulated, such as the hiring of a mount for the journey to Mecca, or hiring out one's services to make a coat of such and such a piece of cloth. †In such cases, however, the duration and nature of the agreement may not both be indicated ; thus one cannot engage a tailor “ for a whole day to make a coat of such and such piece of cloth.” If one hires out one’s services to teach the Koran, it is necessary to determine the length of the lessons or to specify the chapters that are to be taught ; while in the case of a building the site, length, breadth, height, and materials must be indicated, if the agreement is to be determined by the nature of the work. A piece of land naturally adapted either for building on or for cultivation cannot be rented without specifying the particular use that is to be made of it ; though it is sufficient to stipulate, e.g. that it is to be sown †without giving any fuller details as to the manner of cultivation. One may even say in general, “ You can use it as you like,” †for “ You can sow it, or plant trees on it, as you like.”

When an animal is hired as a mount, the rider must be indicated, either by presenting him to the owner ; or by pointing him out so that there can remain no uncertainty as to his identity, but this latter method is disapproved by some authorities. It is the same as regards the manner in which the animal is to be ridden, i.e. it must be mentioned if a litter or any other burden is to be placed upon it. †Consequently a contract must be considered illegal which stipulates only that the animal shall carry “ what is placed upon it ” without specifying what. If nothing is agreed to upon the subject, nothing can be loaded upon the animal. If the contract refers to some particular animal, that animal must be specified. As to whether it must have been seen there is the same controversy as upon the subject of the validity of the sale of an object which is not there. Where, on the other hand, it is not a particular animal that is hired, but only one of a certain species, without regard to the individual, it is enough to mention the nature and species, and indicate whether it is male or female. In both cases, however, the daily journey should be stipulated ; unless there are fixed stations on the road, when the animal must be rested at those stations, even if no stipulation has been made upon the matter. *When a beast of burden is hired, it is absolutely necessary in all cases that the two parties should know what it is to carry. Thus, if the goods are on the spot, they must be inspected, and raised with the hand if they are in packages ; and if they are things to be found elsewhere, measure, weight, and quality should be mentioned. But it is not necessary to know the nature of a beast of burden, nor its qualities, when no particular animal is in view except in the case of transport of glass or other fragile articles that require extraordinary precautions.

SECTION 3

A Moslem cannot be hired to take part in the war against infidels, nor to perform his duties towards God, where an intention is necessary, except as far as regards the pilgrimage, and the distribution of the tax. On the other hand, a person may be engaged to perform funeral ceremonies, including burial, and to teach the Koran. Similarly a woman may be engaged to nurse a child and give it suck, either for both these obligations combined, or for one or the other, for they are two distinct obligations. To nurse a child means to look after it and wash both its head and body, to clean its clothes, put pomade on its hair, and ointment round its eyes, put it to bed and rock it to sleep. From these principles it follows that when a woman has been hired to nurse and give suck to a child, our school admits that the contract is ipso facto dissolved, so far as concerns the suckling, when the breasts are dry ; but, in spite of this, it holds good for the nursing. †A copyist is not bound to bring ink at his own expense, nor a tailor thread, nor an eye-doctor collyrium.

[Rafii has shown in his commentary that in such a case everything depends on custom ; if there is no custom, special stipulations should always be made with regard to the obligations just mentioned ; otherwise the whole contract is null and void.]

SECTION 4

The landlord should give the tenant the keys of the house, and keep it in good repair ; for if it is uninhabitable, and the landlord does not hasten to repair it, the tenant may cancel the agreement for the renting of it. It is also the landlord's duty to clear the snow from the roof ; but the tenant has to clear away the snow fallen in the court yard, and have the house swept. In the case of an animal hired to ride, the owner must supply an ikaf or shabrack, a pack-saddle, a girth, a crupper, a nose-ring, except in the case of a camel, and a bridle ; while litter, baldachin, mattress, blanket, and accessories must be supplied by the hirer. †Custom decides which of the two parties supplies the saddle. The packing of goods for transport is the duty of the owner of the animal, at least where a specified animal has not been hired ; for in the latter case the expense of packing must be borne by the hirer, and the owner must accompany his animal to take care of it, and lend the rider assistance to mount and dismount, if it be at all necessary. In the case of a beast of burden the owner should accompany it in order to load and unload it, or to fasten and unfasten the litter. On the other hand, where some specified animal is hired, the owner need merely give the hirer opportunity to make use of it. The hiring of some specified animal is cancelled ipso facto by the death of the animal ; and in case of redhibitory defects, the hirer has a right to cancel the contract. If it is not a specified animal that has been hired, the death of the animal the owner had in view does not of itself give rise to the dissolution or cancellation of the contract, for he is obliged, if necessary, to supply another. *Provisions taken on a journey by the owner of the animal and by the hirer for their mutual nourishment, should be replaced with others by the party who has consumed them.

SECTION 5

A contract of hiring may be entered into for as long a period as the ordinary duration of the thing hired. According, however, to one jurist, the term can never exceed one year ; another fixes the maximum at thirty years.

The hirer may make use of the thing hired, either personally, or by an intermediary. The only thing insisted on is that a substitute empowered to ride an animal or inhabit a house should not be of an essentially different condition of life from that of the principal hirer or tenant. Thus, for example, one cannot sublet a house to a blacksmith or a scourer.

The owner cannot replace the thing whose use he has to permit, e.g. a house or a mount, by any other object, even of the same kind, at least if it is a case of something specified. *But a person who has engaged some one, e.g. to sew a coat or suckle a child, even if these are specified, may substitute another coat or another child.

During the term of the contract, †and even after its expiry, the hirer's possession is considered to be of the same nature as that of a depositary. Thus a person who hires an animal to carry a load or to ride, and does not use it, but merely ties it up somewhere, is only responsible if the stable collapses while the animal is tied up in it, and at a time when the animal could not have been injured if the person had made use of it. In case of the accidental loss of an article entrusted to the care of a workman, without any fault upon his part, for instance the loss of a coat he has been told to mend or dye, he is not responsible. This rule applies not only to the case where the workman has no exclusive possession of the article, for instance, where the owner sits by his side during the work, or makes him come to his house to do it, *but also to the contrary case. Some authors, however, maintain a different opinion, distinguishing between a workman on contract and an ordinary workman, and contend that the former is responsible, but not the latter, who merely supplies his labour for a specified piece of work, or for a specified time.

A workman to whom a coat has been entrusted for scouring or mending, without mentioning any wages, cannot claim any wages after the termination of the work. Some authorities, it is true, maintain the contrary; while others contend that under these circumstances the workman should be remunerated, if that particular kind of work is his trade, though not otherwise. Obviously the latter are right.

In all cases where it can be shown to be the hirer's fault, he is responsible for the loss of the thing hired, as for instance if he gives more blows to an animal, or stops it more suddenly, than is usual; or if he allows it to be ridden by a heavier rider than himself; or if he allows a house which he has hired to be occupied by a blacksmith or a scourer. The same principle applies to the responsibility of a person who hires an animal for carrying a weight of one hundred ratal of wheat, and makes it carry a weight of one hundred ratal of barley, or vice versa; or who hires it to carry a measure of ten kafiz of barley, and loads it with a measure of ten kafiz of wheat; for these changes really cause an aggravation of the beast's burden. But no responsibility is incurred by replacing ten kafiz of barley with ten kafiz of wheat. A person who hires an animal to carry one hundred pounds and loads it with one hundred and ten, owes to the owner a reasonable indemnity for the surplus; and he is responsible for the death of the animal if this is caused by the additional load, unless the owner accompanied him and consented to it. In these circumstances the hirer owes for the death of the animal an indemnity proportional to the extra service rendered, or, according to one jurist, half the value of the animal. Our school admits the responsibility of the hirer in a case where the one hundred and ten pounds are delivered to the owner of the animal, who undertakes the transport in ignorance of the excess; but if the owner undertakes the transport after ascertaining the weight and without raising any objection about the surplus, the law prescribes neither indemnity nor responsibility on the part of the hirer.

*When a piece of cloth is delivered to a tailor to make into clothing, and he makes a coat out of it and says that was the order given, and the owner says his order was for a shirt, the presumption is in favour of the owner, provided he takes an oath to that effect; and not only does he owe nothing to the tailor, but the latter is liable for damages.

SECTION 6

A contract of hiring remains intact, even where the hirer is prevented from making use of the thing hired, for example, if he has no combustibles for heating his bath, or cannot use it on account of a journey, or if he falls ill after hiring an animal for a journey. Nor can a contract of hiring be cancelled when the crop from a field hired for sowing perishes from some calamity. In none of these circumstances may even a partial remission of the amount of the hire be claimed. On the other hand, the contract is ipso facto dissolved by the death of the animal or of the workman ; at least if it is a specified animal or a particular workman ; but the consequences of this dissolution are not retrospective. Therefore the hire or the wages are due in proportion to the work done or the use made of the article. Except in the case of a hiring of the labour or services of a particular workman, the contract is not dissolved by the death of the contracting parties, even if the lessor be the trustee of a wakaf. †But where the hiring has been contracted by the trustee of a wakaf with a life interest, of the first generation, for a certain time, the contract is dissolved by his death before the expiration of that term. ‡On the other hand, if a guardian agrees that his ward shall go and work with some one as an apprentice for a salary, and for a term that expires before he can attain the age of puberty, the agreement holds good up to the expiration of that term, even though majority were attained before the legal age by the occurrence of nocturnal pollutions. The renting of a house is cancelled ipso facto by the fall of the building. But the renting of a field is not cancelled by a failure of its means of irrigation ; though the farmer may cancel the agreement. The usurpation of an animal or the escape of a slave also give a person who has hired them a right of cancellation.

When, after hiring out one's camels to some one, one leaves them at his domicile, he must apply to the court before proceeding to seize the camel-driver's goods for the cost of their up-keep. If the camel-driver has nothing that can be seized, the court should borrow money for him, and deliver it to the hirer if it can trust him ; if not, it should deposit the amount with some person worthy of confidence. In case of necessity the court can even proceed to sell some of the camels left in order to defray the cost of upkeep of the others. *Or, finally, the court can authorise the hirer to keep the camels at his own expense, in which case he can recover the cost from the owner.

The taking of possession of an animal by the hirer, or of a house by the tenant, and the fact of having kept the one or occupied the other until the expiry of the contract, suffice together to constitute an obligation to pay the price, even though no use has been made of the thing hired. It is the same where an animal is hired for a journey to some specified place, and kept until the time necessary for such a journey has expired. It is of no consequence whether it is or is not a particular specified animal, provided that in the latter case the owner really delivers to the hirer an animal that possesses the qualities stipulated. ††In the case of an illegal hiring, a reasonable remuneration is due, in proportion to the time during which the object is retained.

The contract is ipso facto dissolved where the owner does not deliver the object to the hirer within the time agreed upon ; †but where no time has been fixed for the duration of the hiring, no such consequence follows even where an animal is hired for a journey to some particular place, and the owner delivers the animal to the hirer after the time for such a journey has expired. Nor is the agreement affected by the enfranchisement of a slave just hired ; for in these circumstances, the freed slave can †neither break the engagement entered into by his master *nor recover from him the wages he might have gained for his services after his enfranchisement. The sale of an object hired out to a tenant is lawful, †and does not affect the hiring ; *one may even admit the validity of the sale of an object hired out to a third party without the hiring being in any way affected.

BOOK 22.—OCCUPATION OF LAND

SECTION 1

EVERY believer may, by clearing it, appropriate any piece of land, situated in a Moslem country, that has never been cultivated or built upon. Infidel subjects of our Sovereign do not enjoy this right. Uncultivated land in an infidel country can be so occupied either by an infidel or a Moslem; provided it is not a piece of land from which a Moslem has been expelled, for this must return to its former owner by virtue of the jus postliminii. Land that has been cultivated or built upon belongs to its proprietor; and land that still bears traces of occupation previous to the conversion of the country to Islam, but of which the owner is unknown, is regarded as a thing lost, and consequently not susceptible of appropriation. *Where, on the other hand, the abandonment of the land dates from a period before the conversion ownership may be acquired by clearing it.

Land that, though uncultivated and unbuilt upon, serves as harim to other land already occupied, cannot be appropriated by clearing. By harim is understood land contiguous to other land, the use of which it renders possible. Thus, in a village the place of meeting of the inhabitants, the training ground, the place for the camels, the ditch for depositing filth, and so on, must be considered harim; while the harim of a well situated in uncultivated land consists of the place where one stands to draw water, the trough, the irrigation wheel, the reservoir, and the place necessary for the animal to turn the wheel. The harim of a house situated in uncultivated land includes the ditches for filth, for odure and for snow, and the space necessary to leave or enter by the door. One must also consider as the harim the reservoirs of a conduit of water, as far round as a well cannot be sunk without affecting the quantity of water or threatening the solidity of the reservoir. A house immediately surrounded by others has no harim.

One may dispose of one's property in conformity with custom, and one is responsible for the prejudice caused to one's neighbour only in the case of a disposition or act of an exceptional nature. †One may convert one's house, even if surrounded by other buildings, into a bath or a stable, or establish a forge in one's shop situated perhaps in the bazar of the dealers in old clothes, provided that the shop is shut off on all sides from the neighbouring dwellings by walls.

†Clearing is permissible on the sacred territory of Mecca, with the exception of Mount Arafa. [Mozdalifa and Mina are subject to the same law as Mount Arafa.]

Clearing differs according to the object in view. Thus, if a habitation is to be built, it is necessary, before the habitation can be considered finished, that the land should be surrounded with a wall, that a part of it should be covered with a roof, and a door built, though the necessity of building a door has been called in question. In the case of an enclosure for animals, it is necessary to have a surrounding wall, but the land need not be covered with a roof. Authorities are not agreed as to the necessity of a door in such a case. If it is a matter of clearing a field, the sand must be removed from all parts of it, the land must be levelled and the necessary works constructed for its irrigation, unless the ordinary rains suffice; but the law does not require it to be sown. In the case of a garden, the sand must be removed, the land surrounded by a wall or a hedge, if such is the custom, and means of irrigation prepared; and, according to our school, trees must be planted.

When one has begun to clear land without finishing, or, what is more, when one has only marked a piece of land with stones or stakes, and not yet begun to clear it properly speaking, one is considered to be the first occupier, and one has a prior right to continue the work in preference to any other person. †However, it is forbidden to sell this purely personal right, and if in the meanwhile any one in good faith clears the land, he will be considered as the owner. Consequently, if the first occupier allows too long an interval to elapse before continuing the clearing the Sultan should notify him either to continue it or to abandon the land, allowing him a short respite if he asks for it. A person who has obtained a concession from the Sovereign has, so far as clearing is concerned, the same right of preference as a person who has begun to clear but not continued. Such concession is only to be given to a person able to complete his undertaking, and in proportion to the means at his disposal. This latter principle is applicable also to the preference that results from the simple occupation of which we have just spoken.

*The Sovereign may reserve a part of the uncultivated land, in order to pasture upon it—

1. Cattle given as capitation or assessment.
2. Cattle escaped from a stable or enclosure and seized by the police.
3. Cattle belonging to persons incapable of obtaining forage.

*He also has a right of dispensation with regard to the regulating of land so reserved, if it is necessary ; but he can never reserve uncultivated land for his own use.

SECTION 2

By enjoyment of the public road is understood the right of each person to go along it, to sit down and rest, to speak of one's business, etc., without in any way annoying the passers-by. One has no need of any special permission of the Sovereign in order to rest, etc., upon the public road ; and one may even shade the place where one sits with a mat, etc. If two persons want to occupy the same spot on the public road at the same time, chance should decide between them, or, according to others, the public authority. If any one who sits on the public road to sell his goods, leaves his place, either because he wishes to discontinue that means of livelihood, or because he wishes to occupy another place, he loses all his rights ; but if he goes intending to return, his rights remain intact, unless his absence is so prolonged that his customers go to some one else.

A learned man who habitually frequents a certain part of the mosque to pronounce his decisions and to teach, should be regarded in the same way as a person established upon the public way to carry on his business ; but if one is merely sitting in the mosque to accomplish a prayer, one has no right to occupy the same place again, in preference to another person, in order to say a later prayer. †A person who chooses a place in a mosque for prayer, and leaves it for some reason intending to return, does not lose his right to return to it, in preference to all other persons, if he wishes to finish the prayer he has begun. He need not even leave his cloak to show that the place is occupied. The traveller who takes up his quarters at a public inn, or the doctor-at-law who installs himself at a college, or the sufi at a monastery, should be left in peace, and their place should not be occupied by others, if they happen to leave it to buy necessities, etc.

SECTION 3

“ Visible ” mines, those, that is, from which material can be extracted without preliminary labour, as in the case of deposits of naphtha, sulphur, pitch, or bitumen, or in the case of millstone quarries, do not become private property by exploitation, and no preferential right arises from first occupancy, nor even from a concession from the Sovereign. If the yield of the mine is not abundant, the first occupier can take from the mine what is enough for his needs ; †but if he wants to take more, it may be prohibited. †Drawing lots must decide the priority, where two or more persons want to begin the exploitation at the same time. "Hidden" mines, those, that is, from which nothing can be extracted without preliminary labour, as gold, silver, iron, and copper mines, *do not become private property by the mere fact of digging and exploitation, any more than "visible" ones ; but if a person clears uncultivated land, and discovers in it a "hidden" mine, he obtains the ownership of it, as an accessory to the soil.

Every one has an equal right to the water of rivers and springs in the mountains, if it is ascertained that no one has obtained exclusive possession of the water. If several persons wish to use it for the irrigation of their fields, and the quantity of water is not sufficient for an extensive employment, the owner of the highest land can water his fields first, then the next lower, and so on. None of them may retain more of the water than is required to inundate his fields to the height of the ankles ; and if it is the case of a field of varying level, each level should be separately considered in this respect. ††Water, even when common to all, becomes private property as soon as it is taken into any sort of vessel.

A person who sinks a well on uncultivated land, with the sole intention of procuring the water he requires, obtains in this way only a right of preference until he has left the place ; †but if he sinks the well in order to become the owner of it, he becomes proprietor of the water as well. In any case, whether or not the water becomes private property, the person who has sunk the well is never obliged to share the superfluous water with another person if the latter only requires it for agriculture ; ††but he must share the superfluous water with any person who wants to water his animals.

The water of common canals is distributed by means of wooden sluices in which holes are pierced, so that the distribution may take place either equally or in proportion to the respective rights of the co-proprietors. The partition may also be effected by turns, in virtue of special agreements between the owners having a right to the water.

BOOK 23.—WAKAF

THE founder must be capable of declaring his wishes, and must be able to dispose of his property at his own will and pleasure, and the foundation must be of such a kind that perpetual use may be made of it. Thus it may not consist of foodstuffs or odoriferous plants, but with this exception, it may be either movable or immovable, or even such things as are capable only of individual possession, but not a slave or a coat unless a particular specified one, nor one's own person, †nor a slave enfranchised on account of maternity, †nor a trained dog, †nor one of two slaves without indicating which. †On the other hand the validity of a foundation is admitted that consists of buildings and plantations on another's land leased for that object.

A foundation, whether in favour of a certain particular person, or of several individuals all together, has no legal effect unless the beneficiaries could legally become proprietors of the goods given in endowment. Consequently a foundation cannot be made in favour of a fœtus, or of a slave by personal reference to him. A foundation in favour of a slave with no such express reference is understood as referring to his master. A foundation in favour of an animal is null and void, though, according to some, it is to the profit of the master in this case also. †It results from the principle already stated that one may endow in this way an infidel subject of a Moslem prince, but not an apostate, nor an infidel who is not the subject of a Moslem prince, nor one's self. A foundation for an illicit purpose, such as the construction of a Christian church or of a synagogue is null and void. But it is perfectly legal, whether it is made with a pious object, as in favour of the poor, of learned men, of a mosque or of a school ; †or whether it is made with no manifestly pious intention, as when in favour of the rich.

The intention to endow a foundation should be expressed in explicit terms, as, for example, "I make such and such a thing a wakaf," or "My field shall be a foundation in favour of so and so." ††The phrases, "I consecrate," or "I devote to such and such pious use," are explicit ; †as are also, "I make a sacred gift of such and such a thing," or "I make wakaf," or "it cannot be sold or given to another." On the other hand, the expression "give" without anything else cannot be considered explicit, even if it was the intention to found a wakaf; except when in favour not of one or many individuals, but of a category of persons or of the public, when it is so regarded. †The phrases, "I make such and such object a sacred thing," or "I wish it to remain for ever as it is," are not explicit; but the expression, "I destine this land to become a mosque," is enough to make of it a place devoted to religious worship.

†A foundation in favour of a particular person is not complete unless he accepts; an acceptance which can in no case follow upon a previous refusal. A foundation expressed in the words, "I make such and such a thing wakaf for a year," is null and void; but if the words used are, "I make it wakaf in favour of my children," or "in favour of so-and-so, and after him of his descendants," and nothing else, the foundation remains intact, even after the extinction of the family. *The usufruct then goes to the nearest relative of the founder, upon the day of the extinction of the beneficiaries designated by him. Our school regards as null and void a foundation made without designating an original beneficiary capable of enjoying it immediately, made e.g. "in favour of the child I shall have." On the other hand, it recognises the validity of a wakaf where one of the intermediary beneficiaries does not exist, e.g. where it is said, "I make a wakaf in favour of my children; and if I have none, then in favour of a person not designated, and after that in favour of the poor.

*The law considers null and void a foundation that has no object. Nor can it be made to depend upon a condition, as "I make wakaf, provided Zaid comes." ††It is also annulled by an option. †As to other conditions they should be faithfully executed, as that the property immobilised may not be leased, or that a mosque should be specially destined to a particular rite, such as that of Shafii. In this last case members of the school mentioned alone have a right of enjoyment, to the exclusion of all other believers; and this rule applies also to the foundation of a school or hostelry. †In the case of a wakaf in favour of two persons, and after them of the poor, the death of one causes his share in the usufruct to fall to the other, and not to the poor, who profit from it only after the death of both. This doctrine was defended by Shafii himself.

SECTION 2

A wakaf in favour "of my children and grandchildren," results in the usufruct being divided equally between all the children and grandchildren alive on the day of the foundation, even though one may have added "who are their descendants," or "generation after generation." Where, on the contrary, one has used the words, "in favour of my children, then of my grandchildren, then of my great-grandchildren who are their descendants," or "in favour of my children and my grandchildren, the one after the other," or "the former first," there is successive enjoyment by the different generations, and the first are merely fiduciary beneficiaries. †Besides, the grandchildren have on their own account no claim upon a wakaf made in favour of "children" only; but, on the other hand, grandchildren born of the founder's daughter are included in the expressions "posterity," "descent," "progeny"; or "grandchildren," unless one says "grandchildren bearing my name. "A wakaf in favour of "persons between whom and myself there are relations of patronage," should be divided into two equal parts, if the founder is both client and patron; but according to some jurists it is null and void.

An apposition preceding several words, joined to one another, refers to all of them; for example, in the phrase, "I make a wakaf in favour of those who are indigent, my children, my grandchildren and my brothers"—brothers and grandchildren are here proclaimed to be indigent equally with the children. It is the same with an apposition that follows, and with a reservation added to the principal words, provided these words are united by the conjunction "and"; thus, "I make a wakaf in favour of my children and grandchildren and brothers, who are indigent," or "except such as may be of notorious misconduct."

*The ownership of the thing immobilised is transferred to God; which means that such object ceases, for men, to be subject to the right of private property, and that it henceforth belongs neither to the founder nor to the beneficiary. To the latter belongs the usufruct alone; and he may enjoy it, either personally, or by an intermediary, e.g. by lending him the object immobilised, or by hiring it out to him. The beneficiary of a wakaf is ipso facto the proprietor of what is obtained from a lease of the foundation, or of what it produces, as fruit, wool, and milk, †without forgetting slave-born children and the young of animals; though according to another theory these various offshoots become themselves wakaf, by virtue of the right of increase. After the death of a dedicated animal, the skin belongs to the beneficiary. Similarly, he becomes proprietor of the dower paid for a female slave with whom a third party has cohabited, either by error, or by right of marriage, ‡at least where it is admitted that a dedicated slave can legally be married. On the other hand, according to our school, the indemnity due by the murderer of a dedicated slave does not belong to the beneficiary, who should employ the money in purchasing another slave, who then becomes dedicated ipso facto in the place of the slave killed ; or, if this be impossible, he should at least employ the money in acquiring an undivided share in a slave.

The dedication of a tree is not, according to our school, terminated by the death of the tree ; for this does not prevent the continued use of the wood ; though according to some authorities, the tree should in this case be put up to auction, and the proceeds employed in the same way as the indemnity due for a slave killed. †The old mats and broken beams of a mosque may be sold, but only to be used as firewood. The ground of a mosque can in no case be sold, even though the building may have fallen into ruin, and though it be impossible to reconstruct it.

SECTION 4

Where the founder has reserved to himself the administration of the wakaf, or where he has conferred this duty upon another person, that disposition must be adhered to ; but if the founder has made no stipulation with regard to this, the administration must, according to our school, be intrusted to the court. The administrator of a wakaf must be a man of irreproachable character, fit for his duties physically and mentally. The functions of an administrator consist in keeping up and leasing the property immobilised, and in the collection and distribution of the revenues. If the administration has only been partly conferred upon him, he is forbidden to exceed the limits of his authority. In all cases the founder has the right to dismiss his administrator and appoint another, unless the administrator has been appointed in the deed of foundation itself. †A lease, effected by an administrator, remains good in spite of a rise in price, or the fact that another person offers more advantageous conditions.

BOOK 24.—GIFTS

A GIFT is a gratuitous transfer of property. When such transfer is made with the intention of obtaining a recompense in the other world, it is an alms; ††when the gift is brought to the donee to manifest one's respect for him, it is a present. It is an essential condition for the validity of a gift properly so-called that offer and acceptance be made in explicit terms; but in the case of a present neither offer nor acceptance are strictly necessary; it is enough that the object is brought by the donor and taken possession of by the donee. By saying to some one, "I want you to live in this house of mine, and that it shall pass to your heirs after your death," one makes a gift, as also by merely saying, "I want you to inhabit it," at least according to the doctrine adopted by Shafii in his second period, or by saying, "After your death it will return to me." Shafii in his first period expressed an opinion different from that adopted in his second as to the validity of a gift made in the following terms, "I grant you a life interest in this house," or "I make you a gift of it for life"; that is, if you predecease me it will return to me, but otherwise it will be yours irrevocably. Nowadays, however, in our school, both of the imam's opinions have equal currency.

Anything that may be sold may be given; anything that may not be sold, as an unknown or usurped thing, or an escaped animal, cannot be the subject of a gift. But in the case of things of very little value, such as two grains of corn, etc., a gift is permissible but not a sale. The gift of a debt due to one, implies the remission of the debt, if made to the debtor; †to any third person it is null and void.

As to the ownership of the thing given, this is transferred only upon the donee taking possession with the consent of the donor, or if one of the parties dies between the giving and the taking possession, by the agreement of the heirs. Some jurists, however, consider that under these circumstances the gift is ipso facto revoked.

A practice has been introduced by the Sonna, by which parents, at any rate when not of notorious misconduct, may by gift inter vivos distribute their property equally amongst their children, without distinction of sex; others, however, maintain that the provisions of the law of the distribution of property upon succession cannot be set aside in this way.

A father or any ancestor may revoke a gift made in favour of a child or other descendant, provided that the donee has not irrevocably disposed of the thing received, e.g. by selling or dedicating it. Revocation is not prevented by a disposition leaving the right of ownership intact, such as pledging or gift, at any rate as long as neither have been followed by possession, conditional enfranchisement, giving in marriage a female slave, cultivation of a field, or even, according to our school, a contract of hiring. In a case where the donee first loses the ownership of the thing and afterwards recovers it, †the right of revocation does not revive; and where, in the meanwhile, the thing given increases, the revocation applies only to that part of the increase which is incorporated with the thing itself, not that which has a separate existence. A revocation is made in the following words:—"I revoke my gift," or "I claim back the object," or "I wish the thing to become my property again," or "I wish to put an end to my donation"; but it cannot be effected by mere implication, by ulterior dispositions affecting the thing given, such as sale, immobilisation, gift to another person, enfranchisement ‡for cohabitation.

In the case of a gift by which it has been expressly stipulated that there is to be no remuneration, a right of revocation belongs only to ancestors; while a gift with regard to which no stipulation has been made about the matter is considered to have been made without any prospect of remuneration, if the donee is in any respect inferior in social position to the donor, and even if he is superior. Our school goes even further; it accepts the same principle in the case of a gift between two persons of equal position. Where a remuneration is obligatory, but none has been specified, †it consists in the value of the thing given; and the donor has in these circumstances the right to revoke the gift, if the donee forgets the remuneration. *A donation is admitted as valid when made with the reservation of a known remuneration; ††a donation which must, however, be considered as a sale; but, according to our school a gift made on the express condition of an unknown remuneration, is null and void.

In the case of a present made to some one, the receptacle is considered to be part of the present, and, if such is the custom, need not be restored, as one does not return the basket that has contained dates. Otherwise the receptacle remains with the donor, and the donee can only use it as, for example, a plate for the food given, provided always custom admits of this.

BOOK 25.—THINGS FOUND

SECTION 1

It is commendable to pick up what one finds, if one thinks one can keep it in safety. Some authorities even maintain this to be obligatory. If one has reason to doubt if one can keep a thing safely, the law neither recommends the above course, †nor does it forbid it, except for a person of notorious misconduct, in which case it is blamable. According to our school one is not obliged, on finding something, to call witnesses to see it; and, strictly speaking, a person of notorious misconduct, a minor, or an infidel subject of a Moslem prince, can pick a thing up in case of necessity. *But it should be removed from the possession of a person of notorious misconduct and deposited with one of irreproachable character; and one should never rely upon a person of notorious misconduct for announcing the discovery to the public, even if the object found be left in his possession, which is permissible if the person in question is watched by another. As to a minor it is his guardian who should take from him the thing found, make the public announcement, and appropriate it for his pupil, if he considers it proper for him to undertake the resulting obligations, i.e. in a case where it would be otherwise permissible for him to borrow money on his behalf. The guardian is responsible for a thing found which he has omitted to take from his pupil's possession, and which has been accidentally lost. *If a slave has picked anything up his action is null and an announcement made by him is void. On the other hand, his master who takes the thing from him is regarded as the person who has found it and picked it up.

[According to our school a slave who is undergoing enfranchisement by contract can pick up a thing found, with all the legal consequences, provided that the contract cannot be legally invalidated in any respect. In the case of a person who is partially free, the fact of having found something affects both him and his master; *and if he has only to serve his master once in two or three days, the object is considered as having been found by him or by the master in accordance with whether it was or was not a free day. This last principle is also applicable to all accidental benefices or expenses, with the single exception of an indemnity due for a crime which affects solely the person himself who is partially enfranchised.]

SECTION 2

Domestic animals that have nothing to fear from small carnivores, either in consequence of their strength, as in the case of the horse or the camel, or of their fleetness, as with the hare and the gazelle, or because they can fly, like the pigeon, can only be seized in a desert place with the intention of keeping them. This seizure can be effected as well by the court †as by any other person. Such animals when found in such a place cannot be seized in order to be appropriated ; ‡but it is quite lawful to seize them with this intention when straying in a village. Domestic animals such as ordinarily become the prey of small carnivores—sheep, for example—can be seized and appropriated wherever found ; and a person who seizes them in a desert place can at his choice—

1. Make a public announcement, and at once appropriate them.

2. Sell them, keep the price and appropriate it after making a public announcement.

3. Kill them and eat the meat ; acts, however, by which one engages to pay the value to the owner upon his presenting himself.

Where, on the contrary, the animals in question are found in an inhabited place, the choice lies between the first two of these courses, †to the exclusion of the third. One may also seize a young slave who has not yet reached the age of discernment.

As to inanimate things found, if they are liable to rapid deterioration, like the paste called harisa, one may either sell them and appropriate the price after making the required public announcement, or take them at once and eat them. Others, however, maintain that sale is obligatory for a person who finds things of this sort forgotten in an inhabited place. Where, on the other hand, it is a question of things that can be preserved after manipulation, such as fresh dates that can be dried, one has the right either to sell them or to dry them, whichever course is rendered most advantageous by circumstances ; if, at any rate, after finding them, one is willing to undertake their manipulation gratuitously. Otherwise the finder can sell a part to defray the cost of manipulation.

A thing picked up with the sole object of keeping it and returning it to the owner becomes a deposit, which one can get rid of at any moment by consigning it to the care of the court, which must accept it. According to the majority of jurists a public announcement is not obligatory in these circumstances.

Bad faith supervening after picking up a thing †involves no responsibility, which arises only from bad faith at the moment of doing so. Such bad faith it is, according to our school, that prevents a public announcement in order to appropriate the thing subsequently.

Whoever picks a thing up intending to announce it, and appropriate it if the owner does not present himself, keeps the thing as a deposit, as long as the public announcement lasts, †and even until he declares his intention to appropriate it. One should first examine the nature, quality, quantity, wrappings and fastenings of the thing found, and then announce it in the markets, at the doors of the mosques, etc., for a whole day and according to custom. This notification should be repeated twice a day, i.e. morning and afternoon, then once a day, then once a week, and lastly once a month, †without interruption for the whole year that is prescribed for notifications. [†An interruption in the year prescribed for notifications does not render them absolutely illegal.] In the notification it is only necessary to give a superficial description of the thing found. The expense of the notification does not fall upon the finder, who picks a thing up merely in order to keep it and give it to the owner. The court should in such a case defray the expense, either from the public treasury, or by borrowing in the owner's name. The expense should, on the other hand, be borne by the finder if he picks a thing up in order to appropriate it; though, according to some authors, the owner should recoup him in all cases where the appropriation for some reason or other did not take place. †A thing of small value need not be announced for a whole year; it is enough if the notification lasts long enough to give reason to suppose that the loser has renounced his claim.

SECTION 3

A person who has notified the finding of a thing for a whole year, is not ipso facto its owner; he must also express his intention to appropriate it, in words such as, "I appropriate it." According to some, however, the intention alone is enough; while according to others appropriation takes place ipso facto upon the expiry of the required year. In any case appropriation is merely temporary; for if the original owner presents himself he can exercise his rights, under the following circumstances:—

1. The thing found should be returned him in kind, if the two interested parties are agreed about it; †for if the owner insists upon such restitution, even though the finder may prefer to replace the thing found by something similar.

2. When the thing found has been accidentally lost, the finder should replace it by another similar object, or pay the value it had on the day he appropriated it.

3. Where the thing has deteriorated in the meantime, †the finder should restore it to the owner in the state in which he found it, and also pay damage.

If some one presents himself and claims a thing found, but can neither give a description of it, nor prove he is the owner, the person who has found it has no right to give it him. If some one comes and is able to give a description of the object but no other proof that he is the owner, the finder may give it him if he believes him to be speaking the truth ; but, according to our school, restitution is never obligatory in such a case. Where restitution is made on the sole ground that the claimant gave a description of the thing, and the real owner comes later and proves his claim, the person to whom the thing was given may be called as surety. If in the meanwhile the thing has been destroyed in possession of the person who wrongly represented himself as the owner, the real owner may proceed either against the finder or against the person to whom he gave the object found ; though the former may always recover from the latter what he has been obliged to pay the owner.

[††Objects found upon the sacred territory of Mecca, cannot be appropriated ; but this does not affect the obligation to make a public announcement of their finding.]

BOOK 26.—FOUNDLINGS

SECTION 1

CHILDREN that have been abandoned must not be left to their fate ; this is an obligation for which the Moslem community is collectively responsible. †The fact of finding a child should be established by witnesses. Authority over a child, in consequence of finding and taking care of it, can be exercised only by an adult, sane, free Moslem, of irreproachable character, and of sufficient intelligence to manage his own affairs. Consequently, a slave who takes charge of a foundling without his master's knowledge, has no right to keep it. Even if a slave, after finding a child, tells his master, and the latter lets it remain with him, or if a master authorises a slave to take charge of a child ; it is not the slave but the master who must be regarded as civilly responsible for it. A minor, a person of notorious misconduct, and one legally incapable, cannot legally take charge of a child they may find ; and the same with an infidel in the case of a Moslem foundling. In all these cases the care of the child should be confided to another person.

If two individuals dispute possession of a foundling, the court should decide which of the two seems preferable, and, if necessary, confide the child to a third ; but no one can dispute the claim of a person who has already taken a child to his home. †In a case where two persons, both of full legal capacity, jointly find a child, the court should prefer the richer to the poorer, and the one who is notoriously and positively irreproachable to the one about whom it can only be said that nothing is known to his disadvantage. In a case of complete equality in all respects chance should decide. A townsman who finds a child abandoned in a town, has no right to take it into the desert among the nomads ; †but there is no objection to his taking it to another town ; nor is there any objection to a stranger who finds a child in a town where he is temporarily staying, taking it to the town where he has his domicile. A stranger who happens to find a child in the desert may take it to a town. A nomad who finds a child in a town is subject to the same law as a townsman in similar circumstances ; but a nomad who finds a child in the desert can keep it and bring it up at his home ; unless, according to some jurists, the tribe has a habit of changing its place in search of new pastures.

The upkeep of a foundling is defrayed from property destined to such children in general, like wakafs made in their favour, or from the property of the foundling. This last phrase means the clothes, etc., in which he is wrapped, or upon which he is lain, the drahms there may be in his pocket, his cradle, and the dinars placed above or below his body. The law even considers as the child's property the deserted house in which he is found, but not the treasure buried underneath the place where he lay, †nor clothes or other objects placed in the neighbourhood. *A wholly destitute foundling should be brought up at the expense of the state ; and, if necessary, every Moslem is obliged to assist him, as by way of loan ; or, according to one author, as by way of upkeep. ‡A person who finds a child has the exclusive right to administer its property ; but in all cases the expenses of its upkeep must be authorised by the court.

SECTION 2

A child that has been abandoned is regarded as a Moslem—

1. If it is found in a Moslem country, even though inhabited by infidel subjects of our Sovereign.
2. If it is found in a country conquered from the infidels, whose inhabitants have retained their property by virtue of a treaty, or hereditary possession by right of capitation ; provided the country is not entirely destitute of believers.
3. †If it is found in a country not yet conquered from the infidels, but where there are some Moslems who have come either as prisoners of war or for a commercial object. If, on the other hand, the country is inhabited exclusively by infidels, the child also is regarded as an infidel.

The son of an infidel, declared to be a Moslem in consequence of the place where he is found, becomes none the less an infidel as soon as his origin has been proved ; but a mere contestation of the presumption established by law in favour of the Moslem faith, is not sufficient, according to our school, to cause the child to be regarded as an infidel.

The Moslem faith of a minor, in general, is established in two other ways that have no reference to foundlings.

1. By the fact of being born of Moslem parents, even though only one of them may have been Moslem at the moment of the child's conception. If such a child, after attaining majority becomes an infidel, he must be regarded and punished as an apostate. Even a child conceived at a moment both the father and the mother were infidel, becomes Moslem ipso facto upon the conversion of either parent during its minority ; and must also be considered as an apostate if proof of infidelity is given upon majority. However, one of our jurists considers the child in these circumstances to be an infidel by origin.

2. By being made a prisoner of war by a Moslem ; for in that case the child follows the religion of the person that has taken possession of it, unless the father and mother were made prisoners at the same time. †The fact of being made a prisoner of war by an infidel subject of a Moslem prince constitutes no reason for considering a child to be a Moslem. ††As a general rule, a minor, even though he may have attained the age of discernment cannot become a Moslem unless at least one of his parents is converted to the faith of the Prophet.

SECTION 3

If a foundling, upon his majority, does not himself admit that he is a slave, every one must consider him as free, until another person has proved the legal presumption in the matter to be false. If a foundling, upon his majority, admits he is the slave of a particular person, who does not deny it, the admission should be accepted by the court ; unless the child previously admitted he was free. However, our school does not consider it an obstacle to an admission of being a slave that a foundling has already disposed of his property or person in a manner only compatible with freedom, e.g. by entering into a contract of sale or marriage. In spite of any dispositions of this nature the child's admission of being a slave must be admitted both as regards his origin and with reference to his subsequent actions ; but his previous acts remain valid in all cases where such an admission would prejudice other persons who, believing him to be free, have in good faith entered into relations with him. The debts of a foundling who upon his majority admits being a slave are recoverable from anything he actually possesses. *Where the status of slavery of a foundling is maintained in legal proceedings by a person who has not the child with him in his house, the court can take no notice of his claim unless he proves the truth of his statement. In a case where the statute of slavery is not alleged by the foundling himself but by the person who finds him, the court can never give credit to the statement of the latter, unless the fact is established by sufficient evidence.

A minor, whether or not he has attained the age of discernment, kept by some one as a slave, without it being known if he is a foundling or not, should be regarded as really the slave of the person employing him; †and on his majority he cannot change his status by merely declaring himself to be free. Such a change is admissible only upon legal proof. And if any one proves that a certain foundling is a slave the latter should be treated as such; but before this can be admitted, not only must a general right of ownership be proved, but the cause must be shown, only one authority considering the former alone sufficient.

When a free Moslem declares a foundling to be his child, this declaration is enough to give him a right to bring up the child in preference to all other persons. A similar declaration by a slave also establishes filiation; though one of our jurists admits it only on condition of the master's approval. †On the other hand, a declaration of this kind made by a woman has not the same consequences. In a case where two persons dispute the paternity of a foundling the law admits no presumption in favour of a Moslem over an infidel subject of a Moslem prince, nor of a free man over a slave. In the absence of other proof recourse must be had to a physiognomist to discover the true father of the child. The person indicated by the physiognomist as the real father must be so considered; but, if there be no physiognomist, or if the physiognomist cannot venture to decide, or declares that the child is the child of neither competitor, or that he finds traces of filiation with respect to both of them, then the child on his majority must himself decide to which of the two persons he inclines by his character, etc. *Finally, in a case where each party succeeds in legally proving the truth of his affirmation of paternity, these proofs mutually annul each other.

BOOK 27.—JOB WORK

THIS form of agreement occurs when one says, for example, "Whoever brings me back my fugitive slave will be rewarded in such and such a manner," or when one makes use of any other phrase indicating the work that is to be done for some obligatory remuneration. In consequence one can claim nothing for doing a piece of work without the master's consent, or one that another person had been employed to do. A third party may promise a reward to any one who brings back the fugitive slave of another person; but in that case the person who undertakes the work can proceed only against the person who promised him the reward. If some one says, "Zaid promises a reward of so much to any one who brings back his slave," a person who brings back the slave has no case against the speaker if Zaid denies it. It is not necessary that the offer of a job should be formally accepted by the person undertaking it, even in the case of something that is to be delivered to a particular person.

The contract is valid if the work to be done is not known, as well as where its extent is ascertained; provided in both cases that the amount of the remuneration is known. Thus, one may not say, "Whoever brings me back the slave shall have a coat," or "I shall reward him"; although, under these circumstances, the person undertaking the job can still claim, if he succeeds, reasonable remuneration for his trouble. In case of a promise to reward any one "bringing back a slave from such and such a place," the person who undertakes the job can claim only a proportional reward if he finds the fugitive in some nearer spot. If two persons together bring back a slave, they should jointly claim the promised reward; but if the reward has been promised to some particular person and another assists him in the work, the person with whom the master made the contract can alone claim the entire reward, at least, where the other shared the work in order to assist him. But if the second has taken part in it for the sake of the master, the original contractor can only claim a reward proportional to what he has done, and the other can claim nothing.

Each of the contracting parties may cancel the agreement before the job is completed under the following conditions:—

1. Nothing is due to the person undertaking the job if the cancellation takes place before the work is begun ; or if the person so undertaking wishes to cancel the agreement later.

2. †If the master wishes to cancel the agreement after work has been begun he owes to the other party reasonable remuneration for what has been accomplished.

The master has the right to increase or diminish the remuneration so long as the work is not finished ; without prejudice, however, to the contractor who has begun it, who in these circumstances always has a right to demand reasonable remuneration instead of accepting the change in that promised. The contractor cannot claim the promised reward, if, e.g. a slave he has undertaken to bring back dies on the way or escapes again ; nor has he any right to retain the recovered property in order to secure payment of what is due to him.

The law admits a presumption in favour of the master when the latter denies that a condition, alleged by the contractor, has been added to the promise ; or if he contends that the contractor has not been diligent in bringing back a fugitive. In case of a dispute upon the subject of the amount of the promised remuneration, both parties should take an oath to the truth of their assertions.

BOOK 28.—DISTRIBUTION OF ESTATES

SECTION 1

FUNERAL expenses are a first charge upon the total of the deceased's estate ; next his debts must be paid ; and then his testamentary dispositions may be executed, but only with regard to one-third of what is left of the estate, after deducting the debts. The remaining two-thirds of the net estate belong to the heirs.

[Special privileged claims, such as the charitable tax, the price of blood, security, and the return of things sold and not paid for in case of bankruptcy, are prior charges even to funeral expenses.]

The grounds of legitimate succession are four in number—relationship ; marriage ; patronage ; in the sense that the patron is heir to the enfranchised slave, but not vice versâ ; and, finally, religion, for in default of heirs of the first three kinds, the inheritance passes to the state, and this acquisition has all the effects of an ordinary succession. Legitimate male heirs are ten in number : (1) son ; (2) son's son and other agnate descendants ; (3) father ; (4) father's father and other agnate ancestors ; (5) brother ; (6) brother's son, except in the case of a son of a uterine brother ; (7) father's whole brother, and father's half-brother on father's side ; (8) son of (7) ; (9) surviving husband, not divorced, who has not repudiated the deceased ; (10) patron. Legitimate female heirs are seven in number : (1) daughter ; (2) son's daughter, and other female descendants of a son, provided they are agnates ; (3) mother ; (4) grandmother, and the other ancestresses mentioned in section 5 of this book ; (5) sister ; (6) surviving wife, not divorced nor repudiated ; (7) patroness.

In a case where all the male heirs just mentioned present themselves, father, sons, and wife share the succession to the exclusion of the others. If all the heiresses appear, then daughters, sons' daughters, mother, whole sisters, and wives alone share in the estate. Finally, should all possible male and female inheritors claim their portion, then the succession belongs exclusively to the father, mother, sons, daughters, and husband or wives.

The primitive doctrine of our school did not allow cognates a share in the succession, and the heirs indicated in the Koran could never obtain more than their determinate portions. Consequently, in default of persons legally entitled to it, the remainder of the inheritance escheated to the state. For this reason modern authorities have introduced the rule that, in all cases where the public money is not administered in accordance with the law, the heirs indicated in the Koran, with the exception of husband and wife, may, after receiving their respective portions and in default of other legitimate inheritors, demand that the remainder of the estate should be proportionately distributed amongst them. The state is even excluded by cognates, if the deceased has left no legitimate heir. By "cognates" are understood all relatives, except those already mentioned as legitimate heirs. They are of ten different kinds of relationship : (1) mother's father and, in general, any ancestor or ancestress who is not a legitimate heir or heiress ; (2) daughters' children ; (3) any brothers' daughters ; (4) sisters' children ; (5) uterine brothers' sons ; (6) father's uterine brother ; (7) father's brother's daughters ; (8) father's sisters ; (9) mother's brothers and sisters ; (10) relatives of all these persons, male and female.

SECTION 2

The portions fixed by the Book of God are of six categories—

1. Half the estate is assigned to five individuals : (1) husband, if the deceased has left no children nor son's children ; (2) only daughter ; (3) son's only daughter ; (4) only whole sister ; (5) only half sister on father's side.

2. A quarter of the estate is assigned to : (1) husband, if the deceased has left children or son's children ; (2) wife, if the deceased has not left children nor son's children.

3. An eighth of the estate is assigned to the wife, if the deceased has left children or son's children.

4. Two-thirds of the estate are assigned to : (1) two or more daughters ; (2) two or more daughters of sons ; (3) two or more whole sisters ; (4) two or more half sisters on the father's side.

5. A third is assigned to : (1) mother, if the deceased has left no children nor son's children, nor two brothers, nor two sisters ; (2) two or more brothers or uterine sisters ; (3) father's father, when called to the succession along with the brothers.

6. A sixth is assigned to seven individuals : (1) father, if the deceased has left children or son's children ; (2) father's father, under the same circumstances ; (3) mother, if the deceased has left either children or son's children, or brothers or sisters; (4) grandmother; (5) son's daughter, when she is called to the succession along with the deceased's daughter, i.e. her father's sister; (6) one or more half sisters on the father's side called to the succession along with the whole sister; (7) brother, or only uterine sister.

SECTION 3

Father, son, and husband are never excluded from the succession; son's son, or other agnate descendant, is excluded by son or other agnate descendant of a nearer degree, even though in another line; but an agnate ancestor can be excluded only by a nearer agnate ancestor of the same line. Whole brother is excluded by father; son's son and half brother on father's side are excluded also by whole brother; while uterine brother is excluded by father, father's father, child, and son's child. Whole brother's son is excluded by six persons: father, father's father, son, son's son, whole brother, and half brother on father's side; son of half brother on father's side is excluded also by whole brother's son. Father's whole brother is excluded by the same persons and by the son of deceased's half brother on the father's side; father's half brother on the father's side is excluded also by father's whole brother. Father's whole brother's son is excluded by all the persons last mentioned, and then by father's half brother on the father's side; while the son of father's half brother on the father's side is excluded also by father's whole brother's son. A patron is excluded by all agnates.

Daughter, mother, and wife are excluded by no one. Son's daughter is excluded by son and by two or more daughters of deceased; unless she inherits by way of agnation owing a special legal disposition. Mother's mother is excluded only by the mother herself; father's mother only by the father or mother. Now in the same line of succession more distant relatives are excluded by nearer ones, and more distant ancestors in the paternal line are even excluded by nearer ancestors in the maternal line, *but not vice versâ. Thus father's mother's mother is excluded by mother's mother. Whole sister is excluded by the same persons as whole brother; and half sister on the father's side is excluded also by two or more whole sisters. Patroness is subject to the same rule as patron.

If the estate is entirely disposed of amongst the portions of persons designated in the Koran as entitled to a share, agnates receive nothing by virtue of their right of agnation; but otherwise they can claim what remains of the estate, after deducting these portions.

SECTION 4

A son is universal inheritor when he alone is called to the succession ; and this principle applies also where the deceased leaves several sons. On the other hand, an only daughter can never claim more than the half, nor two or more daughters more than two-thirds. In case of concurrent claims by sons and daughters, the whole estate belongs to them, in such proportion that a son's share is equal to that of two daughters ; while son's children, in default of other heirs, are subject in this respect to the same rule as for deceased's children. In case of concurrent claims by a son and by children of another predeceased son, the latter are excluded from the succession ; but in case of concurrent claims by an only daughter and by children of a predeceased son, she can only claim half, and the remainder falls to the share of the son's children, if they include a male. Otherwise, i.e. where the son left only daughters, they can only claim a joint sixteenth. Where, in these circumstances, the deceased leaves, not an only daughter, but several daughters, called to the succession along with children of a predeceased son, the law assigns to the daughters together two-thirds of the estate, and the remainder falls to the son's children, provided they included a male. Otherwise, i.e. where the son left only daughters, they have no right to the succession, unless they are called to it as agnates, because otherwise the remainder of the estate would fall to the share of agnates further removed. As to son's son's children, etc., in case of concurrent claims with deceased's children, they are subject to the same rule as son's children.

As a general rule, where agnate descendants are called to the succession, the result is that any female descendant of the same degree of relationship also inherits by right of agnation. The same applies to any female descendant of a nearer degree of relationship, if otherwise she would be excluded from the two-thirds' share assigned her by the Koran.

SECTION 5

A father can claim only the portion fixed by the Koran, if he is called to the succession along with a son or son's son ; but in default of children and son's children he inherits by agnation ; and if a daughter or son's daughter has a concurrent claim, the law assigns him—

1. A sixth, as heir designated in the Koran.
2. The remainder, after deducting daughter's and son's daughters' portions, as agnate.

A mother can never claim more than a third or a sixth, as explained in the second section of the present book ; while her portion is only a third of what remains of the estate after deducting the husband's or wives' portions, in case of concurrent claims by the father and the husband or wives of the deceased.

Father's father is subject to the same law as father, except that—

1. Brothers and sisters are always excluded by the latter ; whereas whole brothers and sisters and half-brothers and half-sisters on the father's side, are called to the succession along with the former.

2. A father excludes his own mother, i.e. deceased's father's mother, who is not excluded by deceased's father's father, i.e. by her husband.

3. A father reduces a mother's share to a third of the remainder, in case of concurrent claims by her and the husband or wives ; which is not so in the case of father's father.

A grandmother can claim a sixth ; if both father's mother and mother's mother have survived deceased, the two grandmothers share this fraction between them. By grandmother is understood not only father's mother or mother's mother, but also all other paternal or maternal ancestors of the female sex not related to the deceased through males ; and this even includes father's father's mother, or her mother. Thus the law calls to the succession every ancestor connected with the deceased, either exclusively through women, or exclusively through men, or connected with deceased's agnate ancestor exclusively through women, but not those female ancestors in whose line a male interposes between two women.

SECTION 6

If the deceased leaves only whole brothers and sisters, they share the estate as if they were deceased's children. Half brothers and half sisters on the father's side are subject to the same law as whole brothers and sisters, except in the case called mosharaka, i.e. where a woman leaves as her heirs a husband, a mother, two uterine brothers or sisters and a whole brother. In this particular case the whole brother participates, along with the two uterine brothers or sisters, in the third assigned them by the Koran ; but if, in these circumstances, it is the case of a half brother on the father's side, and not of a whole brother, the half brother inherits nothing. In the case of concurrent claims by whole brothers or sisters along with half brothers or sisters on the father's side, the same rule is applied as obtains in the case of children called to the succession along with children of a predeceased son ; except that the son's daughters inherit by right of agnation where there exists an agnate of the same or an inferior degree ; while a whole sister or a half sister on the father's side inherits by right of agnation when she has a brother, i.e. where there exists an agnate of the same degree. A uterine brother or sister may claim a sixth ; two or more uterine brothers or sisters may claim a third, and in this case males have no advantage over females.

Whole sisters or half sisters on the father's side also inherit by right of agnation when they have concurrent claims along with deceased's daughters or sons' daughters ; they can then claim a portion as if they were brothers ; except that half sisters on the father's side are excluded by whole sisters only if there also exists a daughter of the deceased.

Sons of whole brothers or of half brothers on the father's side, are subject as a general rule to the same provisions as relate to their respective fathers, whether both categories are represented, or only one. They differ from their respective fathers only in the four following respects :—

1. They do not reduce the mother's share to a sixth.
2. They are excluded by the father's father.
3. They do not cause their sisters to inherit by right of agnation.
4. They are excluded from the succession in the case called mosharaka, of which we have spoken.

Father's whole brother or father's half brother on the father's side is subject to the same rule as deceased's whole brother or half brother on the father's side, whether the two categories of uncles are represented, or only one. This principle extends also to father's brother's sons, and other agnates properly so called, i.e. by reason of relationship.

By inheritors by right of agnation are understood the legitimate inheritors to whom the Koran does not assign a definite fraction of the estate, but who, in default of persons entitled to such fraction, share amongst them the entire succession, and who, if there are persons so entitled, can claim only the remainder, after deducting the portions prescribed in the Book of God.

SECTION 7

In default of agnates properly so called, i.e. by reason of relationship, the patron or patroness must be accepted as such and may claim the estate or what is left of it, after deducting the portions assigned by the Koran to the heirs we have just mentioned. In default of patron or patroness, their agnates are called to the succession of an enfranchised slave ; but in this case the law recognises as agnates only those properly so called, and not a daughter or sister inheriting as agnates by a special legal disposition. Agnates of patron or patroness share the succession as if they were agnates by reason of relationship ; but the *brother or brother's son of the patron or patroness have priority over the father's father. In a case where the patron or patroness are themselves enfranchised slaves without agnates, it is their patron and subsidiarily his agnates that the law calls to the succession, and so on. Thus a woman is never heiress by right of patronage, except to the estate of her own enfranchised slave, or of a person connected with the latter by relationship or enfranchisement.

SECTION 8

In case of concurrent claims by father's father along with brothers and sisters, whether whole brothers and sisters, or half brothers and half sisters on the father's side, and where there are no other inheritors who can claim a portion specified in the Koran, the law assigns to the first, either a third of the estate, or the option of sharing with the brothers and sisters as if he were himself a brother, whichever is more advantageous for him. If the father's father claims a third, brothers and sisters share the remainder. On the other hand, where, in the above circumstances, there are other inheritors who can claim a portion specified in the Koran, the law allows the father's father to choose whichever of three alternatives is the most advantageous for him: (1) a sixth of the estate; (2) a third of what remains after deducting the portions of those inheritors; (3) sharing with the brothers and sisters as if he were himself a brother. In these circumstances the following provisions also must be observed:—

1. Where the estate is exhausted by the portions specified in the Koran, e.g. where a woman leaves as her heirs two daughters, mother, husband, father's father, and whole brothers and sisters or half brothers and half sisters on the father's side, a sixth is still given to the grandfather; and recourse must be had to a proportionate reduction of the respective shares, as otherwise they would exceed the total estate. This excess and consequent reduction is called awl.

2. Where, after deducting the portions specified in the Koran, there remains less than a sixth of the estate, e.g. where a woman leaves as her heirs two daughters, her husband, and her father's father, the latter should still have his sixth, while observing the proportional reduction rendered necessary by the awl.

3. Where, after deducting the portions specified in the Koran, there remains precisely a sixth of the estate, e.g. where a woman leaves as her heirs two daughters, her mother and her father's father, the latter obtains this sixth and nothing more.

In the three cases mentioned brothers are entirely excluded from the succession.

In the case of concurrent claims by father's father, not with brothers and sisters or half brothers and half sisters on the father's side, but with both whole brothers and sisters and also with half brothers and half sisters on the father's side, the same rules must be observed ; but in this particular case half brothers and half sisters on the father's side are not always excluded by whole brothers and sisters. It is only, under these circumstances, when the grandfather prefers to content himself with the portion assigned him by the Koran, rather than to claim a fraction of the remainder of the total estate, or participate with the brothers and sisters, that the existence of a whole brother amongst the persons entitled has the effect of excluding the half brother and half sisters by the father's side. Where there are no whole brothers, but one only whole sister, and also where, beside the father's father, there are two or more whole sisters, the estate is exhausted by the respective fixed portions of a third and two-thirds, and nothing is left for half brothers and half sisters by the father's side. Father's father, on being called to the succession concurrently with full sisters or half sisters on the father's side, is admitted to share as if he were a brother, i.e. the sisters cannot then be considered as heirs able to claim a specified portion according to the Koran, except in the particular case called el akdariya. This is where a woman leaves husband, mother, father's father, and a whole sister or half sister by the father's side. Then the husband can claim half, the mother a third, the grandfather a sixth, and the sister half. As the sum of these fractions exceeds the total of the estate, recourse must first be had to proportional reduction ; then the portions of the grandfather and of the sister must be combined, and two-thirds of the total taken for the grandfather, and one-third for the sister.

SECTION 9

An infidel cannot succeed to the estate of a Moslem, nor vice versâ. An apostate cannot inherit nor be inherited from. Infidels inherit among themselves, whatever their respective religions may be ; but between infidel subjects of a Moslem prince and infidels not so subject there is no right of inheritance. Neither can a slave be an heir ; but, according to the opinion adopted by Shafii in Egypt, the partially freed slave is capable of having heirs, though he cannot himself inherit. A person who has killed another cannot succeed to the estate of the person killed ; though some authorities admit an exception to this rule in the case of a homicide for which the perpetrator was not in any respect to blame.

When two persons, called respectively to succeed to each other, perish together in a shipwreck, or the fall of a building ; or if they die apart, either simultaneously, or in such circumstances that it is not known which predeceased the other, there is no inheritance as between them, and both estates go to other heirs.

The property of a prisoner of war, or of an absent person of whom there has been no news, should be sequestrated, until the death has been legally established, or until the lapse of such time as may justify its presumption. Then the court, after thorough examination, should declare that there is a presumption of death, and proceed to the distribution of the estate amongst those entitled at the moment when the presumption was declared. If the absent person is an inheritor, his portion should be sequestrated ; but the other inheritors obtain at once what is legally due to them.

If, when an estate falls to be distributed, there is a woman pregnant whose child will or may inherit, the rights of this child should be reserved intact until its birth, in the best way that may be possible, while respecting the rights of the other inheritors. If the child is born alive, and at a time indicating that conception took place before the inheritance fell due, it inherits as if it had been already born then ; otherwise it does not inherit. In any case the estate must be sequestrated until the delivery of the child, at least, if there are no other heirs, or if the other heirs are excluded by the posthumous infant. That is to say that when, in these circumstances, there are, besides the posthumous infant, other inheritors not excluded by the law, a distinction must be made between heirs that have a portion specified in the Koran, and those that have not. The former receive at once their respective portions, subject, if necessary, to a proportional reduction ; while the latter receive nothing. There is an example of the former case when the deceased leaves a pregnant wife who can claim an eighth, and his two parents can each claim a sixth, all subject to proportional reduction ; and one of the latter when the deceased leaves only children. According to some authorities there should be reserved out of the estate a sufficient provision in case the woman should give birth to four children at once ; though naturally there is eventually given to the posthumous child only what is really due to him.

When a hermaphrodite is called to a succession by reason of a title that makes no distinction between heirs and heiresses, as by uterine fraternity or patronage, the matter is simple ; but otherwise it should only be given at first what is due to it on the more disadvantageous hypothesis ; the remainder being sequestrated until it becomes evident which sex is preponderant. The fact of being an heir by reason of a disposition of the Book of God is no objection to claiming also as an inheritor by reason of agnation. Thus the master who has married his enfranchised slave inherits from her both as husband and as patron ; and the cousin on the father's side who has married his cousin inherits from her both as husband and as agnate.

[However, if it happens as the result of an incestuous marriage between mother and son that the same person is daughter and uterine sister of the deceased, she inherits only in the former character, though some jurists admit a succession under both denominations, even in these circumstances. Incestuous marriages such as these are customary among fire-worshippers, and might happen accidentally in Moslem families.]

If two persons have an equal right by reason of agnation, and one can also claim a portion specified in the Koran, by reason of some other relationship, this latter portion is assigned him without prejudice to his right to participate with his coinheritor. Thus, where there are two sons of a father's whole brother or father's half brother on the father's side, of whom one is also uterine brother of the deceased, the latter takes from the estate the sixth assigned him by the Koran, and the remainder is shared equally by the two cousins. Where, however, in these circumstances, the deceased has also left a daughter, the latter obtains the half specified in the Koran, and the remainder is shared equally by the two cousins ; though, according to some jurists, the law assigns the entire half that remains to be disposed of to the cousin who is also uterine brother. A person who could strictly claim two portions specified in the Koran, by virtue of two distinct causes, is considered to be entitled only under the "predominant" cause. By this term is understood that cause which would exclude the other, if it were a case of two persons, or one which cannot be excluded, or that of which the exclusion is the more limited. As an example of the first kind of predominant causes may be quoted the case of a daughter who is also uterine sister, as may happen when a fire-worshipper has married his mother, or where a Moslem has accidentally concluded a like incestuous marriage, and the mother gives birth to a daughter. As an example of the second kind may be quoted the case of a mother who is at the same time a half sister on the father's side, such as may happen by the birth of a daughter of a marriage between a father and his daughter ; and as an example of the third kind where a mother's mother is at the same time half sister on the father's side, as may happen where a father marries his daughter and she gives birth to a daughter who in her turn is also married by the father. In this case the daughter who is first married to her father becomes mother's mother and half sister on the father's side to the children born of the second incestuous marriage.

SECTION 10 (1)

Where all the inheritors claim by right of agnation or what is equivalent to it and they are all of the same sex, they should share the estate in equal portions ; but in the case of concurrent claims by male and female agnates, each man counts for two women. In both cases, however, the number of heads is the “numerical basis of distribution,” which means that the estate is divided into as many lots as there are persons entitled to a share. Where there are concurrent claims, by reason of agnation, by heirs entitled under the Koran to equal portions, the numerical basis of distribution is the denominator of the fraction of these inheritors. Thus, the numerical basis of the fraction $\frac{1}{2}$ is two, of the fraction $\frac{1}{3}$ three, of the fraction $\frac{1}{4}$ four, of the fraction $\frac{1}{6}$ six, and of the fraction $\frac{1}{8}$ eight. In the case of two fractions having different denominators of which one is a multiple of the other, as $\frac{1}{3}$ and $\frac{1}{6}$, the numerical basis of distribution is the greater denominator. When of two denominators one is not a multiple of the other, but they have a least common multiple, the numerical basis is found by multiplying the particular factor of each of the denominators by the other. Thus the numerical basis of $\frac{1}{6}$ and $\frac{1}{8}$ is twenty-four. Where the denominators have no least common multiple, they must be multiplied by one another, and the product constitutes the numerical basis of distribution. Thus the numerical basis of $\frac{1}{3}$ and $\frac{1}{4}$ is twelve.

Numerical bases are seven in number ; two, three, four, six, eight, eleven, and twenty-four ; and of these bases the following can give rise to awl, i.e. to proportional reduction of the shares, or—what comes to the same thing—to an enlarging of the basis.

1. A basis of six becomes : (a) seven, e.g. in case of concurrent claims by a husband and two whole sisters or half sisters on the father's side ; (b) eight, if there is also a mother ; (c) nine, if there is a uterine brother in addition to (b) ; (d) ten, if there are several uterine brothers, in addition to (b).

2. A basis of twelve becomes : (a) thirteen, e.g. in case of concurrent claims by a wife and two whole sisters or half sisters on the father's side ; (b) fifteen, if there is also a uterine brother ; (c) seventeen, if there are several uterine brothers in addition to (a).

3. A basis of twenty-four becomes twenty-seven, e.g. in case of concurrent claims by two daughters, father, mother, and wife.

In the case of two fractions having the same denominator the calculation is easy, i.e. it is only necessary to multiply these fractions by the common denominator to obtain whole numbers with exactly the same proportion ; and the addition of these numbers gives the numerical basis ; but if the two fractions have different denominators then the following cases must be distinguished :—

1. One of the denominators is a multiple of the other ; they are thus mutually divisible, as 6 or 9 by 3 ; and the fractions are multiplied by the greatest.

2. They have a greatest common divisor, as 2 in the case of 4 and 6 ; then the fractions are multiplied by the least common multiple.

3. Their greatest common multiple is the number 1, as with 3 and 4 ; then the fractions are multiplied by the product of the two denominators.

Denominators of which one is a multiple of the other, have at the same time a greatest common divisor, but not vice versâ.

SECTION 10 (2)

When the numerical basis is known, and it allows of giving to all those persons entitled to share in the estate portions in whole numbers, the calculation is easy ; but in the case of portions composed of a whole number and a fraction the following cases must be distinguished :—

1. The fractions have the same denominator. Then the numerators must be rendered divisible by the number of heads. This is done, if there be no least common multiple, by multiplying the numerical basis by the number of heads ; or, otherwise, by multiplying, either the basis by the particular factor of the number of heads in question, or the number of heads by the particular factor of the basis, while observing in both cases the proportional reduction, if necessary.

2. The fractions have two different denominators. Then each numerator should be rendered divisible by its respective number of heads, after having reduced this number to its particular factor, if there exists a least common multiple. Then, in case of an equality in the number of heads that cause the two different fractions, it is necessary, in order to know the final basis, to multiply the number of heads by the numerical basis, while observing the proportionate reduction, if necessary. Where the two numbers of heads in question differ, the multiplication is made by the greater, if one is a multiple of the other ; and by the particular factors, if the two numbers have a least common multiple. Finally, if the numbers of heads are mutually indivisible, the numerical basis is multiplied by the product of these numbers. In this way is obtained a final numerical basis admitting of division without fractions ; and following the same principle the calculation can be made with fractions having three or even four different denominators, which is the greatest possible number.

If one wishes to know the number of shares that fall on the final basis to each category, one has only to multiply the number of the shares obtained on the original basis, by the multiplier of that basis ; and afterwards to divide the product by the number of heads. The quotient will be the separate portion of each inheritor.

SECTION 10 (3)

When the deceased leaves heirs of whom one dies before the distribution of the estate, leaving no other inheritors besides those of the original succession, who can claim the same portions in the second as in the first, the distribution takes place as if the deceased inheritor had never existed. This happens, for example, if a deceased person leaves only brothers and sisters, or sons and daughters ; and one of these heirs dies before distribution, leaving no other heirs than his coinheritors in the original succession.

Where, on the other hand, the inheritor deceased before distribution leaves other heirs, or his coinheritors are called to his succession in different portions from their shares in the original estate, these different portions must first be separately determined. If the number of shares assigned to the deceased inheritor in the original estate permits also of assigning to his own inheritors portions consisting of shares in whole numbers, the calculation is easy. Otherwise the number of shares in question must be rendered divisible by the basis of the second succession ; i.e. the basis and portions of the original succession must be multiplied by the particular factor of the basis of the second, at least if there exists a least common multiple of the number of shares fallen to the lot of the deceased inheritor, and the basis of his succession. If there is no least common multiple, the portions must be multiplied by that basis. Each inheritor in the original succession takes finally the portion due to him from that estate, multiplied by the multiplier above mentioned ; and a person called to the second succession obtains, from the first estate, the portion he would have from the second, multiplied by the portion of the deceased, or by the particular factor if there exists any least common multiple of the numbers in question.

BOOK 29.—WILLS

SECTION 1

CAPACITY to make a will is accorded by the law to every one, whether Moslem or not, without distinction of sex, who is adult, sane, free ; and even according to our school to a person otherwise incapable by reason of imbecility. It is not possessed by a madman, by a person in a faint, nor a minor ; though one jurist maintains that this incapacity does not extend to a minor who has attained the age of discernment. Neither can a slave make a will, unless—according to some jurists—he is enfranchised after doing so, and renews its dispositions before his death.

Testamentary dispositions for the public benefit must have some lawful object ; thus a legacy cannot be made for the upkeep of a Christian church or a synagogue. Those in favour of one or more individuals are permitted only on condition that the person designated is capable of exercising a right of property. Thus a legacy in favour of a child conceived has effect only upon the double condition that such child is born alive, and that the conception has already taken place at the moment of the disposition, i.e. that the birth takes place before the expiry of six months. If the birth takes place after an expiry of six months the child is not considered as having been conceived before the testamentary disposition, at least if the husband or the master has not ceased to have commerce with the mother. *Otherwise conception is admissible up to a maximum of four years. A legacy in favour of a slave falls to the master, unless the slave is enfranchised before the testator's death. As to a subsequent enfranchisement followed by acceptance on the part of the slave, the effect depends upon the question whether ownership of the legacy has or has not been acquired since the testator's death. Testamentary dispositions in favour of an animal are absolutely null, whether an intention is manifested to make the animal a proprietor, or whether nothing is announced as to that ; but when there is merely a declaration that the legacy is to be used so that the animal may never be in want of necessary nourishment, the traditional doctrine tends to admit its validity.

A legacy for the upkeep of a mosque is lawful, †and even one “ for the profit of a mosque," specifying nothing further. However, in this case, the disposition is considered to have been made not only for the upkeep properly so called, but also for any amelioration of the edifice. A legacy may also be left to an infidel, †whether or not the subject of a Moslem prince, †to an apostate, *and to a person who afterwards murders the testator. *A legacy in favour of a legitimate heir is valid only if unanimously approved by the coinheritors, after the succession has been opened. This approbation is strictly necessary even if the coinheritors renounce their claims to the succession, and it cannot be given before the testator's death. For the disposition can be invalidated only by the fact that coinheritors exist at the time of death; and this cannot be known before that event. A testamentary disposition leaving each inheritor his legitimate portion is void; but there is no objection to leaving one of one's heirs a specified object of the same value as the portion he can legally claim. †But the disposition must be approved by the coinheritors.

The following things may be left by will:—

1. "The child with which a certain slave is pregnant," words which imply the condition that the child is born alive, and at a time indicating that conception had already taken place at the moment of the disposition.

2. The usufruct of things that are not consumed by use.

3. †The future fruit of a tree, the future young of an animal, and the future children of a slave.

4. One of two slaves at the choice of the legatee.

5. An impure thing, provided its use is not forbidden by the law, e.g. a trained dog, manure, grape juice not intended for fermentation.

A legacy of "one of my dogs" has effect if the heir gives any dog that belonged to the deceased. If the deceased had no dogs it is void. A person owning dogs among his property may leave them either all or part, even though the dogs form the larger half of the estate. When one possesses two tambours one of which is a musical instrument of diversion and the other an instrument that may lawfully be used, e.g. a war drum or one used by pilgrims, the legacy of "a tambour" and nothing more refers to the latter. A legacy of the tambour of diversion is void, unless it can also be used as a war or pilgrim drum.

SECTION 2

Testamentary dispositions may not exceed a third of the estate; and those made in contravention of this precept of the law, may be reduced to the portion which may be disposed of, upon the application of the legitimate heir. If the heir declares his approval of the disposition, it is effective, whatever its amount may be ; but according to one jurist it is then considered as a mere donation upon the part of the heir, and the legacy itself remains void for as much as exceeds the third.

The reduction is carried out by forming a lump total of all the property existing on the day of the decease, or, according to others, the day the disposition was made. In the portion that may be disposed of are included : enfranchisements of which the condition has been fulfilled by death, liberalities inter vivos made during the last illness, such as wakaf, gift, simple enfranchisement, and remission of debts. If all this exceeds the third which may be disposed of, the following rules must be observed in the reduction :—

1. Where the testamentary dispositions consist only in enfranchisement of slaves, a drawing of lots must decide which of them shall be deprived of their liberty in consequence of the reduction.

2. Where the testamentary dispositions consist in liberalities of other kinds, all are subject to a proportionate reduction.

3. Where the testamentary dispositions consist both in the enfranchisement of slaves and in other liberalities, it is necessary first to divide the portion of which one may dispose in proportion to the amount of the two categories of the legacy, and then to proceed under 1 and 2. One authority, however, maintains that the enfranchisements should always have their effect up to the full amount of the portion of which one may dispose, in preference to all other liberalities.

4. Where the third of which one may dispose has been exceeded, not by testamentary dispositions, but by liberalities inter vivos, bestowed during the last illness, no proportional reduction takes place ; but earlier liberalities are executed in preference to later, until the amount of which one may dispose is exhausted. If these liberalities are of the same date and the same nature, e.g. the enfranchisement of all one's slaves, or the remission of all one's debts ; the enfranchisement is carried out by drawing lots, up to the amount of which one may dispose, but the remissions are reducible by so much in the pound. Liberalities inter vivos of the same date, but of different nature ; and in general all engagements entered into, not by the deceased in person, but through agents are also carried out at so much in the pound ; except in the case of enfranchisements, for in that case the rule explained under 3 must be observed. According to one authority, however, enfranchisement has still the preference even in this case.

A single exception is admitted to the rules given as to casting lots, that is to say if, e.g., the deceased has left only two slaves, Salim and Ghanim, and has declared before his death, " If I give his liberty to Ghanim, Salim shall be free too," and has afterwards enfranchised Gahnim in his last illness. In this case Ghanim alone becomes free, if it transpires that the two enfranchisements together exceed the third of which one may dispose ; and one cannot have recourse to drawing lots to decide between him and Salim.

If the deceased has bequeathed a specified object, at that locality, of which the value does not exceed the third of which one may dispose, while the rest of the estate is elsewhere, this object cannot be wholly delivered to the legatee immediately after the death ; and he cannot even be permitted the free disposition of a third, before the entire assets are got together, and become capable of being shared.

SECTION 3

A person who becomes so ill as to be in danger of death may no longer dispose of his property for nothing to a greater amount than one-third ; but should he against all hope recover, these dispositions cannot be invalidated. A sick person, not in any danger, may freely dispose of his property ; and even if he unexpectedly dies during this sickness, his dispositions have all the same their full legal effect. This is not the case where death is caused by the malady in question, even though the latter may not be regarded as of a dangerous nature, for then it is manifested to be really dangerous. In case of uncertainty as to the character of the malady, it should be ascertained by two doctors, free men of irreproachable character.

The following are considered by the law to be dangerous maladies—colic, pleurisy, constant flow of blood from the nose, chronic diarrhoea, phthisis, commencement of paralysis even where merely partial, vomiting out of food in an unchanged condition, and even vomiting in general if very violent and accompanied by pain or effusion of blood, and also continuous or intermittent fever, but not quartan fever. The following circumstances are by our school regarded as analogous to a dangerous malady—being made a prisoner of war by infidels who do not usually give quarter ; being in a desperate battle between two armies of equal force ; being condemned to death by the law of talion, or to be stoned to death ; being in a ship in the middle of a tempest or a rough sea ; a woman in grievous pangs of childbirth, before or after confinement, so long as the foetus has not broken the membrane.

A testamentary disposition is expressed by the words—"I leave him such and such a thing," "give it him," "give it him after my death," "I make it his," "it shall be his after my death ;" but the mere words "it is his" constitute an admission, and not a legacy. On the other hand, where one says, "It is his in my succession," this is a valid testamentary disposition. A testamentary disposition can also be expressed in a way which, though not explicit, still indicates the last wish of the deceased, e.g. by giving witnesses a writing that contains it.

A legacy in favour of a category of persons, as "the poor," does not require acceptance, but becomes irrevocable by decease; while, on the other hand, a legacy in favour of one or more particular persons should be formally accepted by them. The acceptance or renunciation of a legacy cannot take place during the testator's life-time; and it is not even rigorously necessary that the legatee should declare his decision immediately after the decease. Moreover, a legacy lapses if the legatee predeceases the testator. If he dies after the testator, but before accepting the legacy, the right of acceptance passes to his heirs. As the question at what period the legacy becomes the property of the legatee, some jurists consider that the legatee becomes owner from the death of the testator, under the condition that he accepts the legacy; others maintain the contrary, i.e. that he becomes owner only upon acceptance. *Others maintain that, before acceptance, the legacy remains in suspense, but that the legatee is regarded as having been the owner since the decease, if he accepts; and that otherwise the heirs have never lost the ownership. These three different doctrines as to the ownership of a legacy between the death of the testator and acceptance by the legatee, exist also with reference to fruit and the profit realised by a slave bequeathed by will, and with reference to other expenses, like the keep of the slave, and the tax to be paid for him on the breaking of the fast. According to the authorities who admit that the legacy remains in suspense until the legatee has accepted or repudiated it, the latter is nevertheless obliged to defray provisionally the cost of the keep of the slave or animal bequeathed.

SECTION 4

A legacy "of a shah," and nothing more, implies as well a large animal as a small one, a sound animal as one having redhibitory defects, an animal of the ovine as well as one of the caprine race, and even a male animal of one of these kinds, †but not a very young animal that can still be looked upon as sakhla or anak. A bequest of "a shah of my flock" is regarded as void, if the testator had no flock of shahs; but if it is a bequest of "a shah of my estate," one must be bought and given to the legatee, if the testator has left none. The expressions "camel" and "she-camel," in a testamentary disposition, include both the Bactrian and Arabian species; but the expression "camel" does not include "she-camel" or vice versâ. †The expression "animal of the camel race" includes both camel and she-camel. "Cow" excludes "bull," which in its turn includes only males; while, on the other hand, according to our school, the expression "mount" includes horse, mule, and donkey.

"Slave" includes a child, a woman, an individual with redhibitory defects and an infidel; though, according to some authorities, an injunction to an heir to enfranchise a slave means a slave who may be lawfully enfranchised by way of expiation. A bequest of "one of his two slaves" is ipso facto annulled by the death of both, accidental or otherwise, before the testator's decease; while the bequest becomes direct and simple by the death of one of the two slaves, accidental or otherwise. Where one instructs one's heirs to enfranchise "several slaves," they should give their liberty to three at least, and if the value of three exceeds the third of which one may dispose, it is necessary, according to our school, not to buy merely a share of a slave for the amount that remains of the third after the purchase of the two first, but to buy and enfranchise two slaves of a total value approaching as near as possible to the third of the estate; after which the excess goes to the profit, not of the legatee, but of the heirs. An injunction to enfranchise "two-thirds of a slave," involves merely an obligation to buy and enfranchise that share.

A legacy in favour of "the child such-and-such a woman is pregnant with," goes to the profit of both children, if she gives birth to twins; †and to the living, if one is born dead. Where, on the contrary, the testator added, "if it is a boy" or "if it is a girl," the giving of birth to a twin boy and girl nullifies the disposition. The legacy can only be claimed by the boy to the exclusion of the girl where the testator adds, "if she bears a boy in her womb." †This last form of legacy is still valid if the woman gives birth to twin boys; and the heir, in these circumstances, may give the object bequeathed to whichever child he chooses.

A legacy in favour of his "neighbours" extends to the inhabitants of forty houses in four different directions; one in favour of savants to all who occupy themselves with sciences relating to the law, i.e. Koranic exegesis, prophetic traditions, and jurisprudence; but it does not include mere reciters of the Koran, men of letters, interpreters of dreams, or doctors; nor does it include, according to most authorities, theologians properly so called.

A legacy in favour of the "poor" includes the "indigent," and vice versâ. Where both categories are jointly benefited, the legacy must be divided into two equal portions, and one given to each category, provided it comprises three persons at least. Of course the testator may also bequeath to one of the persons composing the category in question more than to the others so entitled; but according to our school a legacy "to so-and-so and to the poor" results in the person designated being unable to claim more than each separate poor person however small the portion may be, provided it is of some value. The person designated may not, however, be entirely excluded.

A bequest, moreover, may be made, not only in favour of a certain specified category of persons, without indicating their number, e.g. "to the Alids," but also to a specified number, e.g. "three persons" of a certain category, or to "the relatives of so-and-so." In this latter case, it should be observed that the phrase includes all the relatives, even those that are very distant, †but not those in a direct line, whether ancestors or descendants. †Relatives on the mother's side are not included in testamentary dispositions made by Arabs in favour of any one's "relatives," unless they are expressly named. Thus to know who the "relatives" are that are benefited by the testator, the nearest ancestor must be taken, and his descendants that have remained in the tribe must be regarded as the parents intended by the testator. If, on the other hand, the testator uses the expression "the nearest relatives," the legacy includes also the direct line, †it being always understood that son has priority over father, and brother over father's father; but with this exception the law grants no preference, in these circumstances, to either sex, nor by virtue of any right of succession. In consequence, father, mother, son, and daughter, are all considered as equal sharers in the legacy, and daughter's son has even priority over an agnate great grandson. †A legacy to one's own relatives does not include those that are legitimate inheritors.

SECTION 5

The usufruct of a slave or a house, or the rent of a shop, may be bequeathed. The legatee may then not only have the full enjoyment of the slave, but he is also owner of what the slave gains by his ordinary work; †and even of the dower, if it is a woman. †On the other hand, a child born of a slave during the usufruct follows the mother's condition, i.e. the legatee has the usufruct, but the ownership is the heir's. The latter also keeps the right of enfranchisement, and must provide for the slave's support, whether the usufruct is temporary or perpetual. The sale of an object of which the usufruct has been bequeathed to a third party for a specified time has the same consequences as the sale of a thing lent; †but in the case of a perpetual usufruct the thing can only be sold to the legatee. †If it is desired to ascertain whether a legacy exceeds the third of which one can dispose ; the perpetual usufruct of a slave must be regarded as ownership ; but if it is a case of temporary usufruct, the value of the slave's services must be calculated, having regard to the period during which the owner will be deprived of them.

*One may lawfully enjoin upon one's heir the accomplishment of a voluntary pilgrimage which one wished to accomplish oneself. The heir must then pay a visit to Mecca, †from the station fixed by the law, unless the testator has indicated some particular town for the pilgrimage to start from. As to an obligatory pilgrimage neglected by the deceased, this act of devotion has ipso facto to be defrayed by the estate, as we have seen. If, however, the testator has instructed the heir to pay it, either from the residue of the estate or from the third of which one may dispose, his last wishes must be observed. If the deceased has expressed no desire in the matter, the duty imposed on the heir to accomplish the obligatory pilgrimage that has been neglected must be defrayed from the residue of the estate, or according to others from the third of which one may dispose ; but in any case this duty relates only to the journey as from the station fixed by law. †Moreover, any person, even though not belonging to the family, may accomplish the obligatory pilgrimage for the deceased, though not authorised to do so by him or by his heir.

The heir must also bear the pecuniary charges, resulting from fixed expiations which the deceased neglected to accomplish. As to alternative expiations, the inheritor may at his choice give foodstuffs or clothing to the poor, if there is occasion for it, †and even enfranchise a slave for this purpose. †In any case, and whatever may be the nature of the expiation, the heir may accomplish it at his own expense, if the estate is insufficient, and it counts none the less as an act of the deceased. †The result is the same when the expiation is accomplished by some one not belonging to the family, at least in the case of a gift of foodstuffs or clothing, but not where the expiation consists in the enfranchisement of a slave. And the soul of the deceased profits from alms and pious invocations made for its benefit, whether by the heirs or by any other person.

SECTION 6

A testamentary disposition may be wholly or partly revoked. It may take place either :—

1. Verbally, e.g. by uttering the words—" I cancel the will," " I annul it," " I revoke it," " I renounce," or " The thing I have bequeathed will be none the less my heir's ; " or
2. By the fact of having disposed of the object bequeathed, by sale, enfranchisement, dower, gift, or security ; even where, in these two last instances, possession has not been taken by the donee or creditor ; or

3. By an injunction to the heir, contained in a later will, to dispose of the thing bequeathed in one of the ways mentioned under 2 ; or

4. †By an authorisation to sell the thing bequeathed ; †by a putting up for sale though unsuccessful ; or by mixing other wheat with the specified wheat bequeathed. Even if the legacy does not consist of specified wheat, but merely of “ a saa of wheat ” from a certain stack ; the fact of mixing it constitutes a revocation, at least if the wheat added is of superior quality. But if it is of the same †or of inferior quality, the fact of mixing it with the original wheat does not imply a revocation of the legacy. And, finally, revocation results from the following facts—grinding the corn bequeathed ; sowing one’s field with it, kneading flour bequeathed, spinning cotton, weaving thread, making a shirt out of a piece of stuff bequeathed, building or planting on a piece of land bequeathed.

SECTION 7

The Sonna has introduced the practice of appointing testamentary executors to see to the payment of the testator’s debts, the carrying out of his last wishes, and the guardianship of such of his children that are under age. An executor should be a Moslem, adult, sane, free, of irreproachable character, and a fit person to perform the duties intrusted to him. †However, an infidel subject of a Moslem prince may be appointed executor by a person of his own religion. Blindness is no cause of incapacity. An executor need not be a male ; and the mother of children that are under age is considered the fittest person to bring them up.

An executor guilty of notorious misconduct should be relieved of his functions. This principle applies also †to a judge ; but not to the chief of the state.

A right to appoint an executor to see to the payment of his debts and the carrying out of his last wishes belongs to every Moslem, adult, sane, and free ; but the faculty of intrusting to an executor the guardianship of children under age belongs only to a testator who is himself their lawful guardian. An executor cannot by will appoint another person to replace him after his death, *unless this faculty has been formally accorded him by the original testator. There is no objection to an appointment of two executors in succession ; as happens, for example, in the words, “ I constitute you my executor until the majority of my son," or "until the arrival of Zaid, for then my son," or "Zaid will undertake this duty." On the other hand, one cannot appoint an executor to be guardian of one's children, during the lifetime of their father's father, who is their lawful guardian, if he is capable of performing this duty.

It is forbidden to give power to an executor to conclude a contract of marriage for the deceased's son during his minority, or to represent the deceased's daughter as her guardian, in a contract of marriage.

Forms of words by which an executor may be appointed are—"I name you my testamentary executor," "I intrust my affairs to you," etc.; but there is no objection to adding a term or a condition, provisional or absolute. It is necessary to define with precision the duty the executor is charged with; for if one merely says, "I name you my executor," the disposition is null and void. The nomination of a testamentary executor has no effect until the duty is accepted; †and this acceptance cannot take place during the testator's lifetime.

Where the testator has named two executors, neither can do anything without the other's concurrence, unless such faculty has been expressly accorded. A testator may revoke a nomination, and an executor, even after accepting, can give it up when he pleases. On a child's majority an executor guardian must render him an account of his guardianship, and in case of disagreement, the law admits a presumption in the executor's favour, as to the expense of his ward's support. On the other hand, the presumption is in favour of the ward, with regard to any sum the executor alleges having paid him after his majority.

BOOK 30.—DEPOSITS

THE law forbids any one who is unable to keep it safely from accepting a deposit. Where a person accepts a deposit, being strictly speaking able to keep it, but not quite sure about it, the law regards him as merely blamable. On the other hand, the law considers it a meritorious act to accept a deposit, when one believes oneself to be in all respects capable of performing such a duty of trust. The depositor and the depositary should fulfil the same conditions as the principal and his agent. The contract is expressed on the part of the depositor by the words, "I constitute you depositary of this object," "I ask you to keep it," "I put you in my place to keep it;" †but a verbal and formal acceptance is not required on the part of the depositary, provided he takes possession of the thing.

One should not accept a deposit on the part of a minor or a madman ; though one incurs all the obligations of a true depositary if one does so. On the other hand, a minor who has accepted a deposit is not responsible for it in case of loss, †unless that loss is caused by his own personal fault. A person legally incapable through imbecility is subject to the same rule as the minor. The contract ceases upon the death of one of the contracting parties, or upon the madness or unconsciousness of the depositary. The deposit may be claimed back by the depositor, or restored by the depositary at any time.

As regards responsibility, the following modifying circumstances are to be noted :—

1. A depositary who deposits the thing intrusted to him with a third person, without the original depositor's permission, or manifest urgency becomes responsible for any loss or deterioration, even accidental ; except, according to some authorities, in the case of a judicial deposit ; all without prejudice to the depositary's right to have the object transported by another person under his supervision to the place where he wishes to keep it, or to keep it in a shop of which he is only part proprietor. A depositary who is preparing to make a journey, should restore the deposit, either to the owner or his agent, or, if necessary, to the court. In default of the owner, his agent, and the court, the depositary may even, in these circumstances, deposit the thing with another person worthy of confidence, without the latter incurring any ulterior responsibility. On the other hand, a depositary who buries the thing somewhere and then starts on a voyage is responsible for any loss or deterioration, even accidental, unless he has communicated the fact to some inhabitant worthy of confidence. If he takes the deposit with him on his journey, he is still responsible for accidental loss or deterioration, except in case of fire or hostile attack, unless he can find some one to whom he can lawfully transfer the deposit. Fire and hostile attack, and the fact that the place of deposit is liable to brigandage, have also, so far as regards the depositary's faculty of transferring the deposit, the same consequences as a voyage he is obliged to undertake. A depositary who falls dangerously ill should also return the deposit either to the owner or his agent, or to the court, or to a person worthy of confidence, or he should instruct his executor to do so, if he does not want to be still responsible for, though unable to exercise any control over it. It is only in case of absolute impossibility, e.g. in case of sudden death, that this ulterior responsibility is recognised.

2. A depositary who of his own accord transports a deposit from the original place or from his house to some other spot that is not so safe, becomes responsible for loss or accidental deterioration, but not if the new place is as safe as the original.

3. A depositary is responsible for the consequences of placing a deposit in contact with anything that may cause its loss or deterioration ; and also for not giving sufficient fodder to an animal intrusted to his care, ††unless the owner himself so instructed him. He should give the animal the fodder with which the owner supplied him, and if the latter neglected to supply him with any, he should ask for it either from the owner himself, or from his agent, or from the court. †But it is obvious that if the owner sends him, with the animal, a person specially appointed to give it drink, the depositary is not responsible for the consequences that may result from that person's acts. Where a deposit consists of woollen garments, the depositary should expose them to the air so that they may not become worm eaten ; and he should even wear them sometimes, if that is necessary to preserve them.

4. A depositary who has not scrupulously observed the directions given him by the owner as to the way the deposit shall be kept is responsible for all loss or deterioration that may result from his negligence. Thus where the owner has told him not to lie down on the top of a chest intrusted to him, and he does so, and the chest gives way beneath his weight, and its contents are crushed, the depositary is responsible ; ††but no responsibility is recognised if, in these circumstances, the deposit has not been crushed and destroyed by the fault of the depositary, but by accident or by another person's fault. The same rule should be observed where the owner has forbidden the locking of the chest with two padlocks, but the depositary has nevertheless done so. If some one is told, "Hold these drahms tight in your coat-sleeve," and he merely holds them in his hand, he is responsible for their loss, according to our school, if he lets them fall by inadvertence or when asleep, but not if the drahms are snatched away by a thief. If instead of holding them fast in his coat-sleeve, he puts them in his pocket, he is not responsible for any accidental loss. But if he holds them fast in his sleeve when he was told to put them in his pocket, he will then be responsible. If the owner, being at the market, gives the drahms to the depositary without indicating any particular manner of keeping them, the latter may, as he pleases, keep them fast in his coat-sleeve, hold them in his hand, or put them in his pocket, without being responsible for accidental loss; except that, if he keeps them in his hand, though no responsibility attaches to him if they are snatched away by a thief, he is responsible where loss is caused by his negligence or by his falling asleep. And where the owner directs the depositary to keep the money in a particular room, he should go there immediately and deposit what has been intrusted to him; for if he puts off doing this without good reason, he is responsible for the consequences.

5. The depositary is responsible for the loss or deterioration of the deposit caused in the following ways: (a) by putting it in a place where from its nature, it is not sufficiently secure; (b) by in some way imprudently calling a thief's attention to the deposit; (c) by indicating the deposit to some one who goes and claims it from the depositor. Even where a criminal forces the depositary to give him the deposit, the owner can none the less proceed in the first instance against the depositary; who, however, in his turn, can take action against the criminal.

6. The depositary is responsible where he makes use of a deposit in bad faith, i.e. wears the coat or rides the animal intrusted to his care. He is even responsible for taking a coat intending to wear it, or for taking drahms with the intention of using them; ††but a mere intention to commit such infidelity, followed by no attempt to execute it, is of no account. He is responsible if he mixes things intrusted to him with his own things, so that they are inextricably confused; †as also if he mixes the contents of two purses belonging to the same depositor. This responsibility of a depositary, once admitted from any cause whatever, does not cease by reason of his finally acquitting himself faithfully of his obligations; †but only where the depositor knowingly intrusts him again with the deposit.

A deposit should be returned to the depositor as soon as he calls for it ; the law not permitting the depositary to retain it under any circumstances. He is responsible for accidental loss or deterioration wherever, except in case of violence, he is late in restoring the deposit.

In disputes between depositor and depositary, the law admits the following presumptions :—

1. The statement of the depositary on oath must be believed ; if he does not allege a cause of accidental loss or deterioration ; or if he alleges a cause by nature invisible, as theft ; but his word alone, without an oath, is enough where he alleges a visible cause of public notoriety, such as a fire, at least if it is a general conflagration. But if the cause, though visible and of public notoriety, is not a general calamity, e.g. a partial conflagration, he must take an oath. A cause visible in its nature, but not of public notoriety, should first be legally proved, and after this the oath of the depositary is enough to show that the fire extended to the deposit in dispute.

2. The depositary's word confirmed on oath is also sufficient to establish a presumption that he has restored the deposit, either to the depositor or e.g. to the latter's heir ; but there is no such presumption where the depositary's heir maintains that the deposit has been restored by the depositor to the person entitled to it, or that he has deposited it with a person worthy of trust, because he was going on a journey, and the latter asserts that he restored it to the owner himself. On the owner's demand, these facts must be proved.

A refusal to deliver a deposit of which the return is claimed by the depositor is of itself sufficient to cause the depositary to be responsible for any accidental loss or deterioration, even though in ordinary circumstances he would not be so responsible.

BOOK 31.—DISTRIBUTION OF THE PROFITS OF WAR AND OF BOOTY

SECTION 1

By “profits” are understood everything that the Sovereign collects from the infidels, except booty taken in the battle or in the pursuit by our cavalry. It includes a capitation tax, a tithe on commerce, property abandoned by flying infidels before being attacked, property of an apostate executed or deceased, and the estate of an infidel subject of a Moslem prince, deceased without heirs.

Profits of war should be divided into five equal portions, of which one is devoted to the five following objects :—

1. The public interest, e.g. the fortification of the frontiers, the amelioration of judicial institutions or the encouragement of the sciences, whichever at the moment is the most urgent.

2. The support of the Beni Hashim and the Beni Muttalib, i.e. the descendants of the Prophet’s relatives, without distinction between rich and poor. The proportion between the pension thus allotted to the male members of the family and that of the females is the same as in the succession to a deceased person’s estate.

3. The support of orphans, i.e. minors who have lost their father, provided they are really poor.

4. Assistance granted to the indigent.

5. Assistance granted to strangers.

The distribution amongst the four last categories is effected while taking into consideration the number of persons entitled on the whole Moslem territory ; though according to some jurists the yield of each country should be divided amongst those of its inhabitants who are entitled to it, without regard to the portions allotted elsewhere.

*As to the other four-fifths of the profits of war, these are applied to the support of the soldiers composing the permanent army, always held ready for the war against the infidels. Its administration is delegated to a special department organised by the Sovereign for that purpose, and to overseers appointed for each tribe and for each brigade. These overseers must make themselves acquainted with what concerns each soldier and his family ; they should ascertain the sum necessary for his support and for that of his family, and see that this sum is correctly paid.

The first inscribed on the army registers are the Koraishites, and they are paid first before the others. They include all the descendants of Nadr ibn Kinana—i.e. (1) the Beni Hashim and the Beni Muttalib ; (2) the descendants of Abd Shams ; (3) the descendants of Nawfal ; (4) the descendants of Abd-al-Ozza ; (5) the descendants of the other relatives of the Prophet, according to the degrees of their respective generations.

After the Koraishites are inscribed upon the registers the descendants of the inhabitants of Medina who took the part of the Prophet against the inhabitants of Mecca, then the other Arabs, and lastly foreign nations converted to Islam. There should be struck out from the registers all those who have become blind, sickly, or for some other reason incapable of taking part in war ; but a soldier who is ill or mad still receives his pay if recovery can be hoped for ; *otherwise he is pensioned. After his death his pension is paid to his widow and children, i.e. to his widow until she remarries, and to his children until they are old enough to support themselves. Any excess of the four-fifths that may be left over should also be distributed amongst the soldiers of the permanent army, in proportion to their respective salaries ; though the Sovereign may also apply it to the upkeep of the fortifications, or to the purchase of arms and cavalry horses. It must be noted that all that has been said in this section applies only to movable property ; for as to immovable property forming part of the profits of war, it should constitute a wakaf, the revenue being then distributed as movable property.

By “booty” is understood what is taken upon the infidels, either in the battle or in the pursuit ; it being understood that the equipment of a dead enemy belongs ipso facto to the slayer.

By “equipment” is understood the clothes, boots, gaiters, cuirass, arms, mount, saddle, bridle, *bracelet, *belt, *ring, and *provisions a soldier has upon him ; and also *a spare mount or beast of burden led at his side ; but not the truss bound upon the crupper of his horse, at least according to our rite. This right to the equipment exists only when one has personally run some danger, attacking the enemy in front. Where one has merely killed an infidel by means of a projectile thrown from the ramparts of a fortress, or from a distance in the ranks, or where one has killed a sleeping infidel, a prisoner of war, or a person belonging to a routed army, no such recompense can be claimed. To establish one's right to his equipment, however, it is enough to have put the infidel hors de combat, even without killing him, e.g. by gouging out his eyes, or cutting off his hands or his feet ; *or it is even sufficient to have made him a prisoner, or cut off his hands or his feet, without putting him entirely hors de combat. Equipment is not included in the distribution of booty.

The booty that remains over after deducting equipments, cost of surveillance, transport, etc., is divided into five equal portions, one of which is divided in the same way and amongst the same persons as the first fifth of the "profits." †Rewards are paid out of the twenty-fifth part devoted to the public interest, at least if such is the order of the Sovereign ; but the latter may also employ for this purpose money paid into the treasury at the end of previous expeditions. By "reward" is meant any extraordinary recompense promised by the Sovereign or the General in command to any one, whether a soldier or not, who accomplishes some feat to the detriment of the infidels, of whatever nature it may be. The amount of the reward depends upon the importance of the feat and the greatness of the danger incurred. The remaining four-fifths of the booty are given in entirety to those who have obtained it ; making no distinction between movable and immovable property. All those are entitled to it who are upon the field of battle intending to fight, even though they may not personally have taken part in the combat. On the other hand, a person who does not arrive upon the field of battle until the issue is decided can claim nothing. Authorities are not agreed as to the right of persons arriving before booty has been gathered, though after the end of the fighting. The rights of combatants who die after the battle, and after the booty has been collected, pass to their heirs ; ‡and it is the same with the soldier who dies after the battle, but before the collection of the booty. But the heirs of soldiers actually killed during the fighting can claim nothing, according to our rite. *Individuals engaged to conduct beasts of burden, or look after the baggage, and traders and artisans following the army, may all participate in the booty if they have actually fought.

A horseman's share is three times that of a foot soldier ; no distinction being made between those that have one horse and those that have more, or between a man riding an arab horse and one that rides a horse of inferior breed. Soldiers mounted, not on horses, but on camels, etc., receive the same as foot soldiers ; and the same is the case with horsemen mounted on animals that are thin and unfit for service, though one authority maintains that these share like other horsemen, unless the General in command has notified them to remain in the rear. A slave, a minor, a woman, and an infidel subject of a Moslem prince, taking part in a battle without being obliged to, receive a remuneration to be determined by the Sovereign, but less than that received by those who participate in the booty. *These remunerations are payable out of the four-fifths that remain disposable.

[††An infidel subject of a Moslem prince can claim no remuneration, unless he has served in the war without pay, and with the Sultan's special authorisation.]

BOOK 32.—DISTRIBUTION OF THE PROCEEDS OF THE TAX

SECTION 1

THOSE entitled may be divided into eight categories :—

1. The poor, i.e. those who have nothing, and cannot gain their living. One may be legally called poor, though having a house, clothing, property at a distance of more than two days' journey, or debts due to one at a fixed date ; and even though able to gain a living by some work not suitable for one. Thus a learned man may be called poor though able, strictly speaking, to provide for his own needs by exercising some trade that would prevent him continuing his studies ; but this cannot be alleged as an excuse by a person who, wishing to perform some voluntary act of devotion, makes it a pretext for not working. To be admitted amongst the number of the poor, it is not necessary to be sickly, nor to abstain from asking for alms, at least according to what Shafi'i maintained in his second period. †On the other hand, a person is not poor if he has relatives—or if she has a husband—who should provide maintenance.

2. The indigent. In this category are classed those persons who, though possessed of property, or making a living that might, strictly speaking, be called sufficient, yet have not enough for their maintenance in the circumstances in which they happen to be.

3. Those engaged in the administration of the tax, i.e. the collectors, registrars, distributors, and the messengers to call together the tax-payers ; but not including the judge, or the prefect of the province.

4. Persons inclined to Islam who need some assistance in order to declare themselves openly to be converts ; or whose high social position gives hope of the conversion of other infidels. According to our rite these two categories of persons are admitted to be entitled.

5. Slaves undergoing enfranchisement by contract.

6. Insolvent debtors, provided their debt has a legitimate cause.

[*Insolvent debtors should be assisted, even where their debts have no legitimate cause, if they manifest a firm intention henceforth to introduce better order into their business or their conduct.] *Persons of this category participate by the fact of being in difficulties, though the debts may not yet be due for payment. [†On the contrary, before the debts become due, they are not entitled.] What we have said about this class of persons applies only to debtors who have contracted obligations in their own interest; for those who have done so with a laudable object should be compensated in all cases, even though they may be rich. Some authors, however, admit an exception in the case of an individual so rich in coin that he can easily meet his engagements.

7. Those "in the way of God," i.e. who take part in the war against the infidels, unless they share in the four-fifths of the profits of war. This category of persons are entitled without distinction of fortune.

8. Travellers without means to begin or to continue their journey; on the sole condition that the journey is not undertaken for an illicit purpose.

These persons we have now mentioned as being entitled must also be Moslems, not belonging to the families of the Beni Hashim or the Beni Mottalib, nor under the patronage of any member of these two families.

SECTION 2

A person claiming a share in the proceeds of the tax should be admitted amongst the number of those entitled, if the Sovereign is certain that the claim is well founded, or dismissed at once, if the Sovereign is convinced of the contrary. In case of uncertainty a simple declaration of poverty or indigence is enough, without the claimant being obliged to produce proof; but if it is certain that the person in question was formerly in easy circumstances, he must then prove the loss of his property. †This rule applies also to those alleging, as the cause of their poverty, their being charged with the maintenance of a numerous family. A simple declaration is enough in order to share as a combatant for the faith or a traveller; but claimants under these two categories must restore what they have received, if it subsequently appears that they have remained at home. On the other hand, persons employed in the collection, slaves undergoing enfranchisement by contract, and debtors, must in all cases prove the ground of their claim. It is understood that in these cases sufficient proof includes not only the deposition of two witnesses of irreproachable conduct; but also public notoriety, and a confirmation by creditor or master.

Poor and indigent persons never obtain more at one time than is necessary for the current year. [†According to Shafi's personal opinion, accepted by nearly all authorities, they should be given enough to support them for the rest of their life, according to average mortality, this sum being devoted to the purchase of some immovable property of which the revenue is applied to their maintenance.

A slave undergoing enfranchisement by contract, and the debtor, receive only what is necessary to pay what they owe. The traveller receives sufficient money to reach his destination or his domicile. The combatant for the faith should be provided with what is required for his maintenance and outfit, there and back, including the period during which he is on the frontier. A horse and arms are given him; and these remain his property, even after the end of the war. The combatant and the traveller may even claim a mount all ready equipped, if they have to go a great distance, or if they are too weak to make the journey on foot; and lastly they have a right to the necessary transport; if their provisions or their baggage are so bulky that they cannot easily carry it themselves.

*A person who wishes to claim on two counts has to be content with what is due to him under one head only.

SECTION 3

The Sovereign or his subordinates employed for that purpose should divide the proceeds of the tax into eight portions; or, where there are no special collectors, into seven. In default of one or more of the categories their portions go to the others by virtue of the law of increase. The portion of each category should be wholly divided up amongst the individuals composing it; and similarly the taxpayer who prefers to effect the partition himself, should divide up the entire amount due by him, if all the categories of those entitled live in his place. In any case a category cannot legally be admitted to share in the distribution, unless it is composed of at least three individuals. The respective categories have each right to an equal portion; but equality is not required between the shares of the individuals composing a category, unless the distribution is effected by the Sovereign, for in this case inequality of shares is forbidden if there is equality of need.

*The transfer of the tax collected in one district into another is illegal, except in the case of a district where none of the categories entitled exist. In this latter case the transfer is incontestably obligatory. According to those authorities who do not admit the prohibition of a general right of transfer, a transfer is obligatory if all eight categories do not exist in the district. Among the authorities who maintain the prohibition of a transfer, except in the case of a total lack of persons entitled, the majority allows the claim of the categories existing in the district to the share of those that are absent. There are some, however, who, though rejecting in these circumstances a transfer of the entire proceeds of the tax, admit none the less a transfer of the portions of the categories that do not exist.

A collector should be a free man of irreproachable conduct, and sufficiently instructed in the dispositions of the law relating to the tax. If, however, the amount due by the taxpayers, and the shares of those entitled are mentioned in his instructions, it is not necessary for him to have any profound knowledge of the subject. The month of collection should always be announced beforehand.

The Sonna has introduced the practice of marking animals due for the tax or as profits of war, with a red-hot iron on a part of the body where the hair is thin. It is blamable to mark animals upon the face. [†It is even expressly forbidden, according to a decision of Baghawi; while in the collection of Moslim, called Es-sahih, there is a tradition that the Prophet cursed whoever should commit a similar atrocity.]

SECTION 4

The Sonna prescribes also a supererogatory tax that may be given even to persons in easy circumstances and to infidels. It is given in secret, in the month of Ramadan, preferably to one's near relatives and neighbours. But it is recommended to those who owe a debt, or have to maintain a family, not to pay a tax on their property by way of charity until they have first discharged these obligations. [†It is even forbidden to spend in charity money required for the maintenance of those dependent on one, or for paying a debt that otherwise one can hope for no means of paying.] †It is commendable to be charitable out of one's superfluity, provided that too great a burden is not thereby incurred.

BOOK 33.—MARRIAGE

CHAPTER I.—GENERAL PROVISIONS

SECTION 1

MARRIAGE is to be recommended for every man who feels the need of it, provided he is able to undertake the pecuniary obligations that result from it. Otherwise it is better to abstain and repress one's passions by fasting. Marriage is a blamable act for a man who does not feel the need of it, and is not able to support the expense; but not for one who, though not needing it, is yet able to undertake its obligations. It is preferable, however, that such a person should remain a celibate and devote himself entirely to religious practices.

[†Should such a man not possess a temperament suitable for an austere life, it is better for him to take a wife, though it is not strictly necessary. But it is blamable in him to marry if, though able to support the expense, he is physically incapable of fulfilling his marital duties, by reason of decrepitude, chronic malady, impotence, etc.]

One should preferably choose, as a wife, a virgin, of religious sentiments and well-established descent, not too nearly related to the husband.

The Sonna has introduced the practice of seeing a woman one proposes to marry, even without her knowing it, and even several times, before demanding her in marriage; but the suitor must not see any more of his future wife than the face and hands. The law forbids a male adult to look upon the shameful parts of a free adult woman, a "stranger" to him—i.e. not his near relative, wife or slave. This prohibition extends, in ordinary circumstances, to the face and hands, ††even though one may be sure of not feeling any lascivious sensations. Relatives within the prohibited degrees need conceal only that part of the body between the navel and the knees; or, according to some authorities, the parts of the body that are invisible when such women are engaged upon their household duties. †As to a female slave any one may see her body, except between navel and knees; and a girl under age need only conceal her pudendum; unless upon looking at either one experiences lascivious sensations, in which case they should cover the whole body. †A slave with regard to his mistress and a eunuch with regard to any woman, are considered as men within the prohibited degrees. A minor of either sex approaching majority should observe the law as if majority were already attained. Men may look at each other, provided they keep concealed the part of the body between navel and knees ; but it is forbidden to look upon the body of a beardless youth, if it excites desire.

[†One should avoid altogether looking upon a beardless youth, for fear of exciting an infamous passion ; this is Shafii's personal opinion. †The best authors consider a female slave as subject to the same rule as a free woman, so far as regards the prohibition of being seen.]

Women among themselves should observe the rule laid down for men ; †though an infidel woman, subject of a Moslem prince, may not look upon a Moslem woman. †A woman may lawfully look upon the body of a foreigner, except between navel and knees, unless fleshly desires are thereby excited. [†It is forbidden for a woman to look upon a man, in the same way as for a man to look upon a woman.] A woman may look upon a relative within the prohibited degrees, as a man may. A prohibition of looking upon implies that of touching ; though one may both look upon and touch any part of the body, for the purpose of bleeding, or applying a cupping glass, or dressing a sick or wounded member.

[It is permissible, if necessity requires it, to look upon any woman with whom one wishes to enter into commercial relations, or who is a witness in a court of law, or where it is necessary to give her some instruction, etc.]

A husband has a right to see all parts of his wife's body.

SECTION 2

One may ask for the hand of any woman who is unmarried, or whose legal period of retirement is finished ; but a woman whose period is not yet completed may not be openly demanded in marriage. A woman repudiated in a revocable manner can never be demanded in marriage during her retirement, even indirectly. But one may, if one uses ambiguous terms, make a proposition of this nature to a widow, during her retirement, *or to a woman repudiated irrevocably. The law forbids asking for the hand of a woman who has already received and formally accepted a similar proposition from another, except with the consent of one's rival ; *but until a woman has decided as to the first offer, there is no objection to making her a second. When a woman asks advice from a third party as to a man who has made her an offer of marriage, this third party is bound to give her sincere and truthful information.

It is commendable that a demand in marriage, as well as the contract, should be preceded by some edifying words ; ††though strictly speaking it is enough, for the validity of the marriage, that the bride's guardian should say these words, and that the husband should simply answer : "Glory to God, and grace to his apostle—God grant him his grace and blessing—I accept, etc." [††This fashion is not at all commendable.] The marriage is not legally binding, if the offer is separated from the acceptance by a long religious ceremony.

SECTION 3

A marriage is not constituted except by an offer, expressed in terms such as : "I give you in marriage," or "I give you for wife," followed by acceptance, expressed in terms such as : "I take her as wife," "I marry her," "I consent to marry her," or "I accept your offer." The validity of the marriage is unaffected by the husband or the guardian being the first to express his will ; but it is rigorously necessary that the guardian should make use of the words "give in marriage," or "give for wife." Arabic † for any other language may be used, provided that consent is expressed on both sides in explicit terms. Consequently, our school does not accept the validity of a marriage where the husband replies, "I accept," without specifying what, to the guardian who says to him, "I give you her in marriage ;" but there is no objection to the consent being expressed in the words : "Give her me in marriage," and "I give her you," or "marry her," and "I marry her."

The parties may not make their consent depend upon any condition ; and our school regards the contract as wholly null where a father, hearing his wife has given birth to a child, cries out, "If it is a daughter, I give her you in marriage ;" or where he says, "If my daughter is repudiated by her present husband, I will give her you in marriage, after her legal retirement. A contract of marriage may not be made for a certain term ; nor have a reciprocal character in such a way that the parties are mutually exempt from dower, e.g. by saying : "I give you my daughter in marriage on condition that you give me yours, and that the one's virginity becomes the other's dower," even though such proposal is accepted. †But a reciprocal marriage is perfectly regular, if the value of virginity is not taken into the calculation ; †it is nullified when such value enters however little into the amount of the dowers.

A marriage should be effected before two witnesses, free, male, of irreproachable character, sound in hearing and sight—though the necessity of being able to see is doubtful. †There is no objection to the witnesses being near relatives, e.g. sons of the bridegroom and bride, or their personal enemies. ††Nor does it matter if the reputation of the witnesses is doubtful; provided it is not notoriously bad; but the law insists positively upon their being free and Moslems. Though our school regards as null a marriage effected before witnesses whose incompetence from notorious misconduct was known at the time, this circumstance alleged after the celebration is only admissible if legally proved or admitted by the parties. It is not sufficiently established by a mere subsequent declaration of the witnesses themselves; and if only the husband admits the circumstances, while the wife denies it, the marriage is not null, but the law requires a separation; upon which the husband owes his wife half her dower, if he has not yet had connection with her, or otherwise the whole. It is commendable to choose as witnesses persons agreeable to the bride, at least where her consent is necessary to the marriage. However, it is not necessary to ask her advice as to the witnesses.

SECTION 4

A woman cannot give herself in marriage, even though her guardian should authorise her to do so. Nor can she give in marriage another woman, even as agent of the latter's guardian; nor effect a marriage as agent for the husband. However, if cohabitation ensues upon a marriage effected without a male guardian, proportional dower is due, and the couple are not guilty of the crime of fornication.

The guardian's admission is accepted as sufficient proof of a marriage where he has a right to dispose of the bride's hand as he pleases; but not where the bride's consent is also necessary. According to the opinion adopted by Shafii in his second period, the wife's admission must also be accepted, provided she is of age, and sane.

A father can dispose as he pleases of the hand of his daughter, without asking her consent, whatever her age may be, provided she is still a virgin. It is, however, always commendable to consult her as to her future husband; and her formal consent to the marriage is necessary if she has already lost her virginity. Where a father disposes of his daughter's hand during her minority, she cannot be delivered to her husband before she attains puberty. In default of the father, the father's father exercises all his powers. Loss of virginity puts an end to the right of disposing of a daughter's hand without her consent; and there is no difference in this respect between a loss caused by licit cohabitation and one that is the consequence of unlawful intercourse. On the other hand, the right remains intact where the loss has taken place without carnal connection, as for example in consequence of a fall upon the ground. Collateral agnates, such as whole brother, or half brother on the father's side or father's brother, cannot in any way engage the hand of a daughter under age; and a woman who has lost her virginity must manifest her consent in explicit terms, when collateral agnates give her in marriage. As to an adult virgin, it is enough that she does not oppose the choice of her collateral agnates.

The persons who have the right to assist a woman as guardian at her marriage are first of all the father, then father's father, then his father, then the whole brother or half brother on the father's side, then the latter's son or other agnate descendant, then father's whole brother or half brother on father's side; and lastly the other agnates in the order in which they are called to the succession, *it being understood that a whole brother always has priority over a half brother on the father's side. A son, though the nearest agnate, cannot give his own mother in marriage, since a right of guardianship does not pass into the descendant line; he can only do so if he is also son of the son of his mother's father's brother, or by right as patron or as judge representing the Sovereign. In default of agnates in the ascendant or collateral line, a woman should be given in marriage by her patron, †and after him by his agnates in the order in which they are called to the succession. In the case of an enfranchised slave who has no patron, but a patroness, she should be given in marriage by the individual who in these circumstances would be the guardian of the patroness, ‡without the latter's consent being necessary. After the death of the patroness, the right of assisting the enfranchised slave as guardian devolves upon the same person as does the patronage. Lastly, in default of patron, or agnates of patron or patroness, it is the Sultan who should assist the enfranchised slave who wishes to marry, as guardian of all the women in his empire who have no other, or whose guardian, whether agnate or patron, prevents the marriage by abusing his power. It is considered an abuse of power on the guardian's part, where an adult sane woman wishes to marry a suitable person and the guardian refuses to give her to him; †but not where she wishes to marry a particular individual, and her father wishes to give her to another who is also suitable.

SECTION 5

The following are incapable of assisting a woman at her marriage as guardian: a slave, a minor, a lunatic, a person whose intelligence is troubled by reason of senility, or by the work of a malicious spirit; and even, according to our school, a person legally incapable by reason of imbecility. In case of incapacity of persons with a prior claim to guardianship, it falls to those who have second claim and so on. If the guardian is in a state of unconsciousness, and his attacks are usually temporary, it is necessary to wait until he comes to himself again, even though the state of unconsciousness should last several days. Under these circumstances, however, some jurists consider that the right of guardianship passes to the next of those entitled. †Blindness is no obstacle to guardianship ; but notorious misconduct is, at least according to our rite. As to an infidel, he is only capable of assisting as guardian a woman who also is an infidel.

A state of ihram, whether of the guardian, or of the bride or bridegroom, is an obstacle to the validity of a marriage ; †but the ihram of the guardian does not transfer the right of guardianship. The Sultan, or the judge for him, should then replace the guardian. [Even in the case where one of the two contracting parties, i.e. the guardian or the husband, appoints, previously to his state of ihram, a competent agent to conclude the marriage in his name, its validity is not to be accepted.

A legitimate guardian who is at a distance of at least two days' journey should be replaced by the Sultan, i.e. by the judge ; †but if he be at a less distance, the court cannot proceed without his authorisation.

Guardians that have a right to dispose of the hand of a woman as they please, i.e. her father or father's father, can delegate an agent for this purpose, *even without indicating the husband they have in view. In this case the agent may give the woman to whatever man he pleases, provided it is a fitting match and not a mesalliance. As to a guardian who has no right to dispose as he pleases of the hand of the future bride, he should appoint an agent if she desires it, but abstain from doing so if she forbids it ; †but where a woman asks her guardian to give her the requisite assistance for her marriage, without saying anything further the latter has a right to delegate an agent. ††But such guardian can never appoint an agent without first obtaining the woman's consent to the proposed marriage. A legitimate guardian's agent should say, "I give you in marriage the daughter of so-and-so." If it is the husband who is represented by an agent, the guardian says to him, "I give my daughter in marriage to so-and-so," and the agent answers, "I accept her as wife on behalf of my principal."

A father or father's father should, if possible, seek a husband for their adult daughter or grand-daughter in a state of lunacy ; but as to an adult male lunatic his curator should not seek a wife for him, unless he is manifestly in need of one ; and promises of marriage should never be made with regard to lunatics under age of either sex,

A guardian who has the right to dispose as he pleases of the hand of a woman cannot without good reason decline to perform his duty, if he is asked to effect a marriage desired by the woman in question ; the same obligation rests upon the other guardians, where they are personally indicated by the law, e.g. where the bride has only one whole brother or half brother on the father's side. Where this is not the case, e.g. where she has several brothers, †any one of them should undertake the duty upon the woman's demand, though it is to be recommended that those individuals whose degree of relationship calls them equally to the guardianship should intrust this function to the wisest or the eldest, or decide the matter by lot if they cannot otherwise come to an agreement. ‡In these circumstances, however, if the bride does not object, she may, strictly speaking, be given in marriage by any one of those entitled, even though the lot may have fallen upon another.

If one of the persons entitled to the guardianship gives a woman in marriage to Zaid, and another gives her to Amr, she belongs to the husband who has the priority ; and both marriages are void if effected at the same time or if it is not known which is the earlier. This is also the case, at least according to our school, when it is known that one of the marriages preceded the other, but it is not known which ; but where one is at first believed to have the priority, and afterwards doubts arise upon the subject, the matter remains in suspense until the doubts are dissipated. When each of the two husbands asserts that the woman in question knows he has the priority, it is impossible, according to the opinion of Shafii in his second period, to admit any presumption in favour of the one or of the other ; in default of legal proof the decision then depends upon the wife's admission. Consequently if she denies being married to any one the two husbands can only have an oath administered to her ; and if she admits being married to one of them it is this last marriage that is to be accepted as valid, without prejudice to the other husband's right to question the marriage in a court of law, and if necessary have an oath administered to the wife. Such is the doctrine of authorities who allow an admission expressed in the form, "This object is Zaid's, not Amr's," as creating a pecuniary obligation towards the latter as well as a real obligation towards the former ; while jurists who do not allow that in such a case Amr can claim any compensation do not allow either that the marriage can be attacked in the circumstances just mentioned.

†Father's father may lawfully effect a marriage by himself alone in his double character as guardian of the daughter of one of his sons, and as guardian or curator of the son of another of his sons. But a cousin on the father's side cannot in this way marry his cousin whose guardian he is by right of agnation, for in these circumstances the guardianship devolves upon another agnate cousin of the same degree of relationship, and after him upon the judge as representing the Sovereign. A judge who wishes to marry a woman having no other guardian cannot marry her to himself, but must be replaced as guardian by his superior magistrate or by his substitute. With the exception of father's father no one can effect a marriage entirely by himself, neither as guardian of the two parties interested, nor as tutor of the one and agent of the other. †Nor can a marriage be effected by two agents, one of the guardian and the other of the bridegroom.

SECTION 6

A guardian can never give a woman in marriage to a man of inferior condition, except with her entire consent. Where there are several persons who, by their degree of agnation, are equally competent as guardian, the consent of all is necessary to a mesalliance, though it is only one of them that need preside at the celebration of the marriage. Agnates further removed can never oppose a mesalliance concluded by one more nearly related, acting as guardian, with the full consent of the woman in question ; but a mesalliance concluded by one of the agnates intrusted with the guardianship, without the consent of the others equally competent is wholly illegal, even though the bride should have given her consent. A single authority maintains that in this case the validity of the marriage must be accepted, until the other agnates have demanded its dissolution by the court. A similar controversy exists where a father disposes of the hand of his virgin daughter, whether minor or adult, in favour of a man of inferior condition, without obtaining her consent. According to most authorities such a marriage is null and void, but according to the jurist just mentioned the contract is valid unless the wife applies for its cancellation. An adult wife should bring an action for this purpose at once, but a minor should wait until she has attained her majority. †Finally neither the Sultan as ultimate guardian, nor the judge for him, can legally give a woman in marriage to a man of inferior condition, even though she may desire it.

In order to determine whether the suitor is a good match, the following must be taken into consideration :—

1. Absence of redhibitory defects of body.
2. Liberty. A slave is not a suitable match for a free woman, nor an enfranchised slave for a woman born free.
3. Birth. An Arab woman makes a mesalliance by marrying a man belonging to another nation ; a woman of the Koraish does so if her husband is not of the Koraish ; a woman who is a descendant of Hashim or of Abd-al-Mottalib, i.e. who is of the same blood as the Prophet, can make a suitable match only in the same family. †In the case of marriages between persons belonging to foreign nations, like the Persians, genealogy must be taken into consideration as in the case of Arabs.

4. Character. A man of notorious misconduct is not a suitable match for an honest woman.

5. Profession. A man exercising a humble profession is not a suitable match for the daughter of a man in a more distinguished profession. Thus a sweeper, a barber, a watchman, a shepherd, or a servant at a bathhouse, is not a suitable match for the daughter of a tailor ; while the tailor in his turn is no match for the daughter of a merchant or a second-hand dealer, who in their turn are no suitable match for the daughter of a learned man or a judge.

†Difference of fortune constitutes no cause of mesalliance ; but inequality under one of the aspects above-mentioned is not compensated for by the husband being superior to his wife in other respects.

A father or father's father should never marry his son or his grandson to a slave ; nor, according to our school, to a person with redhibitory defects ; but with these two exceptions the law does not admit that a man can make a mesalliance by marrying a woman in any respect inferior to him.

SECTION 7

The curator of a lunatic minor cannot effect a marriage in his name ; and the curator of an adult lunatic can do so only if the latter is manifestly in need of it, and then only with one woman at a time. As to a sane minor, his father or father's father can marry him to as many wives as the law permits. An insane woman, whatever her age, and whether she be virgin or not, should, if possible, be given in marriage by her father or father's father, not only if she needs it but also if it is in any way advantageous for her. But a husband ought not to be sought for a mad woman during her minority, unless she is under the guardianship of her father or father's father. †Upon her majority it is the Sultan who should find her a husband if she requires one, but not if it be merely for her advantage.

A person legally incapable by reason of imbecility cannot legally effect a marriage in his own name ; his curator's authorisation is necessary for this purpose, unless the curator prefers to effect it himself in the name of the person legally incapable. Where the latter obtains the authorisation to marry a specified woman he cannot marry any other. He cannot even marry the woman specified unless he promises a proportional dower, or a definite dower, inferior to what the woman could claim as proportional dower. The promise of even a definite and excessive dower does not, however, prejudice the validity of the marriage; for the promised dower is in that case ipso facto reduced to a reasonable amount. An authorisation granted to a person legally incapable to marry a woman not specified for a dower of at most one thousand pieces of money, gives him a right to take what woman he pleases provided her proportional dower does not exceed this sum. †If he is authorised generally without any restriction as to the woman or the dower, he can marry whom he likes provided her proportional dower does not exceed his means. †As to the curator, he can conclude no marriage in the name of the imbecile without his consent. Nor can he allow more than proportional dower, or a dower inferior to what the wife could claim as proportional dower; and if this limit is exceeded, though the marriage remains valid, the dower is ipso facto reduced to a reasonable amount. Only one authority is of opinion that in this case the marriage is null and void. Finally a marriage concluded by an imbecile without the authorisation of his curator is absolutely null; even though cohabitation should have resulted, he owes his wife nothing. Others, however, maintain that in this case he owes her proportional dower; and others consider he owes a small present, which should not be something quite without value.

A bankrupt is subject to no restriction as to his right to marry; but the expenses of the marriage must be defrayed out of what he gains personally, and not out of the estate.

The law regards as null and void a marriage effected by a slave without his master's consent, which may lawfully be given either by a general authorisation, or restricted to a specified woman or one of a certain tribe or place, in which case the slave must respect the will of his master. *However, a master cannot lawfully force his male slave to marry, nor, on the other hand, is he obliged to allow him to marry. A female slave cannot oblige her master to give her in marriage, unless according to some authors, cohabitation with her is prohibited to the master himself. †Moreover, when giving a female slave in marriage, a master acts by virtue of his right of ownership and not as guardian; this is why the faculty is granted not only to a Moslem with respect to his infidel slave, but also to a master of notorious misconduct, and to a slave who is undergoing enfranchisement by contract.

CHAPTER II.—PROHIBITED MARRIAGES

SECTION 1

IN the direct line it is forbidden to marry—

1. One's mother, i.e. not only the woman that bore one, but any that has borne one's ancestor or ancestress.

2. One's daughter, i.e. any woman of whom one is the ancestor. [The prohibition does not extend to children born of a criminal connection, though a woman can never marry her descendant, even a descendant by adultery or incest.]

In the collateral line one may not marry : one's sisters, nieces and aunts ; understanding by "aunt" any whole sister, half sister on the father's side or uterine sister of one of his ancestors or ancestresses.

Relationship by fosterage is a cause of prohibition in the same way as relationship properly so called ; and this prohibition extends to the same degrees. By foster mother is understood any person : (1) who has given one suck ; (2) who has given the breast either to one's nurse, or to one's ancestor or ancestress ; (3) who is the ancestress of one's nurse ; (4) who is the ancestress of the man from whom is derived one's nurse's milk, and so on.

One may legally marry the nurse of one's brother or of one's grandchildren, the mother or the daughter of the nurse of one's own children, and the uterine sister or foster sister of one's half brother on the father's side or vice versâ.

By reason of affinity one may not marry—

1. The wife of one of his descendants or ancestors, there being no distinction between those properly so called and those by fosterage.

2. One's wife's ancestresses, understood in the same way.

3. One's wife's descendants by another husband, similarly regarded.

Affinity does not exist before marriage has been consummated by coition. A master who has cohabited with his slave should subsequently abstain from all commerce with her ancestresses or descendants ; and all commerce with her is forbidden to her master's ancestors or descendants. It is the same in the case of illegal cohabitation by error, whether the error was on the man's side, or, according to some authors, on the woman's ; but, on the other hand, coition that constitutes the crime of fornication has no legal consequence so far as affinity is concerned. *Affinity exists only in consequence of coition, and not by reason of other lascivious acts.

The fact of being aware that a woman with whom commerce is prohibited to oneself, but whom one does not know, is living in a large town does not prevent one marrying a woman of that town ; but when one knows that such a woman is amongst a small number of women, but one does not know which she is, then one should abstain from marriage with any of them. If in case of marriage with one of the women of a large town, one perceives too late that one has accidentally married a woman with whom commerce is entirely prohibited one at any time, e.g. the wife of one's father or of one's son, cohabitation must be at once discontinued.

One may not have at one time two wives of whom one is the sister or the aunt of the other ; without distinction between parentage properly so called and parentage by fosterage. Thus, if one marries at one and the same time a woman and her sister or her aunt, there is no marriage ; and if one marries the two women the one after the other, the second marriage alone is void. A prohibition to have two women as wives at the same time implies a similar prohibition to have commerce with them by right of property, as in the case of two slaves ; but such prohibition is no obstacle to the mere ownership in itself. Thus, a master who owns two female slaves of whom one is the sister or aunt of the other and who has cohabited with one of them, must abstain from commerce with the other, until commerce with the first has become forbidden him, i.e. until he has sold her, given her in marriage, or begun to enfranchise her by contract. The law does not, however, regard as having the same result a temporary cause preventing commerce with the slave in question, such as menstruation, ihram, for having pledged her to a creditor. A master who marries a sister of one of his female slaves, or the husband who becomes the owner of his wife's sister, should cohabit with his wife, and abstain from commerce with his slave.

A slave cannot have more than two wives at a time, and a free man not more than four. A marriage concluded by a free man with five wives at once is null as regards all of them ; but if he marries them one after the other, the fifth alone is void. Consequently the sister of the fifth wife can become the wife of the person in question, unless he must abstain from her on other grounds. Moreover, one has the right to take a fifth wife after repudiating irrevocably one of the four, even while the repudiated wife is still in her period of legal retreat ; but this cannot be done if the repudiation is revocable.

A free man may repudiate his wife twice, and a slave his once, in a revocable way ; but after this triple, or double, revocation, she cannot be taken back again until she has been the legitimate wife of another man, and this intermediate husband has had effective connection with her. Our school insists that this intermediate husband should be capable of performing conjugal functions ; consequently an intermediate marriage of a woman with a young boy and her connection with him would be of no use. Neither can the intermediate marriage be on condition that the new husband shall repudiate his wife immediately after first having connection with her, and that she shall be ipso facto repudiated from that moment, or that the intermediate marriage shall ipso facto cease to exist from that moment. One authority, however, admits the first condition.

SECTION 2

One may not marry a woman of whom one is the proprietor, even in part only ; and the fact of becoming owner or part owner of a woman with whom one has already contracted marriage is of itself sufficient to annul it. Neither may a woman marry a slave of whom she is owner or part owner. A free man may not even marry the slave of another, except under the following conditions :—

1. That he has no free wife able to satisfy his passion ; or, according to some jurists, no free wife at all.

2. That he is unable to marry a free woman able to satisfy his passion ; or, according to some jurists, that he is unable to marry any free woman. On the other hand, most authorities permit a free man to marry the slave of another, in the case of the absence of the woman whom he could marry, when it is manifestly difficult for him to go to her, or when he is afraid that the excitement of desire will otherwise make him commit the crime of fornication. †A man who has not the means to pay the proportional dower a free woman could claim, and who finds some one willing to be content with a lower sum not in excess of his means, may not refuse this offer and marry a slave ; but when the free woman will not be content with a lower sum, but is disposed to give facilities as to payment, marriage with a slave is not prohibited.

3. That he is afraid of committing the crime of fornication if he does not marry ; †but the law admits this excuse only where he is unable to purchase a slave with whom cohabitation would be permitted him by right of ownership.

4. That the slave is a Moslem. A Moslem, whether free or not, should never marry an infidel slave ; ††but an infidel, free or not, member of a religion founded upon a holy scripture, may marry an infidel slave.

A woman partly enfranchised is regarded for this purpose as entirely servile. A free man, who, after marrying a slave in conformity with the law, afterwards becomes enabled to marry a free woman, or who does in fact marry one though strictly speaking his means do not permit of it, keeps the slave all the same as a legitimate wife. But if, on the other hand, a free man, legally unable to marry a slave, nevertheless does marry both a slave and a free woman, *the contract is void so far as regards the slave, but remains valid as to the free woman.

SECTION 3

A Moslem may not marry a woman of a religion not founded upon some holy scripture. Thus, he may not marry an idolatress nor a fire-worshipper; but he may marry a Jewess or a Christian; though it is always blamable to marry a woman, whether Jewess or Christian, belonging to a nation not yet subjugated by our arms ††or even a woman belonging to infidel subjects of our Sovereign. By "infidels whose religion is founded upon a holy scripture," are understood those people who follow one of the actually existing divine revelations, though abrogated by the Koran, i.e. Jews and Christians; but not adherents of religious sects founded only on the psalms of David, and so on. Jewesses may become wives of Moslems, even when not strictly speaking of the race of Israel, *provided their nation was converted to Judaism before that revelation was abrogated by the Koran, and before the text of the law of Moses had been altered by theologians. Some jurists, however, consider only the first of these two conditions as strictly necessary. A Jewess or a Christian, the legitimate wife of a Moslem, has the same right to maintenance, sharing of marital favours, and with regard to repudiation, as Moslem wives, provided she observes the precepts of the law with regard to menstruation, lochia, *and grave impurities in general, and does not eat pork. A Moslem's wife, of whatever religion she may be, should at her husband's order wash herself, when any part of her body is affected by some impurity.

A Moslem may never marry an idolatress, even where the mother *or father of the woman in question is Jewish or Christian. And women belonging to Samaritan sects that have seceded from Judaism, or Sabaeen sects seceded from Christianity, differing in each case as to some essential dogma, are deprived of the right to marry a Moslem. But women of Samaritan or Sabaeen sects that differ from Judaism or Christianity only in secondary dogmas may marry a Moslem, just as Jewish or Christian women may. However, *since a Christian converted to Judaism, or a Jew converted to Christianity enjoy no longer the favour of our protection, neither may a woman in similar circumstances become the legitimate wife of a Moslem; and if a Moslem's wife is converted from Christianity to Judaism or vice versa, she should be treated as a Moslem wife who has abjured the faith. A Jew or a Christian who wishes to change his religion should become a Moslem; unless, according to one author, they are returning to their original religions after abandoning them. The same controversy exists as to whether a Jew or a Christian, who has become an idolater, can return to the religion they have left ; but they can never enjoy our protection while remaining idolaters. An idolater who becomes a Jew or a Christian is equally incapable of enjoying our protection ; nor can he return to his original religion. There is thus no course open to him but to embrace Islam, as if he were an apostate.

A woman that has abjured Islam can marry no one ; and apostasy, whether of husband or wife, or both, before a marriage has been followed by cohabitation, involves ipso facto an immediate separation. Where, on the other hand, cohabitation has already taken place, the marriage remains in suspense, in the hope that the guilty party or parties will become convinced of their error before the end of the period of legal retirement. If this occurs, the marriage holds good as if nothing had happened ; but otherwise separation is regarded as having taken effect from the moment of apostasy. In all cases, however, carnal enjoyment is forbidden to the parties while their marriage remains in suspense ; though an infraction of this precept does not constitute the crime of fornication.

CHAPTER III.—THE MARRIAGE OF INFIDELS

SECTION 1

AN infidel of whatever religion who is converted to Islam while married to a woman whose religion is founded upon some holy scripture keeps her as his wife ; but if she is an idolatress or a fire-worshipper, and is not converted with him, separation takes place immediately ipso facto, where the marriage has not yet been followed by cohabitation. Otherwise the continuation of the marriage depends upon whether the woman embraces the faith before the end of her period of legal retirement. If, before the expiry of this period the wife's conversion has not yet taken place, the marriage is considered to have been dissolved from the husband's conversion ; and the same rule is observed if it is the wife who is converted, while the husband remains in a state of religious blindness. Where, on the other hand, both parties embrace the faith at the same time, the marriage remains valid. The conversion is regarded as simultaneous only where one of the parties begins his declaration before the other has finished.

Where the marriage remains valid, it is of no consequence whether it was originally contracted in contravention of our law, provided that the cause of illegality has ceased to exist at the time of conversion, and that the wife is then a woman who can lawfully be given to her husband. If, however, the cause of illegality still exists at the time of conversion, the marriage is regarded as having never been contracted. Moreover, it is not considered as an absolute illegality if the marriage was not concluded by a guardian, nor before witnesses. A continuation of the marriage must also be accepted in the following cases :—

1. When it has been contracted before the expiration of the period of legal retirement, provided that this period has expired at the moment of conversion.

2. In the case of a temporary marriage, where the parties have stipulated a term equivalent to perpetuity.

3. When, at the time of conversion, the woman is in retirement, owing to a cohabitation due to error, at least according to our school. On the other hand, a marriage with a person within the prohibited degrees cannot continue after conversion ; though our school admits the validity of the marriage, where the husband is first converted and places himself in a state of ihram, after which the wife is converted also, before her husband's ihram is over.

4. When an infidel who possesses a free wife and a slave wife is converted at the same time as they are, he keeps the free wife, according to our school, but should dismiss the slave. ††Marriages of infidels contracted in conformity with their own laws are recognised by ours as valid ; though some jurists maintain that our law never admits the validity of these marriages, while others consider their validity is recognised only where upon conversion it appears that the parties may lawfully remain together, but otherwise they must be regarded as null and void ab initio.

††An infidel who repudiates his wife three times and is converted to Islam can take her back again only after she has belonged to an intermediate husband.

An infidel who promised at his marriage a specified dower according to our law, is liable for it even after his conversion if the marriage is not thereby dissolved as we have explained above. But if the dower consists of prohibited things such as wine and so on, and the marriage remains valid after conversion, then the three following cases must be distinguished :—

1. Where at the moment of conversion the woman has already taken possession of the prohibited objects, she keeps them and can claim nothing further.

2. Where she has not yet taken possession, her husband owes her proportional dower.

3. Where she has only partly taken possession she can claim for the rest a reasonable part of the proportional dower.

A woman whose marriage has been dissolved, either by her conversion to Islam or by her husband's conversion, may claim the specified dower promised, provided it consists of permissible articles, and that the marriage, followed by cohabitation, is not otherwise attackable. If not, she can only claim proportional dower. If cohabitation has not yet taken place, a distinction is made between the case where the dissolution is a consequence of the wife's conversion, and that where it is caused by the husband's. In the first she can claim nothing, but in the second the husband owes her half of the specified dower promised, if consisting of permissible articles, and otherwise half of the proportional dower; all upon the condition already mentioned, that the marriage is dissolved solely by conversion and not from any other cause of nullity.

The court may not refuse to pronounce judgment if one of the parties is an infidel subject of our Sovereign, *or even where both are so; but should decide as if both were Moslems.

SECTION 2

An infidel who, at the time of his conversion to Islam, possesses more than four wives, should choose four to keep and dismiss the others; it being understood that all the four embrace the faith, either at the same time as their husband or before the termination of their period of retirement, or that they are followers of some religion founded upon a holy scripture. Where, on the other hand, only four wives embrace the faith, either with him or before the termination of their period of retirement, they remain his lawful wives to the exclusion of the others, even though he has not yet cohabited with them. An infidel who, at the time of his conversion is bound by marriage to a mother and to her daughter, and has had commerce with both, must subsequently abstain from both the one and the other. His cohabitation with them is in this case prohibited for ever, even though they may be followers of a religion founded upon a sacred book, or may have embraced the faith. But if he has cohabited with neither, the daughter remains his legitimate wife; though according to one author he may choose whichever he prefers. If he has cohabited with the daughter only, she remains his lawful wife; but if he has cohabited with the mother only, then cohabitation with both the one and the other is prohibited him for ever, though, according to one author, the mother may in this case remain his lawful wife.

An infidel who, at the time of his conversion, is married to a slave who follows his example either immediately or before the end of the period of retirement, may keep her as his lawful wife, unless coition with her is prohibited him on other grounds ; but if the slave remains an infidel at the expiry of that term, separation takes place at once ipso facto. A convert married to several slave women who all follow his example either immediately or before the end of their period of retirement, should choose one to remain his wife ; but this choice may not fall upon one with whom cohabitation was forbidden him at the time of conversion. Of these he may keep none. A convert married to a free woman and several slaves who are all converted with him, either immediately or before the end of the period of retirement, should keep the free woman as his sole wife and dismiss the others. He may choose one of his slave women only if his free wife perseveres in her errors at the end of her period of retirement. Where the convert has a free wife who embraces the faith at the same time as himself, and where also his slave wives obtain their liberty and are then converted before the end of their period of retirement, it is as if at the time of his conversion he had only free wives, and he may at his choice select the four wives whom he wishes to keep.

When signifying his wishes upon this subject, the convert may use the words : “ I choose you,” “ I confirm our marriage,” “ I retain you,” “ I wish you to remain ” ; and he is considered to have implicitly chosen one of his wives if he repudiates her, †but not if he pronounces against her an injurious assimilation or an oath of continence. The convert may not make his decision subject to any condition ; nor may he go back upon his choice. If he should choose five wives instead of four, he must afterwards indicate the one he wishes to dismiss. All the wives of a husband who has become a Moslem have an equal right to maintenance until he has decided which to retain. If he does not decide the court should force him to do so by imprisonment. Where a new convert dies before deciding, all his widows should observe the legal period of retirement ; that is to say, a pregnant widow is in retirement until her churching ; a widow having no fixed courses, or a widow who has had no commerce with her husband, for four months and ten days ; a widow having regular courses, for three periods of purity, in all not less than four months and ten days. From the estate of a deceased convert must be reserved a sum sufficient to give his widows their due, when their respective rights have been ascertained.

SECTION 3

Where husband and wife embrace Islam together, the husband's obligation to maintain his wife is not interrupted. Where, on the contrary, she is not converted before the expiry of her period of retirement, he owes her nothing for the interval during which she has not been of the same religion as himself. This, at least, was Shafii's decision during his stay in Egypt. Where the woman's conversion precedes the man's, whether the latter takes place before the end of the period of legal retirement, or whether he continues in his errors, the woman may claim maintenance for the whole period of her retirement. A wife who abjures Islam loses at the same time all right to maintenance, even though she returns to the faith before the expiry of her period of retirement ; but a wife whose husband becomes an apostate continues to be maintainable by him during the whole of the period of her retirement.

CHAPTER IV.—RIGHT OF OPTION, IFAT, AND MARRIAGE BETWEEN SLAVES

SECTION 1

Any one who becomes aware that he has married a person afflicted with madness, elephantiasis or leprosy has a right to renounce the marriage. The law makes no distinction as to which party has been deceived in this way. A husband may also renounce a wife he has just married, on perceiving that she is ratka or karna, and consequently unsuited for coition ; while a wife may renounce her husband on discovering him to be impotent or castrated. According to some authorities, however, a party possessing a defect discovered in the other has no right of option. Hermaphroditism alone does not give a right of option ; at any rate if the hermaphrodite inclines manifestly towards the sex declared.

A wife's right to renounce her marriage by reason of her husband's defects is not limited to defects existing at the time of the contract, but extends to such as he may have acquired subsequently ; with the exception of impotence, for a husband who becomes impotent after cohabiting with his wife can no longer be renounced by her. As to the husband, according to the opinion of Shafii in his second period, he as well as the wife has a right of option for redhibitory defects, even though these only become manifest during marriage ; but in this case a right of option can never be exercised by the wife's guardian. Nor can he do this on account of castration or impotence existing at the time of the contract ; but he can in the case of so-existing madness, telephantiasis or leprosy of the husband. In all cases redhibition during marriage should be exercised soon after the discovery of the defect.

Renunciation of marriage on account of redhibitory defects previous to all carnal intercourse invalidates a woman's right to dower. If, on the contrary, the renunciation takes place after consummation a distinction must be made between proportional and fixed dower. †Proportional dower is due whether the defects existed at the time of the contract, or whether they became manifest between the time of the contract and the first coition ; but in neither case must the party renouncing knowingly indulge in coition. †The fixed dower is due only where renunciation is based upon defects ascertained after the first coition. It is due also if after that event the apostasy of one of the parties entails renunciation. In no case can the husband proceed against the person who has deceived him, whether for dower due in consequence of cohabitation, or for cancellation on account of redhibitory defects ; this is the opinion towards which Shafii inclined in his second period.

Impotence, †and the other redhibitory defects, have no legal effect until brought before the court. Impotence should be accepted as true, not only upon the admission of the party in court, but also upon proof that such admission has been made elsewhere. †It may also be proved by the claimant's oath, if the other party refuses to confirm his denial on oath. In whatever manner impotence has been proved, the court cannot immediately pronounce dissolution of marriage in consequence, but must grant the husband a year's delay in which to acquit himself of the physical obligations resulting from marriage. On its expiry the wife may summons her husband a second time. If the husband alleges cohabitation with his wife in the interval he must confirm this assertion upon oath, otherwise the woman is sworn. If she takes the oath tendered her, or if the husband admits impotence, she can of her own accord declare herself to be free from the bonds of matrimony, though some maintain she has not this right yet, unless the court authorises it or has itself pronounced dissolution of marriage in explicit terms. If during the year's probation the wife refuses to yield herself to coition, or if the husband cannot cohabit with her by reason of her sickness, or if she is imprisoned, the period during which the husband has been prevented from executing the order of the court is not taken account of. And the woman entirely loses her right to declare herself free on account of her husband's impotence, after the year's probation, if she is proved to have accepted him again ††for to have granted him further delay.

*Where there is a stipulation on the part of the husband that his wife must be a Moslem, or on the part of one of the parties that the other must be of an undisputed genealogy, free, etc., dissolution does not take place ipso facto because the party is not of the quality guaranteed. If the party in question is of better condition than that stipulated for, no right of option exists ; otherwise either wife or husband may exercise this right. *Where the quality of Moslem or free woman has not been expressly guaranteed, but the husband merely had reason to believe the one or the other, he cannot renounce the marriage on perceiving subsequently that his wife is of another religion, provided that religion is founded upon some sacred book, or upon discovering that she is a slave ; provided always that cohabitation with her is not prohibited on other grounds. And similarly the wife, upon her side, after having consented to marry a man she believed was a suitable match for her, without making any express stipulation with regard to it, cannot exercise a right of option upon discovering that she has married a man of notorious misconduct, or that she has made an unsuitable match as regards her husband's genealogy or profession. [On the other hand, if the woman discovers too late that she has married a man with redhibitory defects or a slave she may exercise a right of option.]

Dissolution of marriage on the ground that a party does not answer to the conditions stipulated has the same result as regards dower and damages as dissolution on account of redhibitory defects, with this difference that in the case in question that the deceit must have existed at the time of the contract before it can become a ground for damages.

According to those authors who do not admit a dissolution of marriage follows immediately ipso facto where the husband having stipulated that his wife shall be a free woman discovers afterwards that she is a slave, a child born before discovery of the truth is free, and the father owes his wife's master the value of the child by way of damages. All this is without prejudice to his right of action against the person who has deceived him, if such action is permissible, and provided that it is not the master himself who has duped him by giving him his slave in marriage as if she were a free woman. Consequently, the value of the child is only due where the father has been deceived by the master's agent or by the slave herself ; it being understood that deception on the part of the slave also entails her having to compensate her husband as soon as she has the means of doing so, though she cannot be seized for this purpose. If through no one's fault the child is still-born, the husband owes nothing to his wife's master.

A woman who becomes enfranchised during her union with a slave, even a partially enfranchised slave, may claim a dissolution of marriage on this ground alone, *provided she takes proceedings at once. But the court may allow this last rule to be departed from where the woman declares upon oath her ignorance of the enfranchisement, and puts forward some probable ground for such ignorance, for example the absence of her master ; *or where she declares that she was ignorant of her right of cancellation. Naturally an enfranchised woman whose marriage has been so dissolved, and who has not yet had commerce with her husband, can claim no dower ; but she can claim the fixed dower promised where the dissolution has been demanded by her in consequence of an enfranchisement subsequent to the consummation of the marriage. Where, on the other hand, she does not make use of her right of cancellation until after commerce with her husband, and bases her claim upon a prior enfranchisement, she can only recover proportional dower ; though some authorities allow her fixed dower in this case also. No right of option exists where the wife is only partially enfranchised, or is undergoing enfranchisement by contract. Nor does it exist in favour of an enfranchised husband united in the bonds of matrimony with a slave.

SECTION 2

Ifaf is an obligation recognised by law. It means that one must see to it that one's father, father's father, or mother's father, do not take to evil courses, by coming to their assistance, if they have not sufficient means to procure a female companion. One may acquit oneself of this duty—

1. By giving one's father or grandfather enough for a free woman's dower :

2. by saying to them, " Get married ; I will pay the dower " ;

3. by contracting a marriage in their name, by virtue of an authorisation from them, but promising dower on one's own account ; or

4. by giving them a female slave, or the money necessary to buy one.

The household expenses are also chargeable to the child or grandchild. The father or grandfather must be content with the way in which their child or grandchild wishes to discharge this duty. They cannot insist upon a legitimate wife if child or grandchild wishes to give a slave as concubine. Neither can they insist upon a particular person whose price or dower is very high ; but if they are in agreement with child or grandchild as to the sum, then it is for them to obtain for that sum the person they prefer. One is even bound to supply a new companion to father or grandfather, not only where the first marriage or concubinage has been dissolved by death, apostasy or redhibitory defects in the woman, †but also where father or grandfather has repudiated his wife for some valid reason. Ifaf is obligatory only where a father or grandfather needs a companion but has not the means to procure one. The fact of need is legally established by the declaration of the interested party, which does not require to be confirmed on oath.

In no case may father or grandfather cohabit with a slave of child or grandchild ; though, according to our school, an infraction of this rule entails only an obligation to pay dower, and not liability to punishment for fornication. A child born of such prohibited commerce is free, and his father's legitimate descendant ; but if the contravention has been committed with regard to a slave of son or grandson already enfranchised by reason of maternity, the latter does not become the enfranchised slave of the father or grandfather because she has borne him a son. *But if she was not such an enfranchised slave to the son or grandson, she becomes so to the father or grandfather, who then owes the former her value plus dower, but not the value of the child. In consequence a father or grandfather cannot contract a lawful marriage with a slave of his son or grandson ; †but where the son or grandson becomes the owner of his father's or grandfather's wife, the marriage remains valid. One cannot marry a slave of a male slave who is undergoing enfranchisement by contract ; and where such male slave becomes owner of a female slave who is already his master's wife, this marriage is ipso facto dissolved.

According to the opinion adopted by Shaffi in his second period, a master who has authorised his slave to marry, is not obliged to undertake payment either of the dower or maintenance that the wife or children may claim. For these one may distrain upon what the slave gains by his ordinary work and also upon any accidental profits he may realise. In the case of a slave generally authorised, the profit he makes, ‡and even the capital furnished by his master, may be distrained upon for dower and maintenance. In the case of a slave who makes no profit and has not been generally authorised, both charges must be defrayed by him after his enfranchisement like a personal debt. Only one authority admits the master's responsibility in this case.

An authorisation to a slave to marry does not prejudice his master's right to acquire his company on a journey even though the slave may be in this way prevented from fulfilling his conjugal duties ; but so long as the master does not take his slave on a journey, he should allow him to pass his nights with his wife. As to the master's right to the slave's services during the day, this exists only where the former has guaranteed payment of dower and maintenance, for otherwise he must dispense with the slave's services, until the latter, by his labour, has gained enough money for this purpose. If the master has guaranteed payment of dower and maintenance he may dispose of the slave's services and pay him a reasonable salary, or else himself entirely undertake to defray the cost of dower and maintenance, whichever he prefers as being most advantageous. Some authorities, however, allow him no choice in the matter, but consider him obliged to pay dower and maintenance, unless he prefers to forego the slave's services. A slave who, in contravention of the law, marries without his master's authorisation, is personally responsible for proportional dower, if the marriage has been followed by cohabitation. One authority even considers that payment of the dower in such case is a real charge involving if necessary the seizure of the slave after his enfranchisement. If it is not the case of a male but of a female slave whom the master has given in marriage, the latter retains a right to the fruit of her labour during the day, but must surrender her to her husband for the night. †In this case the husband is not liable for maintenance. †Neither is the husband obliged to accept an offer to remain with his wife in the master's house, even though the latter may be willing to allot a room specially for the use of the new menage. A master may take with him a married female slave on a journey, but in that case her husband has a right to accompany her.

Our school considers that there is no obligation on the part of the husband to pay dower to the master, if the latter has put the female slave to death, or if she has committed suicide, before the marriage has been really consummated. On the other hand, our school maintains the obligation of paying dower, if it is a free woman who has killed herself in similar circumstances ; or if, instead of the master, it is another person who has killed the slave ; or if the slave has died an accidental death. In all these cases dower is obligatory as in the case of an accidental death after a first cohabitation with a wife whether free or not. The master who sells a married slave may retain the dower obtained for her ; and he may even keep half of it, if she is repudiated by her husband before cohabitation. Dower is not due if both parties belong to the same master.

BOOK 34.—DOWER

SECTION 1

THE Sonna has introduced the practice of stipulating in the contract of marriage a fixed dower, though this stipulation is not rigorously necessary. Anything that may legally be sold may be made use of for dower. The husband who has promised a certain object as dower is liable for its loss before the bride has taken possession of it, as in other agreement, or according to one authority as if it were a deposit intrusted to him. If one admits, with the majority of jurists that a woman's title to a certain object stipulated as dower is not absolute, but merely contractual, before possession of it has been taken, one cannot allow her any right to dispose of it by way of sale, until it has been actually delivered to her.

From this principle it also follows :—

1. That in case of accidental loss, before taking possession, a husband owes proportional dower ; and the wife cannot demand the value of the thing originally promised.

2. That the woman is presumed to have taken possession, if she has herself caused the loss.

3. That in case of loss caused by the fault of another person, she may either claim from her husband the payment of proportional dower, transferring to him her claim against the other person, or transfer to that other person her claim against her husband, and recover damage from that person. That is the doctrine of our school.

Loss caused by the husband's fault has the same consequences as accidental loss ; or, according to others, as loss caused by another person ; and where one has promised as dower two specified slaves, one of whom dies before possession is taken, our school considers the agreement as cancelled so far as the deceased slave is concerned. The wife then has a right of option, i.e. she may either renounce the promised dower, or accept the surviving slave. In the first case the husband owes proportional dower ; in the second he must compensate her for the loss of the dead slave by giving her, in addition to the surviving one, a reasonable part of the proportional dower. Our school also grants a right of option to the wife, if the specified object that forms the dower has been damaged by redhibitory defects, before taking possession ; but in these circumstances she may only choose between proportional dower and acceptance pure and simple of the defective objects. The husband, however, is never liable for accidental loss of produce from objects promised as dower, even where he may have been able to deliver them but have refused such delivery on the ground of his liability for the execution of the contract. Nor does our school consider him obliged to pay any indemnity for the use he may make of the promised object before delivery, e.g. by riding an animal included in the dower, or using it in any other way.

On the other hand, the woman is not obliged to place herself at her husband's disposition, until she has taken possession of the dower, at any rate when this consists of certain definite objects, and the parties have not stipulated any time of payment. †Where, on the other hand, dower is promised by a certain date, she cannot refuse cohabitation, on the ground that she has not yet taken possession, even though the time may have expired. In a case where the two parties have stipulated that neither shall be obliged to perform the duties resulting from the marriage contract, before the other has done so, it is the husband, according to one jurist, who should begin by delivering the dower ; while, according to another, neither party can oblige the other to begin by fulfilling his or her engagements, but the one that begins can oblige the other to comply also. *But most authorities maintain that under these circumstances the parties should jointly fulfil their obligations ; that is to say that the husband should begin by depositing the dower with some person of irreproachable conduct, the wife should then place herself at her husband's disposition, and after this the depositary should hand her the dower. A woman who, in spite of this stipulation of joint fulfilment, does not insist upon her husband's beginning by paying the dower, may claim it as soon as she has placed herself at his disposition ; but if the husband does not accept her offer immediately upon her declaring her readiness, she may change her mind and refuse to surrender herself to him until he has discharged his pecuniary obligation. Where, on the contrary, the husband has immediately accepted cohabitation, his wife can no longer draw back. If the husband in spite of a stipulation of joint fulfilment, begins by paying, the woman must place herself at once at his disposition ; and, according to the authority who considers the husband bound to pay in any case, he may even claim back the dower if she refuses without valid excuse. Finally, on insisting that his wife place herself at his disposition, the husband should at her request allow her a little time for her marriage toilet. The length of this delay may be fixed, if necessary, by the court, but must not exceed three days. A wife can never insist upon any delay on the ground that her menstrues are not yet finished ; but a minor and a sick woman are not obliged to surrender themselves to their husband before being physically capable of fulfilling their conjugal duties.

A wife's right to dower becomes irrevocable by the fact of copulation, even where this is a prohibited act, e.g. during menstruation. The right becomes irrevocable also upon the death of one of the parties ; but not, according to the opinion of Shafi in his Egyptian period, by the fact of the wife's having crossed the threshold of the bridal chamber without giving herself to the work of the flesh.

SECTION 2

A husband who has promised for dower things that cannot form the basis of a contract, e.g. wine, a free man, or something usurped, owes proportional dower, or, according to one jurist, the value the wine would have if it were vinegar, the man would have if he were a slave, or the usurped thing would have if it had remained in the possession of the rightful owner. *A promise to give something of which one is the rightful owner and also something usurped is null as regards the latter but valid as to the former, without prejudice to the wife's right—

1. To renounce the two promised objects, and claim proportional dower, or, according to one authority, the value of the two promised objects ; or

2. To accept the object that may lawfully form the basis of a contract, plus a reasonable part of the proportional dower, in compensation for the loss of the other object.

Only one authority maintains that she must in all cases be content with the lawful object and nothing more, unless she prefers proportional dower.

By stipulating as follows : " I give you my daughter in marriage, and I also give you these clothes, if you will give me this slave here," one has legally combined a marriage, *a dower and an exchange, the slave constituting partly an equivalent for the clothes, and partly proportional dower. On the other hand, a stipulation " that the woman shall be given in marriage for a thousand pieces of money, which pieces belong or shall be given to her father," does not constitute, according to our rite, a legal promise of fixed dower ; such a stipulation, though not affecting the validity of the marriage, obliges the husband to pay proportional dower.

A marriage cannot be concluded by granting one of the parties a conventional option of cancellation within a certain time ; *but if such option has been stipulated, not with regard to the marriage itself but with regard to the dower, this clause only is null, while the marriage remains valid. As to the other conditions that may be added to a marriage contract, it is necessary to distinguish—

1. Conditions already implicit in the law relating to marriage, and such as are without any object. Both are considered as of no effect ; but the marriage and the stipulation as to the dower remain valid.

2. Conditions inconsistent with the precepts of the law relating to marriage. Such are illicit, and have the effect of invalidating the stipulation as to dower ; but they leave the marriage intact, so long as they are not incompatible with the fundamental object of that institution. Among such conditions are reckoned, for instance, a stipulation that the husband cannot take another wife so long as he is married to the first, or a stipulation that he is not liable for maintenance. Where, however, these conditions are incompatible with the fundamental object of marriage, e.g. a stipulation that would deprive a husband of his right of cohabitation with his wife, or a stipulation that he would repudiate her, the marriage itself is null and void.

*If, when marrying several wives at once, one promises a joint dower, the contract is illegal so far as concerns the dower, but the marriage remains intact, and each wife may claim proportional dower. *It is the same where a guardian concludes a marriage for his ward, while granting the bride a larger dower than she could claim as proportional dower ; or where the father or grandfather, who may legally dispose of a girl's hand without asking her consent, stipulates for her a dower less than her proportional dower. When the parties agree in secret upon a certain dower, but declare publicly that they have agreed upon a larger dower, it is the dower which they really have in view that the husband should pay, at least according to our school. A marriage is null and void where a woman's guardian, after receiving from her a request to give her in marriage for a thousand pieces of money, gives her in marriage for a less sum. And similarly, where the woman has given her guardian no instructions as to dower, but he has stipulated for a sum inferior to her proportional dower. A single authority has maintained that in this case the marriage remains intact, but the stipulation is void and the woman can therefore insist upon proportional dower. [*In both of the two cases cited the marriage is valid ; but the husband owes proportional dower.]

SECTION 3

When a woman whose intelligence is sufficiently developed for her to manage her property, asks her guardian to give her in marriage without dower, and he therefore refuses the dower offered by the husband, or does not stipulate one, this act is considered as a perfectly legal liberality. This is also the case where the master gives in marriage one of his female slaves, declaring at the same time that he wants no dower for her. But a free woman whose intelligence is not yet sufficiently developed for her to manage her property, cannot be legally married without stipulating some dower, even with her consent. *However, this remission of dower has this result only, that the husband owes his wife nothing in virtue of the marriage contract ; but it does not prevent him from owing proportional dower if the marriage is consummated, †to be assessed according to the woman's condition at the time of the contract. A free woman thus given in marriage without dower, may also insist upon her husband assigning her a dower before cohabitation ; and she need not place herself at her husband's disposition until it has been so assigned, ‡and delivered. It is also rigorously necessary that the wife should declare herself to be satisfied with the dower assigned her by her husband ; *but the law does not require that the two parties should know exactly the amount that the woman would be able to claim as proportional dower. Under these circumstances the husband can validly assign a †dower within a certain time, or of an amount exceeding proportional dower. Only a few authorities have expressed the opinion that dower assigned in this way upon the wife's demand cannot exceed her proportional dower in the case where both dowers would consist in things of the same kind. If the husband refuses to assign his wife a dower under these circumstances, or if the two interested parties cannot come to an agreement upon the subject, the court must determine the amount in money current in the locality, and this amount can be claimed immediately. [The court can only give judgment for an amount that would appear to it to be reasonable as proportional dower ; it should first therefore ascertain the amount of this latter.]

‡A third party cannot lawfully assign a dower to a woman whose guardian has not stipulated for one, even though such person may be willing to pay it from his own property.

Dower assigned by the husband or determined by the court is subject to the same rules as ordinary fixed dower, that is to say that half is due upon repudiation before cohabitation, while nothing is due upon repudiation not only before cohabitation but even before assignment of the dower. *Death of one of the parties before cohabitation or assignment takes place does not make proportional dower obligatory. [*On the contrary, in this case proportional dower would really be due.]

SECTION 4

“Proportional dower” is the amount a woman may claim as dower in due proportion to the dowers stipulated or obtained by other women of the same condition. It is estimated—

1. According to the genealogy of the person in question, i.e. according to the dowers granted to the women who are the nearest agnates of the man from whom she derives her origin, such as her whole sister, her sister on the father's side, the daughters of her whole brother or brother on the father's side, her father's sisters, and so on. If there are no agnates who are women, or if they have not yet been given in marriage, or if their dowers are unknown, their relatives on the mother's side, such as mother's mother or sisters, are taken into consideration.

2. According to the wife's age, mental faculties, wealth, virginity, or otherwise, and in general all qualities usually appreciated in a spouse. If a wife has special qualities or defects, that give her greater or less value than her relations, she must also be granted a dower either greater or less as the case may be. The fact that one of her female relatives consented to receive an exceptionally small dower ought not to be taken into consideration ; but the fact that they usually consent to receive a smaller dower when given in marriage to a member of the family ought to be so.

Proportional dower is always due after an illegal marriage followed by coition. In this case the amount is estimated according to the value of the woman upon the day the coition took place ; or where cohabitation is prolonged, according to the highest value the woman had during the whole period she was in her husband's house.

[Prolonged cohabitation in consequence of an error as to the validity of the marriage obliges the husband to pay only a single dower ; but if the error arose from several successive causes, e.g. if the husband cohabited with his wife at first under the belief that he had married her, and afterwards under the belief that she was his slave, he owes as many dowers as he has committed errors. Cohabitation with a usurped slave, or with a person forced to undergo forbidden carnal intercourse, has for effect that the woman may claim as many dowers as there have been acts of coition. Cohabitation, however, even prolonged, between a father and his son's slave, between the joint owner of a slave and that slave, or between a master and his slave undergoing enfranchisement by contract, necessitates payment of a single dower only ; though there are some authorities who admit even in these circumstances a plurality of dowers, unless where there has been no separation between the acts of coition.]

SECTION 5

A separation of the parties before the consummation of the marriage, either at the wife's instance, or in consequence of some fact for which she is responsible, e.g. a dissolution of marriage by reason of redhibitory defects in the wife, puts an end to the husband's obligation to pay dower. Where separation before consummation has been caused, either by an act of the husband, such as repudiation, conversion, apostasy, anathema ; or by reason of some third party, as relationship through fosterage, caused by an act of the mother of one of the parties ; the husband is always liable for half the dower which the wife could have claimed had the marriage remained intact. The obligation to leave to the wife half the dower is explained by some authorities in this way that the husband has the right to renounce the marriage at the price of this sacrifice ; ††but most jurists maintain that the half reverts to him ipso facto upon repudiation, etc.

Any increase derived from the dower after the separation belongs half to the husband, and if the wife separated from her husband has already taken possession of the dower, she must indemnify the husband if the dower has perished while in her possession. This compensation takes place by replacing the perished objects by other similar ones, if they are sold by measure or weight, or otherwise by paying their value. If the objects that form the dower have not perished but have merely become deteriorated while in the wife's possession, the husband can none the less recover the half if he is satisfied with that, or he can abandon the whole of the dower as it is to the wife, and claim half the value it had before deterioration. Deterioration before the wife has taken possession results under these circumstances in obliging the husband to be satisfied with half the dower as it is ; but if this deterioration has been caused by a third party from whom the wife has recovered damages, she should give over half of this to her husband. As to increase derived from the dower before the separation of the parties, the wife profits by it where the increase has a separate existence from the principal object ; but where this increase remains united to the principal object then half of it goes to the husband if the wife prefers to let him have his half in kind, but if she prefers to give him half of the original value she alone profits by the increase. The husband must in all cases respect the wife's decision as to this. Where an object that forms part of a dower has become both ameliorated and deteriorated before separation, e.g. if a palm tree has grown, or a slave become older or learnt a new trade, but has also become tainted with leprosy, the husband becomes part owner, i.e. owns half the object, if the interested parties agree to settle the account in that way, otherwise he receives only the original value of the half that reverts to him. The sowing of a field is considered a deterioration, its mere ploughing an amelioration. The pregnancy of a slave or of an animal counts as both profit and loss, though according to some jurists that of an animal is pure profit.

The production of a spathe on a palm-tree is considered as an increase that remains united to the principal object. Where a palm-tree forming a dower already at the moment of separation bears fertilised fruit, the wife is not obliged to pluck them, and if of her own accord she does so, she indicates by this her desire that the tree shall half belong to her. When, under these circumstances, the husband does not oppose the wife's request that only half the palm-tree shall be given him provided the fruit are not plucked before the season, †the wife cannot draw back from her proposal and must gather the fruits, while the tree becomes the joint and undivided property of the pair. When, on the other hand, it is the husband who makes the suggestion, the wife's consent does not prevent his changing his mind, and paying her half the value of the tree ; provided always that the ownership of the half of the tree is never vested in the husband, so long as the party that has a right of option has not yet decided.

By "original value of dower" is understood the minimum value of the object between the day when dower was promised and the day the wife took possession.

Where a husband has promised his wife, in place of dower, to teach her the Koran, and where, by a repudiation before the instruction is complete, the fulfilment of this promise is impossible, then he owes her proportional dower ; or, if the marriage has not been followed by cohabitation, only half.

A woman repudiated before consummation of marriage, who has already transferred the ownership of the dower of which she had taken possession, owes her husband half the value of what she received ; †but if she has lost the dower and then regained it, it is on the original object itself that the husband may make good his claim.

*A woman who gives her husband her dower after receiving it, and is afterwards repudiated before consummation, still none the less owes him half of what she received ; and by virtue of the same principle a wife who has given her husband only half of what she received, owes him the half of what is left, plus a quarter of the whole dower. Another jurist, however, allows the husband in these circumstances only the half of the remainder, while according to a third he may choose between half the whole amount of the dower, and half of the remainder plus a quarter of the whole. Where, on the other hand, the dower does not consist in a particular object but in an obligation on the husband's part, our school allows him nothing if, in the above circumstances, his wife has rendered it to him. According to the opinion adopted by Shaffi in his second period, the wife's guardian can never give up the rights set out in this section.

SECTION 6

A woman repudiated before *or after consummation of marriage, to whom the law does not allow half dower, may demand a pecuniary indemnity called motah. This is so also in the case of separation, at any rate when this separation is not the result of anything for which the woman is responsible. It is recommended that the motah should never be less than thirty drahms, and where the parties cannot agree as to the amount of the motah, the decision rests with the court, which should take into account the condition of both the litigants. Some authorities, however, maintain that the court should have regard to the husband's condition only ; some only to that of the wife ; others admit no legal minimum, provided that the motah consists of something that can form the basis of a legal obligation.

SECTION 7

In case of proceedings as to the amount or the quality of the dower, the court should, in default of proof, administer an oath to the parties, and, if necessary, to their respective heirs. Where both sides take an oath, the law presumes that no fixed dower has been legally promised, and consequently the husband owes proportional dower. †The same rule applies to the case where the wife maintains in court that her husband promised her a specified dower, and he denies it. †If the wife alleges in court the existence of the marriage and the promise of a proportional dower ; while the husband admits the marriage, but denies the promise of dower, or says nothing upon this head ; the court should ask him to repeat his defence more precisely. If he then mentions an amount inferior to the proportional dower demanded by his wife, the general rule must be followed and an oath administered to both parties. But if the husband still denies the promise, or says nothing, the oath is administered to the woman only, and judgment entered according to her demand. †In the case where proceedings are taken about the amount of dower, not between the husband and wife, but between the husband and the guardian of a minor or the curator of a lunatic, the rule mentioned above as to the mutual oaths of the parties is observed all the same. Where a wife alleges that her husband married her on such and such a day for a thousand pieces of money, and again on another following day for the same amount, he owes two thousand if the two contracts are established, either by an admission on his part, or by other proof. When the husband, in these circumstances, admits the two contracts, but denies his liability, either on the ground that he has not cohabited with his wife at all, or on the ground that he did not do so after one of the two marriages, and confirms this statement on oath, the presumption is in his favour, but he loses his right to recover half the dower he has paid. But if he asserts that on the second occasion he was merely repeating the words of the former contract, without intending to conclude a second marriage, this means of defence is not admissible.

SECTION 8

The marriage feast is an institution of the Sonna. According to one authority its observance is strictly necessary ; and some even raise this idea to the rank of a dogma. An invitation to a marriage feast should be accepted as if it were an individual obligation, or, according to others, as one for which the Moslem community is collectively responsible. Some jurists, however, consider such acceptance merely as an obligation introduced by the Sonna, i.e. of the same nature as the marriage feast itself. Whatever may be its nature the obligation exists only under the following conditions :—

1. That the invitation is not only sent to rich persons from whom a present may be expected.

2. That the invitation is for one day only ; for if the invitation mentions three consecutive days, the guests may excuse themselves from attending on the second day ; while it will be even blamable in them to accept the invitation for the third day also.

3. That the invitation is not accepted from fear, or as a thing to be proud of.

4. That one is not afraid of meeting among the guests some one from whom one has received an injury, or with whom it is not fitting for one to appear in the same gathering.

5. That the feast is not accompanied by illicit amusements ; unless one feels assured that one's presence will cause the shocking objects to be banished. By "shocking objects" are to be understood, e.g. silken carpets, representations of animals upon the ceiling, walls, cushions along the walls, curtains or garments ; but such representations may lawfully be depicted upon the floor, and upon carpets or cushions spread upon the floor. One may even depict upon the ceiling or the walls images of animals without heads, or representations of trees. For it is only forbidden to depict living things in their natural state.

Fasting is no reason for refusing an invitation to a wedding feast ; and so far as regards a supererogatory fast, it is even preferable to break it if one's absence is likely to embarrass the host.

The guests should eat of the dishes offered them, without saying anything. They must not put their fingers in the dishes except to take out a piece of food offered to eat, unless it be from some motive that they know the host will approve. They may blamelessly throw pieces of sugar, etc., at the newly married pair. They may even pick up again what they have thrown ; but it is better not to.

BOOK 35.—SHARING OF THE HUSBAND'S FAVOURS; AND DISOBEDIENCE OF WIVES

SECTION 1

THE husband should distribute his favours equally between his wives. If he falls into the habit of passing the night with one of them, he should do so with the others in rotation; but it is not considered a sin if he prefers to sleep by himself, whether he has many wives or only one. But this permission granted to the husband to sleep apart gives him no right to neglect his wives; in that case it would be blamable. A wife who is sick or ratka or karna, or who has menstrues or lochia that prevent coition, does not on that account lose her right to receive her husband in her turn; but a disobedient wife cannot claim this right.

A husband who has no room reserved for himself alone must visit his wives in their own rooms; and this is the preferable course even where he has a particular room to himself, though strictly speaking he may then make his wives come to him in rotation. But he is forbidden—

1. †To go and see one of his wives in her room, and make another come to his room, unless for some adequate reason, e.g. where the former is lodged nearer to him than the latter, or where he is afraid to make the former cross a garden or a road, or on account of her youth, etc.

2. To instal himself in the apartment of one of his wives, and there receive the visits of the others in rotation.

3. To lodge two wives in the same room, unless with their consent.

The husband may arrange as he pleases the way in which he visits his wives in turn, whether he goes in the morning and stays till next morning, or goes in the evening and stays till next evening; in any case it is the night that constitutes the essential part of the visit, and the day is merely an accessory. The only exception is for a husband whose occupation is at night, for instance, a watchman, in which case the rule is inverted. Where the night constitutes the basis of the visit, the husband should not leave the wife whose turn it is during the night to visit another wife, except in case of necessity, e.g. if the latter becomes dangerously ill. Even then, if the absence is prolonged, the wife whose turn it was should be afterwards compensated. During the day, however, the husband may go to his other wives, not only in case of necessity, but for any purpose, to arrange his things, etc., provided his absence is not excessively prolonged. †If during the day one leaves the wife whose turn it is, to make a necessary visit into the room of another, one need not compensate the former, provided always one does not have connection with the latter, though there is no objection to caressing her. ††But where, on the other hand, one leaves the wife whose turn it is to go and see another without adequate motive one must always compensate the former ; though in general one is not obliged to pass an equal portion of the day with one's wives when visiting them in rotation.

The husband may regulate the duration of each periodic visit as he pleases, provided that the visits are not for less than one night and one accessory day, and provided, according to our school, that they are not for more than three nights and three days. It is to be recommended not to exceed the minimum. ††On the other hand, the husband may not himself choose which wife shall have the first turn, for this must be decided by lot. This rule, however, has been brought into question by some jurists who maintain that the husband may himself lawfully indicate in what order he shall periodically visit his wives. He may not grant to one of his wives a longer visit than he pays the others ; except that a free wife may demand that her husband shall remain twice as long during each visit to her than with a slave wife ; and with the further exception that if he takes a new wife he must be with her for seven consecutive nights if she is a virgin, or if otherwise, for three ; and in both these cases he owes no compensation to his other wives. Finally, the Sonna has introduced the practice of allowing a new wife who is not a virgin the choice between three nights without subsequent compensation to the other wives, or seven nights with such compensation.

A wife who starts alone upon a journey, without being authorised to do so by her husband, should be considered as a disobedient wife who consequently cannot demand upon her return that her husband shall make up for the visits she has lost by her absence. When, on the contrary, she has undertaken the voyage with her husband's authorisation, one must distinguish, so far as concerns compensation, between a journey undertaken in the husband's interest or in the wife's. In the former case she should be subsequently compensated ; in the latter, Shafii, during his Egyptian period, rejected compensation. A husband may not select some of his wives to accompany him upon a change of domicile ; but in all other cases of change of abode, †whether for a long or a short journey, he may be accompanied by some of his wives, chosen by lot. He need not afterwards compensate those that remain behind unless at the end of his journey he makes a prolonged stay, in which case he must do so for the length of that stay, †but not for the time occupied in the return journey.

A husband may decline to allow one of his wives to transfer to another her right to his favours, but when he has consented, and one wife has renounced her rights in favour of another specially designated, he must pass with the latter all the nights which he would have passed with both. In these circumstances some authorities allow the husband to let the ordinary visit follow immediately upon that which is the result of this renunciation, even where these visits do not come next to one another in the usual order of rotation. Where a wife renounces her rights generally in favour of all the other wives, the husband should share his nights equally with the others ; where she renounces in favour of the husband the latter may dispose of these free nights as he pleases ; though, according to some jurists, he must even in this case observe an equal distribution.

SECTION 2

At the first indication of disobedience to marital authority a wife should be exhorted by her husband without his immediately breaking off relations with her. When she manifests her disobedience by an act which, though isolated, leaves no doubt as to her intentions, he should repeat his exhortations, and confine her to her chamber, but without striking her. [*He may have recourse to blows, even where disobedience is manifested by an isolated act.] Only where there are repeated acts of disobedience may a husband inflict corporal chastisement.

A husband who keeps from his wife what she may legally claim, e.g. refuses her her proper turn in his visits, or does not give her sufficient for her necessary maintenance, should be ordered by the court to fulfil his obligations. A husband of a worrying temperament, or one who treats his wife harshly without her giving him any cause for it, should first receive an exhortation from the court, and if this is without result must undergo what correction the court may think fit. Where husband and wife accuse each other, the court should appoint some reliable man to ascertain the facts of the case. The latter, after hearing what both parties have to say, should take whatever measures are rendered necessary by the circumstances in order that the party in the wrong may for the future perform his or her duty towards the injured party. In a case of very grave discord the court should appoint two arbitrators, one from the husband's family and one from the wife's, who should then arrange the matter as if they were the agents of the parties ; or, according to one jurist, by virtue of their nomination by the court. If they are considered as agents, the interested parties must approve their nomination, and the arbitrator for the husband must be authorised by him to pronounce repudiation, or to accept compensation for a divorce ; while the arbitrator for the wife should be authorised by her to offer compensation for a divorce, or to accept repudiation, also for a compensation.

BOOK 36.—DIVORCE

SECTION 1

DIVORCE is the separation of husband and wife for a compensation paid by the wife, whether the husband uses the word “repudiation” or the word “divorce.” Divorce is permitted only to a husband who can lawfully repudiate his wife. Thus a slave or a man legally incapable by reason of lunacy can divorce only on condition that the master or curator receive the compensation paid. A female slave may claim a divorce even without her master’s authorisation, whether the compensation consists in some obligation on her part or in some particular object. If it consists of some particular object the divorced slave is personally responsible to her former husband for proportional dower; or, according to one authority, for the value of the object she has promised. Where her master has authorised the slave to obtain a divorce he may either designate a particular object as compensation or fix the amount of the obligation she may contract towards her husband with this object. In the former case the husband may claim the object as his property, in the latter he may recover the amount from the slave’s subsequent earnings, if she has not exceeded the limits of the authorisation. Where the authorisation has been given without any restriction as to the amount, compensation will still be paid from the slave’s future earnings, and will consist of the proportional dower of the slave in question. When a husband proposes a divorce or a repudiation for a thousand pieces of money to his imbecile wife, her acceptance merely operates as a revocable repudiation; if she refuses the offer, she is not repudiated. On the other hand, a woman may lawfully obtain a divorce upon her death-bed, in which case the compensation is a debt due from the estate, unless it exceeds the proportional dower, when the excess becomes a charge upon the third of which she may dispose. *A revocable repudiation does not prevent a woman claiming a divorce, but an irrevocable one does.

Compensation has neither a maximum nor a minimum. It may consist of an obligation on the part of the wife, or of some particular thing, or even of the use of such thing. But a woman who has promised, e.g. an unknown thing, or a quantity of wine, owes proportional dower, instead of the compensation agreed upon. However, according to one jurist, the promise of a quantity of wine obliges the woman to pay its value instead.

Divorce may be effected by means of an agent, both on the one side and on the other ; but the husband's agent may not consent to a divorce for a less sum than that fixed by his principal, nor for a sum less than the proportional dower where his principal has given him no instructions upon the matter. Where the agent has not observed this rule there is no divorce, nor repudiation ; though one authority maintains that in these circumstances the divorce holds good and proportional dower is due ipso facto. Where the wife's agent has been authorised by her to offer a thousand pieces of money as compensation, and he has done so, the divorce is of course valid. And this is so also where the agent has promised two thousand pieces instead of one thousand, saying that he was acting in accordance with his instructions ; but in that case the compensation is ipso facto reduced to the amount of the proportional dower ; or, according to one authority, either to the sum fixed by the wife, or to the proportional dower, whichever is most advantageous for the husband. If the wife's agent effects the divorce upon his own responsibility, the act is considered as done by a third party, that is to say that the agent is personally responsible for the compensation promised. *If the agent omits to declare his capacity as agent, or the fact that he is acting upon his own responsibility, the wife owes the amount of compensation she had authorised her agent to offer, and the balance offered is owed by the agent. An infidel subject of a Moslem prince, a slave, and a person legally incapable through imbecility, may act as agents for offering or accepting a divorce ; but legal incapacity prevents an agent from taking possession of the compensation. †A husband may lawfully appoint a woman to be his agent for divorce or repudiation. But husband and wife may not appoint the same individual to represent them in a divorce ; though some jurists allow this.

Separation in terms of a divorce is really a repudiation, and this must be taken into consideration where it is a question of the necessity of an intermediate husband, if one desires to remarry the woman in question. One jurist, however, maintains that a divorce has the same consequences as a dissolution of marriage for redhibitory defects, which means that in his opinion a divorce does not count as a repudiation, as regards the necessity for an intermediate husband.

According to those authorities who consider divorce as really repudiation, the word "dissolve" should be considered as an implicit term for describing divorce, †but the word "ransom" is, according to them, the equivalent of divorce; while the jurist who likens it to a dissolution of marriage for redhibitory defects is of a contrary opinion. According to the former theory, that divorce is repudiation, †the wife owes the husband as compensation the amount of the proportional dower, unless there is some special stipulation as to the amount. This theory considers also that the divorce is valid even though pronounced in terms that imply repudiation, provided that such is the intention; and even though use is made of some other language than Arabic. It is considered that a divorce is implied where the husband says, "I sell you yourself for so much," and the woman answers, "I buy myself."

Where the husband begins by making the offer, and adds the amount of compensation, e.g. by saying, "I want to repudiate you," or "I want to divorce you for so much," it is in any case a conditional offer to effect a bilateral agreement, even according to the theory that considers divorce equivalent to repudiation. Consequently the husband can always withdraw his words, so long as the wife has not declared her acceptance of the offer made her. Moreover, the law requires that in these circumstances acceptance must be declared before any considerable interval has elapsed from the time of the offer. The acceptance must relate to the offer. Thus there is no divorce where the husband says, "I want to repudiate you for one thousand pieces of money," and the wife accepts, replying, "It is agreed, but for two thousand," or vice versâ. Nor is there any divorce where the husband says, "I wish to repudiate you three times for one thousand pieces of money," and the wife answers, "I only accept one for a third of that amount." But where, on the other hand, there is no essential difference the divorce is valid. Thus if the husband says, "I wish to repudiate you three times for a thousand pieces of money," and the wife answers, "I accept one repudiation for that sum," he has legally repudiated her thrice for the amount declared. When it is not a conditional offer of divorce that the husband makes, but a conditional divorce that he pronounces, saying for example, "when you give me," or "when you have given me," the law allows no retraction on his part. In this case verbal acceptance is not required nor even immediate payment. The words "if you give me," or "when you have given me," bring about identical legal consequences, except that they require payment to be made as soon as possible. If, instead of the husband, it is the wife who has taken the initiative in asking to be repudiated, and the husband has consented; this is a bilateral contract of the same nature as a piece of job work. In this case the wife may withdraw her request at any time before her husband has granted it ; and he must make up his mind as soon as possible, otherwise the offer is considered as ipso facto withdrawn. A request on the wife's part " to be repudiated three times for one thousand pieces of money," granted by the husband for one repudiation only, and for a third of the amount, results in the woman being only once repudiated.

A divorce, or a repudiation for compensation, is never revocable, unless the parties have reserved this right ; but such a reservation ipso facto annuls the stipulation as to the compensation. Only one authority considers, even where there has been this reserve, that the divorce has the effect of an irrevocable repudiation, and maintains that the wife owes proportional dower in addition. When a wife, after requesting to be repudiated for a certain amount, abjures Islam, and does not retract her error before the end of her period of legal retirement, she is considered to have lost her status as wife by the fact of apostasy, and owes nothing as compensation, whether her husband has or has not granted her request, and whether the marriage has or has not been consummated. But where the wife has returned to the faith before the expiry of her period of retirement ; she is considered as repudiated for the sum offered ; at least if the husband has in the meanwhile granted her request. A divorce is not rendered invalid because offer and acceptance are separated by some unimportant words.

The following words on the part of a husband : " You are repudiated and you owe," or " you owe me so much," constitute merely a revocable repudiation, unless the wife has herself previously asked to be repudiated and offered the same amount as compensation. It does not even matter whether the wife accepts the offer made to her by the husband, for in any case the phrase does not imply that the money is due by her as compensation. †Only where the husband afterwards declares that he meant definitely to repudiate his wife for the amount mentioned, and she accepts this subsequent explanation, must she be considered as divorced. Where the wife has begun by asking for repudiation for a compensation, the above phrase is considered as a favourable reply to her request, and she is consequently divorced. According to our school the phrase, " You are repudiated on condition that you owe me so much," is equivalent to the phrase, " You are repudiated for so much ; " that is to say that the wife, if she consents, is divorced, and owes the promised amount. It is the same where the husband says, " You will be repudiated if you will guarantee me a thousand pieces of money," provided that the wife gives an affirmative reply as soon as possible. The phrase, "When you guarantee me one thousand pieces of money you are repudiated," does not involve repudiation if the wife only guarantees some smaller sum, but it does if she guarantees the amount mentioned or double that amount. Similarly the following words pronounced by a husband against his wife, "If you guarantee me one thousand pieces of money you may yourself pronounce your repudiation," have the effect of divorcing her for one thousand pieces of money if she definitely accepts the entire proposal; but not if she merely guarantees the amount without divorcing herself, or repudiates herself without guaranteeing the amount. A repudiation pronounced on condition that the woman transfers some amount of money has effect as soon as the stipulated amount has been delivered to the husband, †who becomes its owner from that moment. A stipulation to deliver is equivalent, according to some, to a stipulation to transfer; but according to the greater number of authorities it is merely an ordinary suspensive condition. It is understood that in this case possession need not be taken immediately.

[By adding a condition to "deliver" instead of one to "transfer" the compensation, a mere revocable repudiation is pronounced; and the condition is fulfilled by the fact of the husband taking possession of the object, even as the result of some violence.]

A condition that a wife shall give a slave possessing certain specified qualities, as in a contract of salam, is not fulfilled if the slave given has not all the qualities stipulated, and the woman is consequently not considered to be repudiated; but if the slave, though possessed of the stipulated qualities, is tainted with redhibitory defects, the condition is fulfilled and the repudiation consummated; but without prejudice to the husband's right to return the slave on account of his defects, and to claim as compensation the amount of the proportional dower. According to one authority, however, he can claim in these circumstances only the value of the slave, had he had no defects. A condition to give "a slave," without further description, is fulfilled by the transfer of any slave, whatever his qualities may be; provided it is not a usurped slave, for in that case the husband can claim as compensation the amount of the proportional dower.

Where a woman asks her husband to repudiate her three times, for a thousand pieces of money, while the husband has only one repudiation left to pronounce, he has a right to demand the entire sum when pronouncing this repudiation. Others, however, maintain that only a third of the amount is due to him under these circumstances; while still others are of opinion that he can demand the thousand pieces if the woman acted knowingly, but only a third if she made a mistake as to the number of repudiations her husband could still pronounce. If the wife asks for a repudiation for a thousand pieces of money, and the husband replies by repudiating her for a hundred, she owes him only the amount declared by him. Others maintain that in this case she owes him a thousand ; while still others do not admit any obligation, as there has been no consent. A request to be repudiated "to-morrow for a thousand pieces of money," results in the woman being obliged to pay proportional dower, if the husband repudiates her either on the next day or earlier without adding that she shall be free from the next day. According to one authority, however, there are jurists that do not allow this subtle interpretation, but consider the wife liable for the amount mentioned if the repudiation takes place, even though it may be before the day indicated by her. In any case this repudiation is irrevocable.

††Where a husband says to his wife, "When you enter the house you are repudiated for a thousand pieces of money," she is really repudiated if she accepts the proposal and enters the house, and she owes her husband the amount mentioned. A single authority maintains that in this case she owes proportional dower, and others raise this opinion to the rank of a dogma.

A third party may lawfully ask for the divorce of another's wife, even against her will. To this proposal must be applied all we have said about the expressions used in ordinary divorce and their consequences when used by or to the wife herself. A person appointed by the wife as her agent to ask for a divorce may do so either as her agent or upon his own responsibility. A third party may even appoint the wife herself an agent to ask for a divorce in the interests of that third party ; but the wife may of course refuse to act as such agent. If a third party asks for a woman's divorce and falsely states that the wife has appointed such third party her agent, the husband's consent has no legal effect. A father may ask for his daughter's divorce like any other person ; that is to say that when acting in his own name he is personally responsible for the compensation ; but when acting on his daughter's account, either in his quality as guardian, or falsely alleging an appointment by her, there is no divorce. A father who of his own accord promises compensation from his daughter's property is as little justified as if he had promised his son-in-law a usurped object.

SECTION 4

Where the husband denies the fact of a divorce asserted by his wife, there is a presumption in his favour on his taking an oath. Where, on the other hand, the husband maintains that he has repudiated his wife for so much, while she asserts that she has been simply repudiated without compensation, the law presumes an irrevocable repudiation without compensation. In proceedings as to the nature or amount of the compensation the court should, in default of proof, administer an oath to the litigants ; when, if both take it, the wife owes proportional dower.

If a divorce has been obtained for a compensation of " a thousand " without specifying what, but the parties are in agreement as to the nature of the things of which this quantity has been stipulated, the wife owes her husband a thousand things of this kind. Some authorities, however, maintain that a stipulation of " a thousand " without adding what, is inadmissible in a court of law, and that the woman always owes in such a case proportional dower. The same controversy exists as to the case where one of the parties maintains that the stipulation of " a thousand " implies " dinars," and the other that it means " drahms " or copper money. According to the first theory the court should administer an oath to both parties ; but according to those authorities who do not admit the validity of such a vague stipulation, the wife owes proportional dower when she does not deny the husband's claim altogether, without its being necessary to administer an oath to the parties.

BOOK 37.—REPUDIATION

SECTION 1

IN order that a repudiation should be valid the law requires that the husband should be a sane adult Moslem. A repudiation may be pronounced in a state of drunkenness. A repudiation is valid, even where pronounced unintentionally, if the husband uses explicit terms ; but if he uses implicit terms, he must really intend to repudiate his wife.

By explicit terms are meant, "repudiation," "separation," "dismissal," "I repudiate you," "You are repudiated," "You are discharged," "O repudiated woman !"; †but where the mere words "you" and "repudiation," with or without the article, are pronounced without indicating the relation between them, such a meaningless exclamation has no legal effect. Our school admits that repudiation may be explicitly pronounced in any other language as well as in Arabic, provided the expressions employed correspond to the terms just mentioned. The following expressions are considered to be implicit terms : "I render you your liberty," or "You are free." †Local expressions specially used to denote repudiation, even though not actually mentioning repudiation itself, are considered by law as explicit. Thus some persons say, "the woman I was permitted to enjoy," or "the woman God permitted me to enjoy will henceforth be to me a person with whom connection is forbidden."

[†On the contrary these words should be considered as implicit.] As implicit terms are also considered the following : "You are henceforth isolated," "free," "separated," "cut off," "irrevocably repudiated," "You must observe on my account a period of legal retirement," or "period of purification," "Go back to your family," "Your rope is on your withers," "I have no further need of you," "Leave me," "Go away," "Leave me alone," "Bid me good-bye," etc. Enfranchisement is an implicit manner of announcing repudiation ; and vice versâ, repudiation implies enfranchisement ; but repudiation does not imply injurious comparison, nor vice versâ. Such phrases as : "Connection with you is henceforth forbidden me," or "I declare connection with you to be forbidden me," indicate either a repudiation or an injurious comparison, according to the husband's intention ; and if he had both in view he may afterwards declare which of the two he intends to effect. According to some authorities, however, these phrases always imply a repudiation, while according to others they always imply an injurious comparison. The phrase, "Your eye," or any other part of the body, "is forbidden me," does not render cohabitation with the woman positively prohibited to her husband, but the latter owes the expiation prescribed for perjury, *even though he may have had no intention of forbidding himself cohabitation with her. However, according to another doctrine, such phrases should be considered as not said. Such phrases as we have mentioned, if pronounced against a slave, have the effect of enfranchising her, if such is the master's intention ; but if he intended thus to forbid himself the right of cohabiting with her as regards the part of the body referred to, or if he had no particular intention when using these phrases, they have the same effect as regards the slave as in the case of the wife. If, in repudiation, one uses implicit terms, the intention must accompany the whole sentence ; or, according to some authorities, the first word.

A person who has the use of his tongue may not indicate repudiation by signs ; though some authorities admit signs in these circumstances as equivalent to implicit terms. As to a mute it is agreed that he may legally form and dissolve all kinds of obligations by means of signs ; and, where every one understands what he means, signs constitute on his part an explicit method of repudiation. Where, on the other hand, persons of highly developed intelligence can alone understand the signs, they are considered as an implicit manner of communicating the mute's ideas. A husband who, though having the use of his tongue, writes to his wife that she is repudiated, obtains the desired effect. But if he has so written without serious intention the marriage remains valid. If a husband writes to his wife : "You are repudiated from the time this letter reaches you," the repudiation is effected by the receipt of the letter ; but if he uses the phrase, "from the time you have read my letter," the result depends upon whether the woman can read. If she can, she is repudiated only from the moment she has read it herself, †not if another person reads it to her ; if she cannot and if the letter is read to her, this has the same effect as if she had read it herself.

SECTION 2

A husband may lawfully grant his wife the right to pronounce her own repudiation, a proceeding which Shafii in his second period likened to a transfer of property. The law requires that a wife so authorised should exercise the right soon afterwards. Thus one may say to one's wife : " You may yourself pronounce your repudiation for one thousand pieces of money," and after this she is irrevocably repudiated upon pronouncing the repudiation, and also owes the sum mentioned. One jurist, however, compares this proceeding to an appointment as agent by the husband, †and consequently does not insist on the wife's pronouncing the repudiation soon afterwards. Admitting this principle the difficulty arises whether the husband's offer must be formally accepted by the woman to enable her to use her right of pronouncing her own repudiation, a controversy we have discussed when speaking of the agent. However, whatever may be the nature of the proceeding, all are agreed that the husband may retract his words, so long as the wife is not really repudiated. When, on the other hand, the proceeding is admitted to be merely a transfer of property, the phrase, " When we are in the month of Ramadan you may pronounce your repudiation," though used by some, is devoid of meaning and consequently void.

Repudiation takes place also in the following cases :—

1. If the husband says to the wife, " Do the act that obliges me henceforth to abstain from you ;" to which she replies, " I do it ;" at any rate where the intention on both sides was to imply a repudiation, but not otherwise.

2. If the husband uses an explicit phrase, and the wife replies implicitly, intending to indicate repudiation.

3. If the husband uses an implicit phrase, intending to indicate repudiation, and the woman replies explicitly.

In virtue of these principles three repudiations are admitted, if such is the intention on both sides, even where neither the husband on granting his wife the right to repudiate herself, nor the wife on accepting the offer, may have actually spoken of " three." On the other hand, there is only one repudiation—

1. †Where neither of the parties speaks of " three," and only one intends to accomplish a triple-repudiation ; and

2. Where one of the parties uses the number " three," but the other speaks of only one repudiation.

SECTION 3

Repudiation pronounced in a dream is void ; and it is the same with regard to a repudiation pronounced by a husband by mistake, with no definite intention. The words used should always be interpreted in accordance with the succession of ideas they represent. Thus a woman whose name is Talik is not repudiated by the mere words O

Talik, if the intention is to call her, †or where there is no special intention to call her. Even in the case of a woman of the name Tarik or Talib the law admits a presumption in favour of her husband who says to her O Talik, if he declares afterwards that he only meant to call her, but made a mistake in the letter. This, however, is without prejudice to the fact that a repudiation pronounced by way of banter or jest carries all the legal consequences of a real repudiation ; as does also a repudiation pronounced against a woman erroneously supposed not to be one's wife, either because her features cannot be distinguished in the obscurity, or because the husband does not yet know her, the marriage having been concluded by his tutor or agent. A stranger who pronounces a repudiation in Arabic without understanding the meaning of his words is not considered to have repudiated his wife ; though, according to some authorities, this repudiation is valid, if the husband's intention is to repudiate, even though he may not understand every word he uses.

A repudiation extorted by violence has no legal effect, unless it duly appears that the husband already had the intention of repudiating his wife, e.g. if after being constrained to pronounce a triple repudiation, he reduces it to a single one ; or if after being constrained to pronounce it explicitly or conditionally, he pronounces it implicitly or unconditionally ; or lastly if after having been forced to say, " I repudiate you," he says, " I dismiss you," or vice versâ. By " violence " in a legal sense is meant the power to cause a person the ill with which one has threatened him, whether such power consists in authority or legal force, provided the person in question cannot escape and really believes the threat will be carried out if he does not do what is demanded. Thus it is considered " violence " to threaten any one with serious blows, imprisonment, loss of property, etc. ; though, according to some authorities, a menace, to be a cause of nullity, must relate to a person's life, or to the loss of a limb, or to blows that would endanger life. Violence is a cause of absolute nullity, even if the person against whom it is exercised has made no mental reservation upon obeying. Only a few authorities assert that a person neglecting without valid excuse to make a mental reservation, when obeying violence, cannot claim nullity. By " mental reservation " is meant, e.g. the act of thinking of another person when repudiating one's own wife under pressure of a menace.

When one has temporarily lost one's reason through liquor or medicine, one is none the less capable of pronouncing repudiation or disposing of one's property in general ; and, according to our school, one is none the less responsible for one's words and actions. Only one of our jurists denies all consequence to the words or actions of a drunken man ; while several admit his responsibility, but maintain that he can never derive any advantage from such a condition.

Repudiation is valid where reference is made to " A quarter of you," " A part of you," " One of your limbs," " Your liver," " One of your hairs," or " One of your nails," as being repudiated. According to our school it is the same where one says, " Your blood is repudiated ;" but not if one speaks of that which comes from the human body, as saliva, sweat, sperm, or milk.

Our school does not accept a repudiation where the husband says to his wife whose right hand has been amputated, " Your right hand is repudiated." The phrase, " I am repudiated by you," spoken by the husband, implies a repudiation of his wife if such was his intention ; but if by this obscure phrase he did not mean to indicate repudiation, for even if his intention to repudiate did not specially refer to his wife, a repudiation does not take place. Intention to repudiate is also rigorously necessary where one says to one's wife, " I am irrevocably repudiated by you ;" but authorities are not agreed as to whether these words must refer to some particular woman. Finally the phrase, " I am about to observe a period of purification," spoken by the husband is senseless and consequently void ; though a few authorities consider it sufficient to repudiate one's wife if such was one's intention.

SECTION 4

A repudiation pronounced against a woman to whom one is not married is void, even where intended to apply to an eventual marriage. †On the other hand, a slave, though he can only pronounce a repudiation twice, may all the same pronounce a third to take effect upon his eventual enfranchisement, or upon the woman entering such and such a house after that event. In the first case the effect depends upon the enfranchisement, and in the second upon both the enfranchisement and an entry into the house mentioned. The reader, however, should be reminded that this conditional repudiation affects only a wife who has been revocably repudiated, and not one who has been divorced in the meanwhile. Similarly a condition upon which a free man has based a third repudiation, e.g. that the woman enters such and such a house, is not fulfilled where she is irrevocably separated for some other reason after the second repudiation, and taken back again by her former husband, and then enters the house mentioned. Under these circumstances it matters little whether she has *or has not previously entered the house when free. Another theory, however, admits these precepts only in case of irrevocable separation by divorce or of dissolution in consequence of redhibitory defects, but not in case of irrevocable separation caused by a new repudiation thrice repeated, occurring after the second repudiation.

A husband who repudiates his wife once or twice, but takes her back during her period of legal retirement, or marries her again after its expiry, and even after an intervening marriage with another husband, must, if he repudiates her again, take count of the former repudiations when determining whether this last one is or is not revocable. If, on the other hand, the new marriage has been effected after the woman has been previously repudiated thrice, she may again be three times repudiated before the new marriage is irrevocably dissolved.

A repudiation may lawfully be pronounced upon a death-bed. During a period of legal retirement rendered necessary by a revocable repudiation, the parties mutually retain their right of succession. This is not so in the case of an irrevocable repudiation; though Shafii in his first period admitted the wife's right, even in these circumstances.

SECTION 5

The phrase, "I repudiate you," or "You are repudiated," implies as many repudiations as the husband intends; and similarly with phrases indicating repudiation in an implicit manner. On the other hand, no account is taken of the number intended by the husband if he expressly says only once; though some authorities prefer, even in such a case, to keep to the intention and not to the letter. [On the contrary the majority maintain that in this case also the intention must be regarded; those authorities that would keep to the letter are in the minority.]

Where a husband is upon the point of saying, "You are repudiated thrice," and the phrase is interrupted by the sudden death of the woman, there is no repudiation if death occurs before the termination of the word "repudiated." If she dies between the words "repudiated" and "thrice" three repudiations must be admitted. Some authorities, however, admit in such a case only one repudiation, others none. If a husband says, "You are repudiated," "You are repudiated," "You are repudiated," these phrases equal three repudiations if separated by an interval. If, on the contrary, they follow immediately upon each other they constitute:—

1. A single repudiation, if the second and third phrases were merely intended by the husband to be reaffirmations of the first;

2. Three repudiations, if he intended to reiterate his will, *or had no definite intention in the matter;

3. Two repudiations, if he intended the second to reaffirm the first, and the third to be a reiteration of his will, or vice versa ; or

4. †Three repudiations, if the third phrase was a reaffirmation of the first, and the second a reiteration of his will.

When saying, “ You are repudiated, and repudiated, and repudiated,” the third “ repudiated ” may lawfully be used to reaffirm the second, but not so the second to reaffirm the first. All this as to reaffirmation and reiteration relates only to a woman whose marriage has been consummated ; for where these phrases are pronounced against a wife before cohabitation there is only one repudiation. However, if one says to one’s wife before cohabitation, “ You are repudiated and repudiated, if you enter into such a place,” the fact of entering is enough to cause her to be twice repudiated ; and this is also the consequence of the phrase, “ You will undergo one repudiation then another,” or “ accompanied by another,” it making no difference in this case whether the marriage has been consummated for not. The words “ a repudiation followed by another,” or “ preceded by another ” constitute two repudiations if the marriage has been consummated, and otherwise one ; and the same with the words “ a repudiation which follows another,” or “ which precedes another.” If one says, “ a repudiation upon a repudiation,” it is necessary to distinguish between the cases where the preposition “ upon ” has been employed (1) in a conjunctive sense, (2) to indicate time or place, (3) in an arithmetical sense, or (4) without any specially indicated function. In the first case the phrase is admitted to imply two repudiations, and in the three others one. It must also be observed that the words, “ The half of a repudiation upon the half of a repudiation,” imply in all cases a single repudiation. The phrase, “ A repudiation upon two repudiations ” admits of the following explanations :—

1. It signifies three repudiations, when “ upon ” is used in a conjunctive sense.

2. It signifies one, when “ upon ” is used to indicate time and place.

3. It signifies two, when “ upon ” is taken in an arithmetical sense, i.e. knowingly so taken ; but only one when “ upon ” is taken in an arithmetical sense by a husband who does not know how to count, even if he intends to attribute to the phrase its ordinary meaning. Some authorities admit two repudiations in this last case.

4. It signifies one only where the husband does not intend to attribute to the word “ upon ” any special function ; though one authority admits two in these circumstances, at any rate if the husband knows how to count.

“ A partial repudiation ” is equivalent to a whole one ; and the same is true of the phrase, "Two halves of a repudiation," unless the husband adds that the two halves are distinct repudiations, for in that case there are two complete repudiations, by virtue of the explanation of "a partial repudiation." †"The half of two repudiations" means one; "three halves," and "the half of one repudiation plus the third of another," imply two; but "the half plus the third of a repudiation" constitutes one only. If one says to one's four wives, "I inflict upon you," or "You can share amongst you—a repudiation," or "two repudiations," or "three," or "four," all are repudiated once. However, where one intends each of the repudiations to be shared amongst the women, all are twice repudiated by two repudiations, and thrice by three repudiations or four repudiations. ‡It must, of course, be understood that one cannot afterwards declare that one intended the women to share amongst them the fractions of repudiations pronounced against them, as such a complication would be obviously inconsistent with the words themselves. Finally, if a husband repudiates one of his wives and then says to another, "I want you to share the repudiation with her," or "You are as she," they are both repudiated, otherwise not. The same rule applies also to a case where one husband repudiates his wife, and another says to his, "You are as she."

SECTION 6

A repudiation may be pronounced under some reservation, provided this reservation immediately follows the repudiation, except where one may stop to take breath, or because one is a stammerer. [†It is also rigorously necessary that there should be an intention to make a reservation before the oath is finished, where the repudiation is accompanied by an oath.] The law requires that a reservation should not be of a kind to render the whole act illusory. Hence the phrase, "You are repudiated thrice, less twice plus once," indicates at least one repudiation; and according to some authorities it indicates three. By virtue of the same principle the expression, "Two repudiations, plus one less one," indicates three repudiations, or, according to some authorities, two. A reservation may consist either in the negation of a positive fact, or in the affirmation of a negative. Consequently the words, "Three, less two less one," indicate two; "Three, less three less two," also two, or according to some three, and according to others one. "Five less three," mean two, or according to some jurists three; ††"Three less the half of another," mean three. A repudiation pronounced under the reservation, "If it please God," or "With God's permission," is of no effect where a suspensive condition is intended; and similarly a repudiation may not be made dependent upon any suspensive condition consisting in some future fact announced under the same reservation of "If it please God," or "By God's permission." This rule applies not only to repudiation, but also to enfranchisement, to an oath or a vow, and in general to all ways of disposing of one's property. †On the other hand, the words, "O repudiated woman! If it please God," must be considered effective; for in this case the repudiation does not depend upon the will of God by way of condition; but the words, "You are repudiated, with God's permission," constitute an illegal reservation.

SECTION 7

Any ambiguity in the phrasing of a repudiation should be interpreted in a sense favourable to the marriage, whether that ambiguity concerns the fact of the repudiation itself or the number of times it is pronounced. The husband cannot allege natural shyness as an excuse for ambiguity of expression.

When one husband says to his wife, "You are repudiated if this bird is a crow," and another husband adds, "If it is not a crow my wife is repudiated," the double repudiation does not take place where neither husband knows if it be a crow or not. But if the same person pronounces the two sentences against two of his wives, he wishes to divorce one of them; and he must not only ascertain the nature of the bird, but must inform the wife concerned. Where a husband has repudiated one of his wives and forgets which, the affair remains in suspense until he remembers; and under these circumstances he cannot be obliged by the wives concerned to put an end to the uncertainty. †A man who says to his wife and to another woman, "One of you is repudiated," and adds, "It is the other woman I meant," has a presumption in favour of the truth of his words, and the wife is not repudiated. ††Where, however, the wife is called Zainab, and he says, "Zainab is repudiated," he cannot afterwards assert that the words refer to another woman of the same name. The phrase, "One of you is repudiated," pronounced against two wives involves the repudiation of that one who is specially meant, and she must be informed; but if neither be specially intended, it must be decided afterwards to which of the two it is to apply. In either case both wives are free until the husband has informed them of his previous intention or of his subsequent decision. He should do this as soon as possible, and he owes them ordinary maintenance until the matter has been decided one way or the other. The repudiation dates from the time of pronouncement. Only a small number of authorities make it date from the moment the husband communicates his decision, where he did not intend to indicate one particular wife at the time of pronouncement. It should also be pointed out to the reader that subsequent cohabitation with one of the wives is not enough to indicate which was intended, nor to decide which should be repudiated. Only a few jurists admit cohabitation to be a sufficient indication of a husband's subsequent decision. Where, on the other hand, in these circumstances the husband points to one of the wives and says, "This is the one I have repudiated," it is generally agreed that this is sufficient to indicate which of the two women he had specially in view when pronouncing the repudiation in the alternative ; and where he says, "This one and that one," or "This one not more than that one," he has repudiated both. The obligation, either to say which wife was meant, or to decide to whom it shall apply, remains, though one or both should previously de cease ; for it affects not only the marriage but the right of succession. Consequently, in case of the husband's de cease, before accomplishing this duty, *it is necessary to accept the declaration of his heir, as to the wife whom the deceased intended to repudiate ; though the heir can never decide which shall be repudiated, if the deceased had not yet definitely decided. The words, "If this bird is a crow my wife is repudiated, and if it is not my slave is free," have as their consequence that the person who had spoken them, while ignorant of the nature of the bird, is deprived of his rights both over the wife and over the slave, until he has ascertained it. In this case, however, our school does not admit the declaration of the heir, in the case of the de cease of the speaker ; but the matter must be decided by casting lots. If the slave is thus selected he is ipso facto enfranchised. If the wife wins, the repudiation is inadmissible. †In this latter case the slave is not reduced to servitude, from which he has been in some sort liberated, but his situation remains in suspense.

SECTION 8

A repudiation is either in conformity with the Sonna, or contrary to it and consequently forbidden. Repudiations contrary to the Sonna are of two kinds :—

1. A repudiation during the menstruation of a woman with whom one has already cohabited. Some authorities admit repudiation in these circumstances when at the request of the woman herself ; and all are agreed that menstruation is no obstacle to divorce, †except when the request is made by a third person. A repudiation in the words, "You are repudiated at the end of your present menstrues," ‡is in conformity with the Sonna ; but our school considers as contrary to the Sonna the expression, "At the end of your present period of purity," at least if the husband has not cohabited with his wife during that period.

2. A repudiation during a period of purity, when the husband has had connection with his wife in that period, and probably rendered her pregnant, though the existence of the foetus may not have been ascertained. Neither may one lawfully repudiate a woman during a period of purity, if one has cohabited with her during the menstruation that preceded that period; though there is no objection to a divorce in these circumstances, nor even to a repudiation where the existence of a foetus has already been ascertained.

Where a woman has been repudiated in a manner contrary to the Sonna, the practice has been introduced by it of revoking the repudiation, after which the woman may be again repudiated, in the first following period of purity. If a man says to his wife during her menstrues, "You are repudiated contrary to the Sonna," the repudiation is immediately effected, though it has to be revoked as we have just said. But where, in these circumstances the husband says, "You are repudiated in accordance with the Sonna," it begins from the first following period of purity.

Where the repudiation is pronounced against the woman not during her menstrues, but during her period of purity, the law admits the two following distinctions:—

1. The expression, "You are repudiated in accordance with the Sonna," implies an immediate repudiation, if the wife has not had connection with her husband during her present period of purity; otherwise the repudiation takes effect from the end of her next menstruation.

2. The expression, "You are repudiated contrary to the Sonna," implies an immediate repudiation, if the wife has had connection with her husband during her present period of purity; otherwise the repudiation takes effect from the beginning of her next menstruation. In both cases, however, the repudiation may be revoked later.

The words, "A regular repudiation," "The most regular," or "The most perfect," are equivalent to "according to the Sonna," while the words "faulty," "the most faulty," or "the most abominable," are equivalent to "contrary to the Sonna." The expressions, "as much in accordance with as contrary to the Sonna," or "as regular as faulty," always designate an immediate repudiation.

Several repudiations may lawfully be pronounced at one and the same time; but the law does not permit the husband, after saying, "You are repudiated thrice," or "Thrice in accordance with the Sonna," to spread out these three repudiations over three of his wife's periods of purity; unless he belongs to a school which, like that of Malik, forbids pronouncing more than one repudiation at a time. †In this matter the court should respect the prescriptions of the school to which the husband belongs, even where his ideas are not in conformity with the precepts of our school, for it is a matter of personal status. This principle should be observed also in a case where the husband has used such expressions as, "You are repudiated, that is if you enter the house," or "If Zaid approves of it." †Where, on the other hand, the husband says, "All my wives are repudiated," or "Every wife I have is repudiated," adding, "I only meant some of them," no account can be taken of his individual opinions, as they are obviously opposed to common sense and public order. Such a reservation would only be admissible if it formed as it were a single locution with the principal phrase; where, e.g. one of his wives reproached a husband with having married other wives instead of confining himself to her, and he were to reply, "I repudiate all my wives," adding, "except you alone."

SECTION 9

The words, "You will be repudiated in such and such a month," "At the new moon of such and such a month," or "on the first of such and such a month," imply a term expiring at the commencement of the first night of the month. The term "the day" or "the first day" of the month expires upon the appearance of dawn on the first day; while the term "the end of the month" expires at the end of the last day of the month, or according to some at the beginning of the latter half. If one says during the night, "when a day shall have elapsed," one indicates the following sunset; but if one says it during the day one indicates the corresponding hour of the succeeding day. The expression "this day" pronounced during the day indicates a term expiring upon the next sunset; pronounced at night time it becomes a meaningless expression, and in consequence null and void. The terms "month" and "year" must be interpreted upon the same principles.

A repudiation commencing from some past time, e.g. "You are repudiated from yesterday," though referring to the past, counts only from the moment it was pronounced, if such was the husband's intention; though some maintain that such an intention is incompatible with the expression mentioned, and that the act is null and void. Where, on the other hand, the husband's intention really is that the repudiation should take effect from the previous day, the woman is already in her period of legal retirement, at the time when the repudiation is pronounced; and in these circumstances a declaration of the husband as to his intention is presumed to be true if substantiated on oath. And similarly where he declares he was referring to a previous marriage with the same wife ; at any rate if his remarriage with her is a fact of public notoriety.

Conditional words or expressions, that is the words "whom," "if," "where," "when," "from the time that," "every time that," "whatsoever," do not necessarily imply that the act takes effect immediately where they refer to a definite future event, provided always that a divorce be not intended. The single exception to this rule is when the husband says, "You are repudiated if you like," for such a condition can refer only to the wishes of the woman concerned. The phrase "every time that" requires a repetition of the event upon which the repudiation depends ; but this is not the case with the other expressions mentioned above. The words, "When I repudiate you, you are already repudiated," followed in fact by a repudiation, simple or conditional, constitute two repudiations, provided in the latter case the condition is fulfilled. The expression, "You are repudiated as many times as I can repudiate you," followed by a repudiation, constitutes three repudiations if the marriage has been consummated but otherwise only one. The words, "If I repudiate one of my wives, one of my slaves is freed ; on the repudiation of two wives, two slaves ; of three, three ; of four, four," pronounced by a husband who has four wives, and followed by the repudiation of all four, either at once or in succession, implies the enfranchisement of ten slaves ; ††and even of fifteen, if the condition is expressed by the phrase, "every time that." A condition that a certain event shall not take place, expressed by the word "if," e.g. "if you do not enter such and such a house," is fulfilled, according to our school, when it can no longer be reasonably supposed that the event will take place. But when such a negative condition is expressed in some other way, it is fulfilled only by the expiration of the time within which it is possible for the event to happen. Where, on the other hand, the husband has used the following words : "You are repudiated since you have entered the house," or "Because you have not entered it," it is known at once in a positive manner if the woman is repudiated or not. [Unless the husband is not strong in grammar, and consequently does not always observe the difference between the conjunctions "in" and "an" ; for in this case the expression is considered as an ordinary condition.]

SECTION 10

A condition "that the wife is pregnant" is fulfilled as soon as the existence of the foetus is ascertained. If it is not ascertained, an accouchement before six months is enough to indicate that the condition was fulfilled at the moment of repudiation ; but if an accouchement does not take place until between six months and four years after the conditional repudiation, and if the woman in question has in the meantime cohabited again in such a way as may have rendered her pregnant, the condition is not fulfilled. †In the absence of subsequent cohabitation, the condition is fulfilled by an accouchement up to the extreme limit of four years after the repudiation. The phrase, “ If you are pregnant of a son you are once repudiated, but if you are pregnant of a daughter you are twice repudiated,” involves three repudiations if the wife gives birth to a son and a daughter ; but the phrase, “ If the child with which you are pregnant is a son you are repudiated once, and if it is a daughter twice ” involves no repudiation in these circumstances. “ If you have an accouchement you are repudiated,” signifies that a woman giving birth to two children in succession one after the other, by the same husband, is repudiated for the first accouchement, and her period of legal retirement is regarded as terminated by the second ; while the words, “ Every time you have an accouchement you will be repudiated,” implies the consequence that the giving birth to three children, not only by the same husband, but during the same accouchement, one after the other, involves two repudiations for the two first children, and the expiry of the period of legal retirement at the birth of the third. ††Now in this case the third repudiation has not yet taken place. If a husband pronounces against his four wives the words, “ Every time one of you has an accouchement the others will be repudiated,” and all four have an accouchement at one and the same time, each is repudiated thrice. Where, on the other hand, the accouchements are successive, the fourth wife is repudiated thrice, and also the first, provided that the latter’s period of legal retirement has not expired at the time of the former’s accouchement. As to the second wife, she is only repudiated once, upon the accouchement of the first ; while the third is twice repudiated, i.e. upon the accouchements of the first and of the second ; and further the periods of legal retirement of the second and third expire upon their respective accouchement. Some authorities, however, arrive at a different result, admitting that in such a case the first wife is not repudiated, and that each of her companions is repudiated once only. A special case exists where the wives in question have their accouchements two by two ; then each of the two first is repudiated thrice, or according to some authorities once, and each of the two last twice.

A woman repudiated on condition she has her menstrues has a presumption in her favour on declaring upon oath that menstruation has begun ; †but no such presumption exists in the case of an accouchement, for that is a fact that can easily be otherwise established. Nor does any presumption exist where one wife's repudiation depends upon the menstruation of another. Consequently where a husband pronounces against two of his wives the words, " I repudiate you both if you are actually both in a period of menstruation," and subsequently denies the simultaneous menstruation alleged by the two women, he has a presumption in favour of his denial upon oath, and the double repudiation he has pronounced does not take effect. If he merely denies the menstruation of one of them, that one is repudiated as a consequence of the menstruation of the other, admitted by the husband.

The words " if," or " When I repudiate you, you are already previously repudiated thrice," followed really by a repudiation, involve only one ; though according to some authorities they constitute three, and according to others have no legal effect at all. This divergence of opinion exists also with regard to the words, " If I pronounce against you an injurious comparison," or " anathema," or " an oath of continence," or " If our marriage is dissolved on my demand on account of redhibitory defects, consider yourself as previously thrice repudiated," at least where these conditions are accomplished. However, a repudiation pronounced as follows, " If I have with you lawful carnal intercourse, you are previously repudiated," is null and void, even though carnal intercourse should take place.

Where a repudiation depends on the will of the wife, it should be declared within a short time, at least when the repudiation has been pronounced while speaking to her ; †but this is not rigorously necessary where the repudiation has been pronounced in the third person, nor where this act depends upon the will of a third party. If the person upon whose will the repudiation depends has really declared his decision, the repudiation has its full legal effect, even though that decision may be contrary to his own wishes ; though according to some jurists it is not in these circumstances mentally accomplished. A repudiation may not depend upon the will of a minor of either sex ; though some jurists admit such a suspensive condition in the case of a minor who has attained the age of discernment. In all cases where a repudiation has been pronounced on condition that either the wife or some third party wishes it, it cannot be retracted before the one or the other has decided. The phrase, " You are repudiated thrice, unless Zaid prefers that it should be only once," is no repudiation if Zaid says he wishes it to be once only ; some, however, admit in these circumstances a single repudiation. *When one has made a repudiation depend upon some act one is about to perform oneself, the fact of having accomplished this act, either without thinking of the consequences, or as the result of some violence, is not sufficient to fulfil the condition. The same principle must be followed where the repudiation depends upon the act of a third party, in all cases where the latter has an interest in the act, and knows what the consequences will be. For if it is an act indifferent to the third party, or if he is ignorant that the repudiation depends upon it, the fact of his accomplishing it without thinking, or as the result of some violence, is enough for the fulfilment of the condition.

SECTION 11

The words, "You are repudiated," followed by the act of lifting up two or three fingers, do not constitute two or three repudiations respectively, unless such was the intention of the husband who pronounced it; but where, under these circumstances, the husband adds, "so many times," then there are really either two or three repudiations. But where, even in this case, he declares upon oath that he raised the third finger only with the intention of indicating the two others united, the presumption is in his favour, and there are only two repudiations.

When a slave says to his wife, "At my master's death you will be repudiated twice," after which the master declares that the slave in question will be enfranchised at his death, †the master's decease causes the woman to be twice repudiated. These two repudiations, though originally pronounced by a slave, are considered to emanate from a free man, and are consequently revocable. It follows that the couple can remarry without an intermediate husband.

If a husband calls one of his wives and another answers and he says to her, "You are repudiated," believing himself to be speaking to the wife he called, †it is the wife that answers who is repudiated.

The words, "You are repudiated if you eat a pomegranate, and if you eat the half of a pomegranate," result in a wife being twice repudiated if she eats a whole pomegranate.

The law admits an oath as a way of rendering a repudiation conditional, whether the oath consists in an incitement to perform some act, or in its prohibition, or in the confirmation of some piece of news. Thus, upon saying, "You are repudiated if I confirm my words on oath," or "You are repudiated if you have not come out of such and such a house," or "If you have come out of it," or "If the matter is not as I have told you," a repudiation takes effect, by the fact of taking the oath, or by the fulfilment of the other conditions mentioned. When, on the other hand, the second condition consists in a fact about to happen, such as sunrise or the return of the pilgrimage, one cannot lawfully complete the repudiation by an oath, since in that case the first condition is replaced by the second.

If any one inquires from a husband whether he has repudiated his wife and he answers, "yes," it is an admission on his part; though he may afterwards declare that he was speaking of a former repudiation he had since revoked; and if he confirms this subsequent declaration upon oath, he has a presumption in favour of the truth of his words. But where the inquiry is not purely interrogative, but made with the intention of requesting the husband to proceed to a repudiation, the affirmative reply is an explicit manner of repudiation; or, according to some authorities, an implicit one.

SECTION 12

A condition of eating a piece of bread or a pomegranate is not fulfilled so long as there remains a crumb or a pip. Where a husband and wife eat together some dates and mix the seeds, and the husband says to the wife, "If you don't separate your seeds from mine you are repudiated," and the wife puts each seed aside, the condition of repudiation is not fulfilled and the marriage remains intact, unless the husband wishes her to indicate which seeds were hers. When a woman has a date in her mouth and her husband repudiates her on condition she swallows it, and then changes his mind and makes it depend on her spitting it out, and then changes his mind again and makes the repudiation depend upon her taking the date in the hollow of her hand, and the woman on hearing these words quickly swallows half the date and spits out the other half, the condition is not considered to be fulfilled. When a husband accuses his wife of theft, and says to her, "If you do not admit that my words are true you are repudiated," and she replies, "I did steal," adding, "I did not steal," no repudiation takes place. Where a husband says, "If you do not name the number of pips contained in this pomegranate you are repudiated," the fulfilment of the condition may be avoided by the wife first mentioning a number known to be a minimum, and then continuing by naming all numbers from that one up to what is known to be a maximum. It must be understood of course that it was not the husband's intention to ascertain the number of the pips, for in that case the wife could not escape the dilemma by such an evasive reply. This principle applies also to the evasive answer already cited with reference to a wife accused of theft. Where one says to three of one's wives, "I repudiate her who cannot tell me the number of rakas that are obligatory in twenty-four hours," and one of them answers "seventeen," and another "fifteen, that is to say, Friday," and the third "eleven, that is for a traveller," none are repudiated. When one says, "You are repudiated until such and such a time," or "from such a time," the time is due the moment that a single instant of that term is passed. The condition, "If you see so-and-so," or "If you touch him," or "If you accuse him unjustly of the crime of fornication," is fulfilled by the acts mentioned, whether the individual in question is dead or alive. This, however, is not the case with a condition referring, e.g. to the act "of giving him a blow," for this condition clearly implies that the individual in question is alive.

Where a wife pronounces against her husband words considered blamable, e.g. "O imbecile," or "O ignoble husband," and he replies, "If I am so you are repudiated," the repudiation really has effect if the husband's intention is to punish his wife for her insulting language, even though he may not be imbecile. Where, on the other hand, the husband, by so replying, wishes to make the repudiation really depend on the condition that he is imbecile, the marriage remains intact if he is not. †And the same is the case where the husband has no special intention in saying this. A charge of imbecility implies that the individual in question has not the free disposition of his property; and that of being ignoble means, according to some, that he sets more store by the things of the world than by religion, which is practically the same as saying that with him cupidity has the better of morality and seemliness.

BOOK 38.—RETURN TO CONJUGAL UNION

A HUSBAND who has repudiated his wife in a revocable manner has a right to take her back so long as she is still in her period of legal retirement; that is to say, he may retract his words and take his wife back again, without for this purpose effecting a new marriage, provided only that in the mean time the marriage has not become illicit for any other reason. ††When a husband, after pronouncing a revocable repudiation, goes mad, it is for his curator to exercise the right of revocation, whenever he would have been permitted to contract a new marriage for the person legally incapable confided to his care.

A return to conjugal union is accomplished by the words, "I take you back," "I return to you," "I bring you back," †and even the words "render" and "retain" are admitted as explicit in this sense. †On the other hand, the expressions "give in marriage" and "marry" are implicit terms. However, in using the word "render" one should add "to me" or "to marriage with me," otherwise this verb is not sufficient. Moreover, in his second period Shafii rejected the doctrine that a return to conjugal union must be effected in the presence of witnesses; and though the revocation may be enunciated in implicit terms, the law does not permit it to be made dependent upon any condition. A return to conjugal union cannot be effected tacitly, e.g. by coition; but one must declare that one takes one's wife back.

A right to return of conjugal union exists only—

1. If a woman has really cohabited with her husband.
2. If the repudiation was not pronounced for a compensation.
3. If the repudiation is not the third.
4. If the period of legal retirement is not yet expired.
5. If cohabitation between the parties has not become prohibited for some other reason.
6. If the wife has not in the mean time abjured Islam.

Where the woman pleads that her period of legal retirement is already expired, the following cases must be distinguished:—

1. Where the period is calculated by months, and the husband denies that the period is expired, the presumption is in his favour, if he takes an oath.

2. †Where she claims that the period has expired by reason of an accouchement, and it is proved that she has menstrues and has not yet passed the age of child bearing, the presumption is in her favour, if she takes an oath, provided the accouchement has taken place within an admissible time. The shortest duration of a normal pregnancy is six months and two instants from the marriage ; but if the pregnancy terminates by an abortion, it is one hundred and twenty days and two instants in a case where the fœtus already has a human form, and eighty days and two instants if the fœtus consists merely of a piece of shapeless flesh.

3. Where she pleads expiry of her period of legal retirement, on the ground that the three periods of purity required are passed, she has a presumption in her favour provided she takes an oath, and provided also that :—

(a) A free woman, repudiated during one of her periods of purity does not allege for the three periods together a shorter time than thirty-two days and two instants ; nor, if repudiated during her menstrues, a shorter time than forty-seven days and one instant.

(b) A slave, repudiated in these circumstances, does not allege shorter times than sixteen days and two instants, or thirty-one days and one instant, respectively.

These rules must be observed both in a case where the alleged expiration is in conformity with a person's ordinary periods, and also where that person usually has shorter or longer periods.

Coition between a husband and wife revocably repudiated does not operate in prolonging the period of return to conjugal union ; though the woman must begin a new period of legal retirement from the date of that illicit act. For carnal intercourse with the wife is prohibited during her period of legal retirement ; though if the husband has intercourse with her in contravention of this rule, neither the punishment for the crime of fornication, nor any arbitrary punishment, is incurred ; unless the misdeed is committed with full knowledge of this. In all cases, however, such cohabitation involves payment of proportional dower, if a return to conjugal union does not ensue ; or even, according to our school, if it does.

A repudiation that admits of a return to conjugal union does not prevent a husband pronouncing an oath of continence, an injurious comparison, a new repudiation or an anathema, so long as the time of reconciliation has not expired. The right of succession of either party remains intact during this period.

The law also recognises the following presumptions, provided that the party in whose favour they are established confirms on oath the truth of his words :—

1. In favour of the wife ; if the husband alleges having insisted upon a return to conjugal union before the expiry of the term, though admitting that the period of legal retirement had expired before the time of the proceedings, while the woman denies that the husband exercised his right in time. The parties it is supposed are in agreement as to the date of expiry ; for example, if they agree that the period expired on Friday, but the husband alleges that there was a return to conjugal union on Thursday, while the wife says it was not till Saturday.

2. In favour of the husband ; if, in these circumstances, the parties agree as to the day upon which a return to conjugal union was demanded, but not as to the day of expiry of the period of legal retirement ; for example, if they agree that the husband demanded a return to conjugal union on Friday, alleging that the period expired on Saturday, while the wife says it expired on Thursday.

3. †In favour of the party whose assertion is impugned by an exception ; in a case where the husband maintains the priority of his demand, and the wife that of the expiry of her period of legal retirement, without either giving the exact date. There is a presumption in favour of the wife if she maintains that the time is expired, and the husband pleads in bar that he had already demanded a return to conjugal union ; and a presumption in favour of the husband if he maintains that he demanded a return to conjugal union before expiry of the period of legal retirement, and the wife pleads the illegality of the return, as it was only afterwards that the husband demanded it.

[If the parties are simultaneously cited to the court, so that it is not known which is the defendant, it is the wife who has the presumption in her favour upon taking oath.]

4. In favour of the husband, if he claims to have demanded a return to conjugal union, and the period of legal retirement is not yet expired at time of the hearing. Moreover, in all cases where the law admits a presumption in favour of the wife, she may retract it.

5. In favour of the wife, if the husband, after repudiating her once or twice claims to have had commerce with her during the marriage, and to be able in consequence to use his right of return to conjugal union, while the wife denies the coition, and consequently the right of return. Under these circumstances the husband has implicitly admitted that dower is due in virtue of coition, and if the wife has already taken possession of this dower, he cannot reclaim any part of it on the ground of the woman's denial of coition. On the other hand, if she has not taken possession, the wife can claim only half the dower.

BOOK 39.—OATH OF CONTINENCY

SECTION 1

AN oath of continency is an oath uttered by a husband who can legally repudiate his wife not to have carnal commerce with her, either for an indefinite period, or for some period exceeding three months. In his second period Shafii established the doctrine that this oath need not necessarily be expressed by invoking the name of God or one of his qualities but that it is sufficient to make a declaration, under penalty of repudiating a wife or enfranchising a slave in case of non-fulfilment ; or even that it is enough to say, for example, “ If I henceforth have any carnal commerce with you, I engage before God to accomplish a prayer, or a fast, or a supererogatory pilgrimage,” or “ to enfranchise such and such a slave.” An oath not to have carnal commerce with a woman with whom one is not bound in the bonds of matrimony is an ordinary oath and not an oath of continency, even where one may subsequently marry the woman.

An oath of continence is not permitted by our school : (1) where the wife is ratka or karna ; or (2) where the husband is emasculated.

The following words, “ I shall not have commerce with you for four months, and at the end of that period, by God, I shall not for another four months, and so on,” †do not constitute an oath of continence, because the original term does not exceed four months. By virtue of the same principle there can be no doubt that two perfectly distinct oaths of continence are implied in the words, “ By God, I shall have no commerce with you for five months, and upon the expiry of that time I shall have none for a year.” A man who declares he will abstain from his wife until after some event that will certainly not happen in four months, for instance the descent of Jesus Christ upon earth, utters a perfectly regular oath of continence ; but this is not so where there is reason to believe that the event will take place within four months, or where it is not certain that the event will occur at a more distant date. An oath of continence may be equally well enunciated in explicit or in implicit terms. By explicit terms are understood those that imply carnal commerce without any doubt, e.g. "introduction of the penis," "coition," "copulation," and in the case of a virgin "deflowering." On the other hand, Shafii, in his second period, considered the following to be implicit terms: "touching," "contact," "cohabitation," "going to see," "covering," "approaching," etc.

Where one says, "If I afterwards cohabit with you, my slave shall be enfranchised," the oath of continence is broken ipso facto at the moment of losing in any way the ownership of the slave. The husband who, after pronouncing an injurious comparison against his wife, says to her, "If I cohabit again with you my slave shall be enfranchised in consequence of my injurious comparison," thereby utters a legal oath of continence; and even if he has not really pronounced previously an injurious comparison the court should none the less hold that he has uttered both an injurious comparison and an oath of continence, though perhaps mentally the man had no intention of pronouncing the one or the other. For the court is not concerned with what one thinks, but with what one says. If, however, the husband pronounces the words cited without a previous injurious comparison, and adds, "If I did pronounce an injurious comparison," he does not undergo the consequences of his oath unless such comparison was really uttered. An oath of continence has its full legal effect where one uses the words, "If I still cohabit with you, my other wife so-and-so will be repudiated," and in that case the latter's repudiation is effected ipso facto by an ulterior cohabitation with the wife against whom the words were pronounced; while the consequences of the oath cease to exist upon this repudiation.

He who says to his four wives, "By God, I will not cohabit with you any more," has uttered an oath of continence that renders illicit his cohabitation with all four of them, but not his cohabitation in general. Thus if he subsequently cohabits with three of them, he must abstain from the fourth; while the death of one or more of the wives, previous to any subsequent cohabitation, annuls the oath ipso facto. Where, on the other hand, he uses the words, "I will not cohabit with any of you," this is an oath of continence that at once renders illicit cohabitation with any one of them. *The words, "I will cohabit with you only once until the end of the year," constitute an oath of continence only on condition that more than four months of the year remain after the one cohabitation of which the husband speaks.

SECTION 2

Where a husband utters an oath of continence, the wife cannot complain of it to the court until the expiry of the term of four months, the period of indulgence beginning from the time the oath was pronounced ; and, in the case of a woman revocably repudiated, from the moment the husband demands the return to conjugal union. If the marriage has been consummated the oath of continence is interrupted ipso facto by the apostasy of one of the parties during the period of indulgence ; and the fact of her returning from her errors before the end of her period of legal retirement, causes another such period to be incurred. On the other hand, temporary causes on the husband's part that prevent coition during marriage, without affecting its validity, do not affect either the length or the period of indulgence. Among these causes are cited fasting, ihram, sickness, and madness. Where, on the other hand, these temporary causes of prevention are on the part of the woman, they interrupt the course of the period of indulgence if they are physical, e.g. minority or sickness, and a new period begins as soon as the causes in question cease to exist. A few authorities require that the time elapsed before the existence of the cause of prevention should be taken into account ; consequently they consider the course of the period of indulgence not as interrupted, but as merely suspended. The legal causes of prevention on the woman's part have no influence upon the duration of the period of indulgence, causes among which should be mentioned menstrues, and supererogatory fasting ; †while, by way of exception, the obligatory fasting of the woman has the same effect as a purely physical cause.

An oath of continence is broken by coition during the period of indulgence ; and in default of coition during this period, the wife may summons her husband, in order that he may decide either to take her back or repudiate her. Her neglect to do this immediately does not prevent her subsequently exercising this right, so long as the term of the oath has not expired. Taking back the woman at her request is consummated only by a real penetration, not by voluptuous actions of any other kind. Consequently this right to summons her husband does not exist where the woman is unfit for coition from any cause, e.g. menstrues or sickness. In case of prevention on the husband's part, the woman must observe the two following distinctions :—

1. If the cause of prevention is purely physical, e.g. sickness, all she can insist upon is that her husband should declare himself to be ready to fulfil his conjugal duties as soon as he is capable of doing so.

2. If the cause of prevention arises from some legal provision, e.g. ihram, the wife, according to our school, can only ask for repudiation.

The wife has no right to summons her husband, if there has been any carnal commerce between them, even where such commerce does not amount to a regular coition. *Where the husband refuses to choose between the two alternative courses open to him, the court should pronounce a repudiation for him, i.e. one revocable repudiation, without allowing him a three days' respite. *Coition by order of the court does not excuse the husband from legal expiation for a broken oath.

BOOK 40.—INJURIOUS COMPARISON

SECTION 1

AN injurious comparison may legally be pronounced by any adult sane husband, even by the infidel subject of a Moslem prince, or by an emasculated person. A husband's drunkenness is no obstacle to the validity of an injurious comparison, nor to that of a repudiation.

The formulas by which the comparison may be explicitly announced are as follows :—

1. “ You will be for me,” or “ in regard to me,” or “ with me,” “ as the back of my mother.”

2. †† “ You will be as the back of my mother,” and nothing else.

3. “ Your body,” “ your breast,” or “ your person will be as the breast,” or “ the body of my mother,” or “ like all the parts of the body of my mother.”

4. * “ You will be to me like the hand,” “ the bosom,” or “ the chest of my mother ;” and even a comparison to the eye of one's mother must be considered to be valid, if the intention is to abuse one's wife ; but not if the intention is to say something agreeable to her, or if there be no particular intention.

5. * “ Your head,” “ your back,” or “ your hand will be to me as the back of my mother.”

6. A comparison to one's grandmother by these formulas is also injurious, and our school extends this principle to all relatives within the prohibited degrees, with whom relationship is not accidental, i.e. with whom the husband could not be bound in the bonds of matrimony at any period of his life. Thus a nurse or a daughter-in-law are not included among relatives within the prohibited degrees, so far as concerns an injurious comparison. A comparison made either to a strange woman, or to a repudiated wife, or to a sister-in-law, or to one's father, or to a woman against whom one has pronounced an anathema, is null and void.

An injurious comparison may be made conditionally. Consequently the words, “ If I pronounce an injurious comparison against my other wife, you also will be to me as the back of my mother,” result in the comparison pronounced against the other wife affecting both. Where, on the other hand, instead of speaking of one's wife, one says, "If I pronounce a comparison against so-and-so," i.e. a woman with whom one is not bound in the bonds of matrimony, "you," that is one's wife, "will be," etc., the comparison has no consequence as regards either, unless the husband's intention was to make a comparison of his wife depend upon his pronouncing the words of comparison against any other person. It is possible, however, that this conditional comparison may be accomplished later; i.e. by marrying the person in question and pronouncing a comparison against her. This rule applies not only to the case where one has spoken of a woman with whom one is not bound in the bonds of matrimony, but also to the case where one says expressly, "So-and-so who is not my wife." However, there are authorities who deny that the rule is applicable to this case; and the following expression, "If I pronounce an injurious comparison against so-and-so, though she is not my wife," is null and void, whatever the circumstances may be.

The words, "You are repudiated like the back of my mother," involve the following consequences, according to the husband's intention:—

1. They constitute merely a repudiation,
 - (a) if the husband had no definite intention in pronouncing them;
 - (b) if he intended to repudiate his wife;
 - (c) if he intended to pronounce merely an injurious comparison;
 - (d) if he intended as much the one as the other; or
 - (e) if he intended to pronounce an injurious comparison by the words, "You are repudiated," and a repudiation by the words, "Like the back of my mother."

2. They constitute a repudiation, and, when this is revocable, also an injurious comparison in addition, if the husband intended to repudiate his wife by the words, "You are repudiated," and to pronounce against her an injurious comparison by the words, "Like the back of my mother."

SECTION 2

After pronouncing an injurious comparison the husband owes an expiation, if he goes back upon his word and takes his wife again before being otherwise separated from her. For such renewal of cohabitation becomes impossible, and the comparison is ipso facto annulled, as soon as it is followed by any other sort of separation, e.g. death, dissolution of marriage on account of apostasy, or redhibitory defects, repudiation either irrevocable or revocable but not followed by a return to conjugal union, madness, †for the fact of becoming proprietor of one's wife, or of having pronounced an imprecation against her, at least where the accusation of the crime of fornication that led to the imprecation precedes the comparison. If the repudiation is followed by a return to conjugal union, our school considers this act as implying ipso facto a renewal of cohabitation, interrupted on account of the injurious comparison ; but where the marriage has been dissolved on account of the husband's apostasy, his return to the faith has not the same result according to our school. This return would merely permit the husband to resume the interrupted cohabitation. Expiation, once prescribed, remains obligatory, even where a renewal of cohabitation has been followed by another separation. And the husband must first acquit himself of the expiation as a debt towards God before resuming cohabitation, and even before permitting himself any voluptuous act. [*Such acts are lawful even before expiation.]

An injurious comparison may be pronounced to take effect by a particular time, and in that case the term must be duly observed ; though according to one jurist a comparison so limited has the effect of an unlimited comparison ; and according to another it is null and void.

†According to the doctrine of most authorities, resumption of cohabitation can only be effected by carnal commerce while the consequences of the comparison are still in force ; the mere fact of the woman living with her husband is not enough.

A husband who says to his four wives, " You are all to me as the back of my mother," thereby pronounces an injurious comparison against all four ; and if he takes them back as wives, he owes four times the prescribed expiation ; though, in his first period, Shafii maintained the opinion that in these circumstances the husband owes only a single expiation. But where the husband, without stopping, pronounces four times against his four wives the words, " You shall be to me as the back of my mother," there are four different comparisons, the first three of which are retracted. Where, on the other hand, he repeats the same words against one of his wives, it is necessary to distinguish :—

1. If the object of the repetition was to confirm his first words, in which case there is but one comparison ; and—

2. *If the object was to reiterate them, in which case each repetition involves a new comparison, though each implies the retraction of that immediately preceding it.

BOOK 41.—EXPIATION WITH REGARD TO INJURIOUS COMPARISON

EXPIATION is possible only where the husband intends to reconcile himself with God ; but it is not rigorously necessary that this intention should specially refer to the injurious comparison.

Expiation, in a case of injurious comparison, consists in the enfranchisement of a slave of either sex, a Moslem, with no physical infirmities that would prevent his working for a master or gaining a living. It is enough then to enfranchise a slave who is a minor, or bald, or lame so long as he is not wholly unable to walk, or blind of one eye, or deaf, or deprived of the sense of smell, or one that has lost his nose, his ears, or his toes ; but it is an insufficient expiation to enfranchise a slave affected with some chronic malady, or one that has lost a foot or a ring-finger, or a little finger, or two other fingers [or a thumb].

For the same reason it is insufficient to enfranchise a decrepit old man, a madman even with some rare intervals of lucidity, or a sick person whose recovery cannot be hoped for. †It would be considered sufficient, however, if the sick slave unexpectedly recovered. A person who owes expiation cannot purchase a slave whose degree of relationship would render enfranchisement obligatory with the object of freeing him by way of expiation ; neither can he by way of expiation bestow full liberty upon a woman enfranchised by reason of maternity, or upon a slave undergoing enfranchisement by contract, at least if the contract is valid. On the other hand, one may lawfully, by way of expiation, bestow full liberty upon a slave enfranchised by a will or conditionally ; though it must be understood that after pronouncing a conditional enfranchisement in favour of one's slave, one may not recur to this idea and enfranchise him under the same condition by way of expiation. There is, however, no objection to making an enfranchisement by way of expiation depend upon some condition. One may also legally enfranchise two slaves for two different expiations, in such a way that each of the expiations consists in the enfranchisement of half of the one slave and half of the other. It is even lawful to enfranchise the halves of two slaves for a single expiation ; †on condition, if the expiator is an insolvent debtor, that the other halves have already been enfranchised.

Expiation cannot consist in an enfranchisement for an indemnity, for this would be a bilateral contract, as much as a repudiation for compensation, or a divorce. However, as a general rule, enfranchisement is perfectly legal where a third party says to the master, "Bestow full freedom, for a thousand pieces of money, upon your slave already enfranchised by reason of maternity," and the master agrees to it. The person in question then owes the sum mentioned; †and this rule is applicable not only to the case of a slave enfranchised by reason of maternity, but also to any other enfranchisement. If the third party uses the words, "Enfranchise the slave for me for so much," the enfranchisement, though effected by the master, would be none the less considered by the law as coming from the speaker who consequently owes the sum mentioned. †This means that the latter is supposed to become the owner of the slave, as soon as the enfranchisement is pronounced by the master, after which the enfranchisement is at his charge.

Where the person owing expiation possesses in full property either a slave who can be enfranchised in this way or money necessary to buy one, and where he is not in actual need of one or the other for himself or his family, for maintenance, clothing, lodging, or furniture, he should enfranchise the slave he possesses or can purchase. But it is never necessary to sell one's immovable property or valuable securities for the purpose of obtaining money to buy a slave for an expiatory enfranchisement, when such sale would bring in no more than is necessary for living. †Nor is it necessary to sell for this purpose the house one lives in, or the slave who is an old servant of many years' service, even though their value may be greater than what may be called strictly necessary. The person owing expiation is not obliged to buy a slave in order to acquit himself of the expiation, if this can be done without a sacrifice on his part. *The solvency of the debtor is ascertained at the moment he should perform the expiation.

A person who is not able to enfranchise a slave by way of expiation should in place of this fast for two consecutive months of the lunar year to expiate his fault; †but the law does not require the intention not to interrupt the fast. If the fast is begun in the middle of a month, the remaining days are taken into account, and also a number of days in the third month equal to the number of days in the first month before the fast began. The continuity of the fast is interrupted if a day is allowed to pass without fasting, unless it has been physically impossible to perform this duty, or one has been ill; this is the doctrine maintained by Shafii in his second period. On the other hand, continuity is not interrupted by ceasing to fast on account of menstruation; or even, according to our school, by an attack of madness.

A person owing expiation being unable to fast, either from decrepitude or sickness, may instead of fasting nourish sixty indigent or poor people. Most authorities, however, do not admit sickness as a cause of exemption, except in the three following cases :—

1. Where one cannot reasonably expect to recover.
2. Where fasting would be particularly painful for the sick person.
3. Where the sick person is afraid of aggravating his malady by fasting, even though the actual malady in itself may not be of a nature to justify a deviation from the law.

The indigent and poor persons may not be infidels, nor Banu Hashim nor Banu el Mottalib; and the amount of nourishment due to each is a modd of provisions payable at the end of the annual fast. One may not give to the same indigent person a modd a day for sixty days instead of giving on one occasion sixty modds to sixty indigent persons, although the total quantity of modds is the same in the one case and the other. Nor may one give as provisions flour, or sawik, or bread, or provisions specially used at breakfast or supper.

BOOK 42.—IMPRECATION

SECTION 1

AN imprecation may be pronounced only where there has previously been an accusation of the crime of fornication, and where this crime cannot be proved in the manner prescribed by law.

This accusation can be made explicitly or implicitly. It is made explicitly by the expressions, "You have rendered yourself guilty of the crime of fornication," "O man," or "O woman, guilty of fornication," or by an accusation of having knowingly introduced the penis into the vagina of a woman with whom commerce is prohibited, or into the podex of a man or of a hermaphrodite. The words, "You withdrew to the mountain," and even "You withdrew," are implicit; †but the expression, "You rendered yourself guilty of the crime of fornication in the mountain," is explicit. The following incriminatory expressions, "O libertine," and "O man of notorious misconduct," pronounced against a man, or "O wicked woman," and "You like deserted spots" uttered against a woman, or to say to one's wife, "You were no longer a virgin at the time of our marriage," imply an accusation of the crime of fornication, unless the person using them declares he had no such intention. In this latter case the law presumes that he is speaking the truth, provided he takes an oath to that effect. The words, "O son of a public woman," or "As for me I never rendered myself guilty of the crime of fornication," constitute insinuations against the person with regard to whom they are pronounced, but not a formal accusation, even if pronounced with that intention. The words, "I have had prohibited carnal commerce with you," constitute both a confession and an accusation of the crime of fornication. Where a husband says to his wife, "O woman, guilty of the crime of fornication," and she replies, "I never committed fornication except with you," or "You are more guilty than I," there is on the part of the husband an explicit, and on the part of the wife an implicit accusation. Where, on the other hand, the reply is, "It is true I committed the crime of fornication, but you were more guilty in the matter than I," there is a confession on the wife's part combined with an explicit accusation on the husband's.

The expressions, "Your vagina," or "Your penis has committed the crime of fornication," constitute an accusation of this crime; and it is the same where the speaker, instead of naming the genital parts, says, "your hand," or "your eye;" except that our school considers these latter expressions as implicit. Our school also considers as implicit the phrases, "You are not mine," or "You are not my son," spoken against one's child; but the accusation, "You are not the son of so-and-so," pronounced against the child of another is explicit, unless it relates to a child whose father has already disavowed it by a previous imprecation.

An accusation of the crime of fornication constitutes, when its truth cannot be proved in the manner prescribed by law, the crime of defamation. The defamer must suffer definitely prescribed corporal punishment, if the accusation is made against any one who is mohsan; otherwise he incurs only an arbitrary correction. By mohsan is understood any adult sane free Moslem man or woman abstaining from any carnal commerce that would render him liable to the prescribed penalty for fornication. Our rite regards as incompatible with such abstinence an act of cohabitation with a slave to whom one is related within the prohibited degrees; †but this incompatibility must not be extended to commerce with one's wife during her period of legal retirement, that results from a cohabitation due to error, nor to that with a slave belonging to one's son, nor to that with a woman one has married without the assistance of a guardian. If a person unlawfully accused of the crime of fornication commits this crime later, there is no ground for accusing and punishing as a defamer the person who accused him; but no such impunity results from the former losing his quality of mohsan in some other way, e.g. by apostasy. When one has once indulged in forbidden carnal commerce, one may never again in all one's life become mohsan. The right to demand the punishment of a person guilty of defamation passes to the heirs of an injured party; but this right lapses upon forgiveness. †Each inheritor may exercise this right without the concurrence of the others; and forgiveness by one transfers his right to the others.

SECTION 2

A husband may with impunity accuse his wife of the crime of fornication, even though he may be unable to furnish legal proof, when he knows for certain she has been guilty of it, or when he has grave and well-founded suspicions upon the subject. Among these may be included the fact of its being of public notoriety that the woman is guilty of the crime, and that so-and-so is her accomplice, and that the guilty pair were surprised together in a desert place.

If a woman gives birth to a child of whom her husband knows for certain he is not the father, he should disavow it, if he does not want it to be considered his. The law admits such disavowal only where—

1. The husband has had no carnal intercourse with his wife during the whole period of the marriage.

2. The accouchement takes place less than six months after their first coition, or more than four years after the last.

A child born between the limits of six months and four years after the first coition may only be disavowed upon the double condition that not only a menstruation subsequent to the last coition must prove that the woman cannot have been rendered pregnant by her husband, †but also that the child is born more than six months after this purificatory menstruation. ††A husband may never base his disavowal upon an assertion that during copulation he withdrew soon enough not to fecundate his wife. If the crime of fornication, though proved, took place at a moment that admits of the child being either that of the husband or of the woman's accomplice, the law declares illegal, not only the disavowal, ††but also the accusation of the crime of fornication, and the imprecation.

SECTION 3

An imprecation consists in the solemn declaration four times repeated, "God is my witness that I am sincere in accusing this my wife of the crime of fornication." If this accusation is not pronounced in presence of the accused, the name and descent must be indicated so as to leave no uncertainty as to the person intended. The husband must also invoke upon himself "the malediction of God," if he has brought the accusation in bad faith. If the imprecation is to be accompanied by the disavowal of a child the husband should mention it at once, adding to each enunciation of the formula, "And in asserting that the child to which she has just given birth," or "this child," "is an illegitimate child, of whom I am not the father." The woman on her side may rebut the accusation by repeating four times, "God is my witness that my husband brings this accusation in bad faith," and after that invoking "the wrath of God" upon herself, if her husband is sincere in his accusation. †It is rigorously necessary to use these particular words; an oath may not be lawfully substituted for the phrase, "God is my witness," nor may the words "malediction" and “wrath” be interchanged, for inserted before the phrase, “God is my witness.” It is also rigorously necessary that the imprecation should take place only upon an order of the court, which must contain the formula to be pronounced, with the legal consequences that result from its pronouncement. The woman may not pronounce her formula before the husband has finished his. A mute may choose between signs clearly indicating the meaning, and its reduction to writing. The formula may also be pronounced in a language other than Arabic; except in the case of persons who can speak Arabic even though it may not be their mother tongue.

An imprecation should be rendered more solemn—

1. By the choice of the time when it is pronounced, i.e. Friday, at the close of afternoon prayer.

2. By the choice of the place where it is pronounced, i.e. the most noteworthy spot in the town. Thus at Mecca an imprecation is uttered between the corner of the Kaba containing the “black stone,” and the Makam Ibrahim; at Medina close to the pulpit in the sacred Mosque; at Jerusalem near the Sakhra; and in other cities near the pulpit in the great mosque. It is understood of course that a woman who is impure by reason of menstruation must pronounce her formula at the door of the building. Infidel subjects of a Moslem prince pronounce the imprecation in their churches or synagogues, and a fire-worshipper may even pronounce it in his temple; but an idolator may not lawfully pronounce it in a temple of idols.

3. By the number of persons present; that is to say that an imprecation must be pronounced in the presence of at least four persons.

These three rules, however, are considered by our school as being merely precepts of the Sonna, and consequently not of rigorous observance. The Sonna also prescribes that the court should give the interested parties such advice as may seem expedient, especially when they are about to pronounce the decisive fifth phrase. The Sonna also requires that an imprecation should be uttered standing.

Though in general a husband cannot pronounce an imprecation unless he is legally capable of repudiating his wife, the act is still valid :—

1. If the husband, apostatised after cohabitation with his wife, accuses her of the crime of fornication, but returns to the faith after the end of her period of legal retirement, and then pronounces an imprecation.

2. If the husband, in the same circumstances, pronounces an imprecation immediately after the accusation, and subsequently returns to the faith, provided always that it is before the expiration of the period of legal retirement.

Where, on the other hand, the husband does not repent from his errors until after the expiration of the period of legal retirement, the fact that the marriage is ipso facto dissolved is an obstacle to the imprecation.

An imprecation pronounced by a husband has the following consequences :—

1. The parties are separated, and marriage between them is for ever forbidden, even though the husband subsequently retracts his accusations.

2. The husband is not punishable as a defamer, though unable to furnish the testimony legally required to prove his wife's crime.

3. The wife is punishable for the crime of fornication, unless she in her turn pronounces the imprecation in the terms already mentioned.

4. The child whose paternity is disavowed by the husband's imprecation is not recognised as his by law.

The disavowal is unnecessary, and the child ipso facto illegitimate if not only is the husband certain he is not its father, but this is manifest to every one by the nature of things ; for instance, if the mother gives birth to it within six months from the marriage contract, or if the mother was repudiated immediately after the contract, in both cases before the marriage was consummated, or if the marriage was effected when one of the parties was in the East and the other in the West. On the other hand, the child's death does not extinguish the right of disavowal. Shafi maintained, in his second period, that a disavowal should take place after no long interval, without prejudice, however, to its being effected at any time, on alleging some valid excuse for the delay. A husband may at his choice disavow a child of which his wife is pregnant either before or after her lying-in ; and if he excuses his delay in pronouncing his disavowal on the ground that the birth was concealed from him, the presumption is in his favour upon his taking an oath. This presumption, however, only exists where the husband was absent, or if present where the length of the delay is not incompatible with his ignorance. A husband to whom is spoken the following compliment, " May you have much pleasure from your child," or " God grant your son become a good man," and who replies, " Amen," or " Yes," may not subsequently disavow it ; but if, instead of making use of an expression implying avowal, the husband replies, " May God reward you," or " May God bless you," he is free afterwards to pronounce a disavowal. The possibility of furnishing legal proof of the crime of fornication is no obstacle to a husband's pronouncing an imprecation. And the woman's reply to her husband's imprecation according to the above-mentioned formula results in her not being liable to the definitely prescribed penalty for the crime of fornication, unless the husband produces the proof required by law.

SECTION 4

A husband may pronounce an imprecation not only in order to enjoy all the legal advantages which result from it ; but also with one of the following special intentions :—

1. In order to disavow a child, even though his wife may have already pardoned his defamation, and the marriage been dissolved in some other manner.

2. In order to escape the definitely prescribed penalty for defamation, even though the marriage may have been already dissolved in some other manner, and there is no child to disavow.

3. In order to escape a discretional punishment for defamation, where particular circumstances rendered him not liable to the definitely prescribed penalty.

In any case an imprecation is never an excuse where it is a matter of defamation contrary to common-sense and manifestly false ; and in a case of this sort the court is justified in inflicting upon the defamer a discretional punishment for his moral amelioration. Among such groundless defamations may be mentioned that of a girl still a minor and incapable of coition.

An imprecation cannot take place :—

1. If the woman is not pregnant as a result of the crime of which her husband accuses her, and also—

(a) She pardons the defamation pronounced.

(b) The husband can furnish the proof required by law that she has been guilty of the crime of fornication.

(c) The wife's crime is proved by her own avowal.

2. If the woman renounces her right to proceed against her husband before the court.

3. If the woman goes mad in consequence of the defamation pronounced against her.

On the other hand, an imprecation is admissible, even where the wife has been irrevocably repudiated, or where the marriage has been dissolved by her death, in a case where her husband accuses her of the crime of fornication, without being able to furnish legal proof of it, and the defamation is pronounced in general or with reference to a fact subsequent to the dissolution of the marriage, always on condition that there is a child which the husband is obliged to disavow if he does not wish to be considered its father. But an imprecation can never be pronounced after the irrevocable dissolution of a marriage, on account of a fact that took place before the marriage, †whether there is or is not a child to disavow. In all cases the husband must begin by accusing his wife of the crime of fornication before having recourse to an imprecation ; and the law does not permit the husband to disavow one of two twin children and not the other ; he must either disavow both or accept their joint paternity without any reservation.

BOOK 43,—PERIOD OF LEGAL RETIREMENT

SECTION 1

A WOMAN'S legal retirement after the dissolution of her marriage is of two categories, the first being that prescribed in consequence of a separation inter vivos, whether by repudiation or by any other method of dissolution of marriage. This kind of legal retirement need not be observed except when there has been carnal commerce between the parties; for where it is proved that the womb is intact retirement is not necessary. This, at any rate, was the doctrine maintained by Shafi during his Egyptian period.

The legal retirement of a free woman who has menstrues and regular periods of purity, is composed of three periods of purity; but it is understood that a woman separated in one of her periods of purity concludes her retirement at the beginning of the third menstruation, while one separated during one of her menstruations becomes free only upon the commencement of the fourth, including that during which she was repudiated. One authority insists that twenty-four hours should elapse before it can be said that menstruation has definitely commenced; and there is disagreement on the point whether a woman, who, upon the dissolution of her marriage, has not yet had menstrues but begins to experience them shortly afterwards, should or should not be considered as separated during a period of purity. This controversy derives from the other one as to whether the expression, "period of purity," signifies merely a transition from purity to menstruation or whether it implies an interval of purity between two menstruations. *In this latter controversy the second of these two views is to be preferred. The legal retirement of a woman whose hæmorrhages are prolonged beyond the term of her menstrues is fixed so as to take into consideration her habitual periods of purity and menstruation; but a woman who has irregular fluxes should in all cases observe a legal retirement of three months, or, according to some authorities, a retirement lasting for three months after menstruation has ceased to be manifested. A woman enfranchised by reason of maternity, a woman undergoing enfranchisement by contract, and in general all slave women, should observe a retirement of two periods of purity. *If they become completely enfranchised during their retirement, they should terminate it, in the case of a revocable repudiation, as if they had been free since the separation ; but they should continue their retirement as if they were still slaves in the case of an irrevocable repudiation or any other kind of separation which, like divorce, has the same consequences as an irrevocable repudiation.

A free woman who has no menstrues, or has passed the age for them, should observe a retirement of three months, and, if the repudiation took place in the middle of a month, her retirement is not completed until after the appearance of two new moons plus the number of days wanting to complete thirty in the first month ; all without prejudice to her obligation to observe the prescribed periods of purity, should she before the end of this time become subject to menstruation. A slave woman, including a woman enfranchised by reason of maternity, and one undergoing enfranchisement by contract, should, under these circumstances, observe a retirement for one month and a half, when they have no menstrues or have them no longer ; though one authority prescribes them a retirement of two months, and another one of three. A woman whose menstrues are interrupted by some cause, such as suckling or sickness, should defer her retirement for three months until menstruation returns, or it appears evident that it will not do so ; in his second period Shafii even declared this rule to be applicable to cases where the interruption is not due to any known cause. In his first period our Imam maintained that a woman in such a case, where the cause is not known, should begin by waiting nine months to see whether menstruation is going to return, and after that accomplish the ordinary three months' retirement.

In his second period Shafii also expressed the opinion that if the woman has reasons to think menstruation will not return, and consequently observes a retirement of three months, and the menstruation does return before the expiry of the three months, she should complete her retirement counting by periods of purity. *This is also what she should do, even though menstruation does not reappear until after the expiry of the three months, if she has not meanwhile become engaged in the bonds of another marriage ; otherwise she is not obliged to observe a new period of retirement. As to whether a woman has good reason to think her menstruation will not return, this is a question which should be decided according to information obtained in each particular case from previous instances of near relatives both on the father's and mother's side ; though, according to one authority, recourse may be had to observations with regard to women in general. [*I recommend this latter doctrine.]

SECTION 2

The legal retirement of a woman who is pregnant at the moment of separation terminates upon her accouchement, on the double condition that—

1. The child's father is the woman's lawful husband ; whether the paternity is established by law, or whether it can merely be considered possible, e.g. in case of disavowal.

2. The accouchement is terminated. This rule applies equally to "twins," though in this case the retirement expires only upon the birth of the last born. By "twins" are understood children born at a less interval than six months. The birth of a still-born child counts as an ordinary accouchement ; but not an abortion, at least where the foetus consists merely in a lump of flesh without human form. On the other hand, if the foetus already has a human form, though distinguishable only by a mid-wife, the abortion counts as an ordinary accouchement. Our school goes even further and allows that a retirement is terminated by an abortion, where the foetus is merely a lump of flesh, but the midwives say it contains a principle of vitality.

A woman who begins by counting her retirement by periods of purity or by months, and perceives after its termination that she is pregnant, should still observe her period of retirement as if she had known of her pregnancy at the moment of the separation ; and even if she merely suspect her pregnancy without being sure of it, she cannot remarry before her suspicions are either dissipated or realised. Where, on the contrary, her suspicions arise only after the end of periods of purity or of months that constituted her period of legal retirement, the two following cases must be distinguished :—

1. If she has remarried, the second marriage remains intact, and the child has for father the new husband, unless born within six months after the contract.

2. If she has not remarried she should wait until her suspicions are dissipated or realised ; though a new marriage effected in contravention of this rule is not considered null by our school, unless the new husband has acted knowingly.

A child born four years after the irrevocable separation of the parties has the husband for father, unless the woman has remarried under the circumstances we have described ; but a child born later than this period is always illegitimate. In the case of a revocable repudiation, this period is counted from the moment of repudiation ; though, according to one authority, it should be calculated from the moment the period of legal retirement has expired. When a separated woman remarries after the end of her period of legal retirement, without suspecting her pregnancy, the fact that she has an accouchement within six months from the dissolution of the first marriage is enough to nullify the second ; but a child born later than this has for father the second husband.

A new marriage effected before the end of the period of legal retirement is illegal, and a child born during this marriage has for father the former husband, at least where the accouchement takes place within a period that renders this paternity alone admissible. The woman in question has then, by the fact of the accouchement, terminated the period of legal retirement necessary upon her separation from her former husband ; but after this must still observe an ordinary period of legal retirement for having cohabited with the second. On the other hand, if the time of the accouchement demonstrates the paternity of the second father the latter is regarded as the child's father, in spite of the illegality of the second marriage ; while, if the time of the accouchement admits equally well of the paternity of the one husband and of the other, the matter should be submitted to a physiognomist who should pronounce after examining the child, and whose decision carries with it the same consequences as if the paternity had been indicated by the time of the accouchement.

SECTION 3

Where a woman has to observe two periods of legal retirement of the same nature, resulting from her cohabitation with the same individual, one of the periods is included in the other. This is what takes place, for instance where a husband, after repudiating his wife revocably, indulges in coition with her before the expiration of her period. In this case it makes no difference—

1. Whether the retirement is calculated by periods of purity, or by months.

2. Whether coition has taken place knowingly or not.

In any case the final period of legal retirement begins from the last act of coition and involves ipso facto what remained to be accomplished of the retirement rendered necessary by the previous repudiation. And it is the same where the two periods of legal retirement are of a different kind ; for example, if one is calculated by periods of purity and the other is terminated by an accouchement. Then the accouchement determines the end of the final period of retirement, and the husband may exercise his right of return to conjugal union, until the accouchement has taken place. A small number of authorities do not admit this extension of the right of return to conjugal union where the pregnancy is the consequence of coition subsequent to the repudiation.

Where it is not the same individual whose successive cohabitation has rendered the two periods of legal retirement obligatory, the one is not included in the other. This happens, for instance—

1. Where a woman, repudiated by her husband, or who has committed cohabitation by error, indulges, before the expiration of her period of legal retirement, in coition with another whom she supposes to be her new husband, or who really is so but by virtue of an illegal marriage.

2. Where a woman who perceives that she has cohabited by error and who observes a legal period of retirement in consequence, is repudiated by her real husband before the expiration of that period.

When, in any of these cases, the woman is pregnant, she should always begin by observing the period of retirement rendered necessary by her pregnancy; and after her accouchement, she should observe that rendered necessary by the other cohabitation. If she is not pregnant, two cases must be distinguished.

1. The case mentioned above where the repudiation has priority over the coition committed by error. The woman should then first observe the legal period of retirement for repudiation, and afterwards begin the other period, all without prejudice to the right of return to conjugal union. If the husband exercises this right, the retirement for the repudiation ceases at the same time; but the woman should still accomplish the retirement on account of her coition with her supposed husband, before cohabiting with her true husband.

2. The case where the coition by error has the priority. In this case the retirement on account of the repudiation is first accomplished; though some authorities accord priority to the retirement on account of the coition by error.

SECTION 4

†Where a husband, after repudiating his wife irrevocably, continues to live with her during her period of legal retirement, counted either by periods of purity or by months, without, however, there being any carnal commerce between the parties, the retirement is carried out all the same, as if the separation had been complete. †Where, on the other hand, in these circumstances the repudiation is revocable, the retirement is not carried out until the parties cease to live together, though the right to return to conjugal union exists only during the prescribed periods of purity or months.

[The repudiation remains revocable as long as the period of legal retirement has not expired ; and the fact of a woman living with any other than her husband causes a retirement rendered necessary by repudiation to terminate ipso facto.]

Where a woman who has been repudiated revocably remarries during her period of legal retirement, believing she may lawfully do so, the retirement is interrupted from the consummation of the new marriage ; or, according to one authority, from the contract—an opinion which some elevate to the rank of a doctrine. So that, if the former husband exercises his right of return to conjugal union, and afterwards repudiates his wife a second time, she must begin her retirement again on account of the former repudiation. According, however, to the opinion of Shafii in his first period, the retirement is only suspended by the new marriage, so that the woman in these circumstances need only finish what is left over, provided that the return to the former union is not followed by coition. Where in these same circumstances the woman is rendered pregnant by her second husband and afterwards taken back by the first, the period of legal retirement does not terminate before the accouchement ; and if she is again repudiated by her first husband, she must begin a new period of retirement. According to a small number of authorities there is no need to recommence a new period of legal retirement after the accouchement, unless there has been subsequent cohabitation with the first husband. Finally, where the first husband has successively married again and repudiated the woman from whom he was previously divorced, her final period of legal retirement commences from the repudiation ; and this retirement includes that rendered necessary by the divorce.

SECTION 5

The second kind of legal retirement is that prescribed for a woman whose marriage is dissolved by the death of her husband. It admits of the following distinctions :—

1. Where the widow is not pregnant. In this case the period of legal retirement lasts for four months and ten days and nights for a free woman, and half of this time for a slave ; it matters little whether the marriage has been consummated or not. A widow who at the moment of her husband's decease was already repudiated revocably should accomplish her retirement as if her husband had died while the marriage was still intact ; but the widow who has been repudiated irrevocably should continue the retirement begun in consequence of the repudiation.

2. Where the widow is pregnant. She should then observe the legal period of retirement until after her accouchement, subject to the reservations already mentioned with regard to a pregnant woman whose marriage has been dissolved inter vivos. Consequently, a pregnant widow whose husband was a minor should observe a retirement as if she were not pregnant.

When a husband leaves two widows, of which one has been repudiated but it is not indicated which, they should both accomplish the legal period of retirement for widows that are not pregnant, supposing that there has been no consummation of their marriages. Where there has been consummation but the widows are not pregnant they need only observe the ordinary retirement of widows that are not pregnant, if the repudiation was revocable ; but if in these circumstances the revocation was irrevocable, then both must observe either the ordinary retirement of widows that are not pregnant or that of three periods of purity, whichever be the longer. It must be remembered that the legal retirement of widows commences from the husband's death, but periods of purity are calculated from the repudiation.

A wife whose husband is absent and who has heard no news of him may not contract another union unless certain that he is dead or that he has repudiated her. In his first period Shafii considered such a woman as able to remarry after her husband has been absent for four years and she has then observed a widow's retirement ; but during his stay in Egypt our Imam adopted the doctrine that even a judicial authorisation after four years' absence and a period of retirement are insufficient to render a remarriage unattackable. †But he conceded, during his second period, that a marriage effected in contravention of this rule is quite legal if it subsequently appears that the former husband was dead before its celebration.

A widow should be in mourning for her deceased husband during her period of legal retirement, but a woman revocably repudiated need not do so upon the dissolution of the marriage. On the other hand, this mourning is commendable in the case of a woman irrevocably separated inter vivos; one authority even maintains that it is de rigueur. A woman's mourning consists firstly in her abstaining from personal adornment in bright-coloured clothing even of a coarse material ; although some jurists permit her to wear material of which the threads are dyed first and woven afterwards, whatever the colour may be. A woman in mourning may legally wear all kinds of cloth, black or white, cotton, wool, linen, or silk. Bright coloured stuff is not forbidden if not worn for adornment. Secondly, a woman in mourning must wear no ornaments of gold or silver †or pearl. She must abstain from perfumes on the body, on the clothes, in food or in eye-wash, she must not paint her eyes with antimony, except in case of necessity, e.g. if she is blear-eyed ; nor must she use white-lead nor unguents nor henna, etc. On the other hand, there is no objection to her making use of an ornamented bed or other objects, or to taking care of her person by washing her head, cutting her nails, or removing the dirt from her skin or her clothes.

[She is also permitted to do her hair and go to the bath, provided this is not a pretext for some unlawful outgoing. A woman who does not observe mourning regarded as an obligatory act commits a sin, and should terminate her period of legal retirement in the way to be explained in the next section when speaking of a woman who quits her husband's house during her period of legal retirement. A woman who hears of her husband's death or her repudiation after her period of retirement is terminated, need not observe any further mourning. A woman may wear mourning not only for her husband but also for other near male relatives or for her master ; but this mourning may not exceed three days.]

SECTION 6

A woman who has been repudiated, even irrevocably, may insist upon her husband's giving her a suitable home during her period of legal retirement, unless she is rebellious to marital authority. *This right is accorded also to the widow, and, according to our school, to the wife whose marriage has been dissolved by reason of redhibitory defects, etc. The woman must spend her period of legal retirement in the house or in the apartment in which she was living at the moment of separation, and no one has a right to oblige her to remove elsewhere. Neither has she on her side the right to leave the house of her own accord.

[She may go out in the day-time, if the retirement is due to her husband's decease or to an irrevocable repudiation, provided these outings are for some lawful object, e.g. to buy provisions, thread, etc. She may even go out in the evening to visit one of her neighbours in order to spin together, or have a talk, etc. ; but she must return home to sleep. She has the right to remove only if she is afraid the house is going to fall down, or, in case of a flood, or if her life is in danger, or her neighbours are troublesome, or even if her presence is very disagreeable to them.]

A removal, authorised by the husband, results in the woman being obliged to accomplish her period of retirement in the house he assigns her, at least where the cause of the retirement already existed at the time of the removal. This is Shafii's personal opinion. On the other hand, she should return to the house originally occupied to accomplish her retirement there if she has removed without authorisation, or if the authorisation was given before the cause of the retirement existed, or after the removal took place. An authorisation given to a wife to take up her residence in another town has the same legal consequences as one given her to remove ; but if the authorisation to remove elsewhere referred only to a journey undertaken either to perform the pilgrimage or for commerce, and the cause of retirement occurred on the way, the woman may either return to her domicile and accomplish her retirement there, or continue her journey while observing the retirement. In the latter case, however, she must, after attaining the object of her journey and finishing her business, return home and remain in retirement for the number of days still to be observed. When a woman goes to a house other than her domicile, and her husband repudiates her on the ground that the removal was unauthorised, there is a legal presumption in favour of the husband's assertion, provided he takes an oath. Our school admits a similar presumption in the husband's favour where the woman maintains that he authorised her to remove, while he alleges that he merely allowed her to go out on some business. The dwellings of nomads, and even their tents, are subject to the same law as fixed abodes.

When the husband owns a house in which his wife can suitably accomplish her period of legal retirement, he should assign it to her for that purpose, and cannot sell it, even by a fixed date, unless his wife calculates her period of retirement by months, and consequently he knows the exact date by which the house will be again at his disposal. In this latter case a sale by a certain date is permitted, in the same way as the sale of a house rented to a third party ; only a few authorities consider such a sale as absolutely null under any circumstances. If a husband allots for the legal retirement of his wife a house lent him by another person, the woman should accept it ; but if the lender asks for it back before the end of the period of legal retirement, and will not lend it any longer, even for a rent, the husband should allot his wife another house. The question of a house rented by the husband, where the lease expires before the end of the retirement, must be decided in accordance with the same principles. If the wife consents to accomplish her retirement in a house belonging to her, she may insist upon the husband paying her a rent for the time she is in it with that object. If the conjugal domicile is of great value, the husband may assign another for his wife's retirement, provided it is a suitable one. On her side the woman may refuse to spend her retirement in any house, even if it be the conjugal domicile, if it is not a suitable house for her to live in.

A husband has no right to remain in the house where his wife is in retirement, nor even to enter it, unless with her consent, or if it is a house inhabited by her in common with—

1. One of her own relatives within the prohibited degrees, who has attained the age of discernment ; or
2. One of his female relatives within the prohibited degrees, who has attained the age of discernment ; or
3. Another wife of her husband, or his female slave.

A husband may even lodge his wife against her will in an apartment separated from the other parts of the house where he lodges another wife, at least, if the wife in retirement has with her some relative within the prohibited degrees, or if it is an apartment with separate kitchen and latrines. But in this case it is commendable that the doors between these apartments should be locked, and that there should be no other means of communication. An upper storey assigned for a wife's legal retirement is to be regarded in the same way, with reference to the lower storey, as an apartment separated from the rest of a house.

BOOK 44.—PERIOD OF WAITING OF A SLAVE

A WAITING for purification is obligatory in the two following cases :—

1. A man who becomes the owner of a female slave by purchase, succession, donation, right of booty, redhibition, judicial oath, cancellation by agreement, may not lawfully cohabit with her by virtue of right of ownership until she has accomplished her days of waiting, whether she be a virgin or not. This period of waiting must be observed even though the seller abstained from cohabiting with her for a sufficient period, or she was obtained from a minor, or a woman, or any other person incapable of coition. This period of waiting is also de rigueur where a female slave undergoing emancipation by contract is unable to fulfil the engagement entered into by her with her master, and is consequently reduced to slavery ; †and also where a female slave after abjuring Islam repents of her errors and so becomes again her master's property. On the other hand, the period of waiting is not observed if the right of cohabitation has been suspended by some accidental circumstance, e.g. fasting, religious retirement, or ihram ; though as to this last circumstance authorities are not agreed. Waiting is commendable where one purchases a slave with whom one is already engaged in the bonds of matrimony ; some jurists even declare it to be obligatory in this case ; but it is not necessary in a case where one purchases a slave already married or observing her period of legal retirement, as then cohabitation with her by virtue of ownership would be quite illicit. *But an obligation to observe a period of waiting revives at the dissolution of the marriage or the end of the period of retirement.

2. A female slave who has cohabited with her master, or a woman enfranchised by reason of maternity, may not marry until after observing a period of waiting from the moment when they cease to be obliged to share their master's bed, whether he has enfranchised them unrestrictedly or they have obtained their liberty upon his decease. †A woman enfranchised by reason of maternity should observe a period of waiting even where her master, freeing her unrestrictedly or dying, has not cohabited with her for a sufficient time.

[A female slave who after sharing her master's bed is freed by him and left untouched during her period of waiting, need not observe any further period of waiting, but may be at once given in marriage, as her condition offers no resemblance to that of a married slave.]

One may not give in marriage either a female slave with whom one has cohabited, nor one enfranchised by reason of maternity, until they have observed the prescribed period of waiting; †but if the master himself wishes to marry his female slave enfranchised by reason of maternity, he may do so at once. Nor is there any need for waiting where a slave enfranchised by reason of maternity, after having been given in marriage to another, obtains her full liberty, either by simple enfranchisement by her master, or by his death, for cohabitation with a slave so emancipated was already forbidden him.

The period of waiting for a female slave having ordinary menstruation is composed of a single period of purity, i.e. it terminates after a single regular menstruation. This at least was maintained by Shafii in his second period. As to a slave whose period of legal retirement is calculated by months the period of waiting consists of a single month; or, according to one authority, of three months; while a pregnant woman, reduced to slavery in war, and a pregnant slave with whom her master has ceased to cohabit, should observe a period of waiting until the accouchement. As to a purchased slave, pregnant by marriage, we have already found that she need not observe the ordinary period of waiting until after the dissolution of the marriage.

[†An accouchement resulting from the crime of fornication has the same consequence as one resulting from lawful cohabitation.]

If one becomes owner of a female slave whose period of waiting has expired between the date of the conveyance and the taking of possession, it may be taken into consideration where the ownership is acquired by inheritance †or purchase, but not in the case of a gift. Where one purchases a slave with whom cohabitation is forbidden on some personal account, e.g. if she be a fire-worshipper, it is not enough that she has her menses after her acquisition, nor that the cause of prevention ceases, e.g. by her conversion; she must observe her period of waiting before one may cohabit with her.

The period of waiting results in rendering unlawful any corporal enjoyment of the master with the slave in question; but a woman reduced to slavery in war, though she must abstain from coition with her new master, may permit herself other voluptuous acts, though some authorities maintain that her condition is identical with that of other slaves. Moreover, a simple declaration by a female slave that she has had her menses is sufficient to establish a presumption in favour of the truth of her words; a similar presumption exists in the master's favour if, after the slave refuses to give herself to him, he asserts that she has already told him her menstruation is over, and her period of waiting therefore terminated.

A female slave is not considered to have cohabited with her master in a legal sense unless coition has really taken place ; and the child born of this cohabitation has the master for his father, provided the accouchement takes place at a time admitting of such paternity. Our school, however, allows the master a right to disavow the child, while admitting the coition, if he can allege in favour of his statement the fact that after coition the slave observed her period of waiting ; but if in this case the slave denies the period of waiting the master must assert upon oath that the child is not his. Some jurists even insist that the master must also allege the facts from which it can be concluded that the period of waiting really took place. ††There is no need for the master's oath where he denies cohabiting with his slave who maintains her enfranchisement by reason of maternity, for she then has no presumption in her favour, even if the fact of the accouchement is proved.

BOOK 45.—RELATIONSHIP BY FOSTERAGE

SECTION 1

RELATIONSHIP by fosterage exists where a child has taken the breast of a living woman who has at least completed her ninth year, or even if it has received as nourishment †either milk extracted from the breasts of a woman afterwards deceased, or a woman's milk curdled or skimmed, or mixed with some other liquid *in whatever proportion and whether it is all or only partly drunk—this, at least, is the opinion of some authorities. According to our school relationship by fosterage is established not only by the fact of suckling, but also by the introduction of milk into a child's body by the mouth or by the nose ; *but there is no such relationship where the introduction is effected by means of a washing. The law requires, moreover, as conditions essential to the establishment of relationship by fosterage that the nursling is alive at the moment of taking the milk, that it is not yet two years old, and that it has taken or sucked the milk at least five times. Custom must determine what is meant by " times " in this respect, but in any case a nursling takes milk as many times as it ceases to suck, except where it leaves the breast out of caprice to begin again immediately afterwards, or leaves one breast to take the other. When one has five times given a nursling milk at one night from its nurse's breast, or vice versâ, it is considered to have sucked only once ; though according to one authority, it has then sucked the five required times. In cases where it is doubtful whether the child has or has not sucked five times, and in cases where it is doubtful whether it has done so before it is two years old, there is no relationship by fosterage. A single jurist is of the contrary opinion where there is a doubt as to the age ; and this opinion is even considered by others as an admitted doctrine.

A nurse is her nursling's foster-mother ; the man who has rendered her pregnant and is consequently the cause of the milk is regarded as its foster-father ; and the prohibition extends not only to the nursling but also to its progeny. †One is even considered a foster-father where one possesses either five slaves enfranchised by reason of maternity or four wives and one such slave, and the nursling has taken the breast of each but once. Marriage with any of these five persons is for ever forbidden to the nursling as they have all cohabited with his foster-father. *This is why no relationship by fosterage would exist in the case supposed if it were a question not of slaves enfranchised by reason of maternity but daughters or married sisters of the man in question. The ancestors of the nurse on either side become the nursling's ancestors by fosterage, and the nurse's children its foster brothers and sisters, without distinction between natural ancestors and children and those that are so by fosterage. Similarly the nurse's brothers and sisters are the nursling's maternal uncles and aunts by fosterage, and the father of the man who is the cause of the milk its foster grandfather, his brother its paternal uncle by fosterage, and so on.

A woman's milk is held ipso facto to be caused by the father of the child to which she gives birth, whether she is rendered pregnant by marriage or by error under the belief that cohabitation is lawful ; but not if the pregnancy is the consequence of an act of criminal fornication. The disavowal of a child implies a disavowal of the mother's milk. In the case where a married woman has by error had carnal commerce with another than her husband, and even in the case where a woman has cohabited by error with two different husbands, the milk is considered to be caused by the man whom the law declares to be the father of the child, even where the paternity has been declared, in default of other proof, by a physiognomist. Moreover, relationship by fosterage with the man who is the cause of the milk exists in spite of the previous dissolution of the nurse's marriage by the death of her husband or by her repudiation, however long ago the separation took place, and even if the milk has disappeared from her breast and then returned to it. It is only when a separated woman accepts a new husband and has a child by him that the swelling of her breasts must be attributed to him. Consequently, where a woman who has married again sees her breasts swell before her accouchement of a child of the second marriage it is to the previous husband that this state of the breasts must be attributed, even where a new pregnancy is manifested. One jurist, however, in these last circumstances attributes the appearance of the milk to the second husband, and another to both of them together.

If a man's mother, sister, or wife gives her breast to a very young girl who has been promised him in marriage, his marriage with the young girl is ipso facto dissolved, and he owes her half dower. He can, however, recover from the woman who without his knowledge has given her breast to the child half the proportional dower, or, according to one jurist, the whole proportional dower. If the breast has been given unconsciously, e.g. during sleep, the woman who has done so is not responsible, nor can the young girl claim anything. When one has two wives, one adult and one still a child, and the former's mother gives her breast to the latter, the marriage is ipso facto dissolved both with the one and with the other ; but there is no objection to taking one of them back as wife. Under these circumstances the above principles must be observed as to the young girl's dower and the responsibility of the mother-in-law ; and also to the adult wife's dower, provided she has not yet had commerce with her husband. Where, on the other hand, the husband has already cohabited with his adult wife and consequently owes her the whole dower, *he can recover from her mother what she would have been able to claim as proportional dower. Finally in the case where it is the daughter of one of his wives by a former marriage who has given her breast to the child-wife, commerce with the adult wife who is the nurse's mother is for ever forbidden the husband ; while commerce with the child-wife is prohibited only where there has been cohabitation between him and the mother of the nurse in question.

Where a man, after accepting a minor as his wife, repudiates her, and some woman gives her breast to the child, that woman becomes none the less the husband's mother-in-law by fosterage, and cohabitation with her is consequently forbidden him. Where a repudiated wife remarries with a child she afterwards nourishes with the milk of her previous marriage, commerce with her becomes for ever forbidden both to her former husband and to the child she has accepted as her future husband ; and, by virtue of the same principle, a slave emancipated by reason of maternity and given by her master as future wife to one of his young slaves, may no longer cohabit with the master nor with the slave if she gives the latter her breast, at least, if the master was the cause of the milk. Moreover, when a slave with whom her master has cohabited gives her breast to a young girl promised to the master as his future wife, he can have carnal commerce with neither, whether he or some other is the cause of the milk.

When a man has two wives, one an adult and the other still a minor, and the former gives her breast to the latter, not only is his marriage with the child-wife dissolved, as we have already seen, but even the nurse ceases to be his wife, and commerce with her is for ever forbidden him. Where a man has one adult wife and three child-wives, and the adult gives her breast to the others, coition with the adult wife is for ever forbidden the husband, but that with the child-wives is prohibited him only if he was the cause of the milk, or if he has at least cohabited with the wife who has become their nurse. Where, on the contrary, he has not yet cohabited with the adult wife the following distinctions should be made :—

1. If she nourishes the children at one and the same time, giving them suck the five required times. In this case the marriage with the young girls is dissolved, but the husband may subsequently marry each one separately.

2. If she nourishes them in a similar manner one after the other. In this case commerce with them is not forbidden for ever, but the marriage with the first and the third is dissolved because they have received the breast of their husband's wife, and the marriage with the second is dissolved as a consequence of the suckling of the third. One authority, however, considers the marriage of the second as remaining intact ; and the same divergence of opinion exists where there are two child-wives instead of three, suckled successively by a strange woman.

SECTION 3

Where one makes an admission that a certain person is one's daughter, sister, or brother by fosterage, one's marriage with such person is forbidden. Where husband and wife declare that their marriage was effected in contravention of the prescriptions relating to fosterage, this declaration suffices to bring about their separation, and causes the woman to lose her right to fixed dower. In these circumstances she can only claim proportional dower, at any rate if the marriage has been consummated, for otherwise she can claim nothing. Even if the husband alone maintains that there exists between him and his wife some prohibited relationship by fosterage, the marriage is dissolved even though the wife denies this relationship ; but in this case she can insist upon payment of the full definite dower, if there has been cohabitation, and otherwise half. Where, on the other hand, the wife alleges relationship by fosterage and the husband denies it, the law presumes that he is speaking the truth, provided he takes an oath, and provided that the wife consented to the marriage ; †for if she was given in marriage without her consent, the presumption is in her favour. She can in this latter case claim proportional dower, if there has been cohabitation ; otherwise she can claim nothing.

Where an oath is tendered to the party that denies the relationship by fosterage it is enough for him to affirm that he knows nothing of it ; but when it is tendered to the party that asserts that relationship, he must positively affirm its existence. Relationship by fosterage is proved—

1. By the deposition of two male witnesses, or of one man and two women, or of four women.

2. By admission ; but it must be understood that an admission not made at the hearing must be proved by the deposition of two male witnesses.

The nurse herself is admissible as a witness to relationship by fosterage—at any rate where she has not taken a salary for her services. She may confine herself to affirming simply that a relationship by fosterage exists, for she may prove a fact personal to herself from which that relationship follows, e.g. her giving the breast to the child in question. †As to other witnesses, relationship by fosterage is not sufficiently established by a deposition to the effect that “there exists between the husband and wife a prohibited relationship by fosterage,” but the date must be mentioned, the number of times the nursling was given suck, and the fact that the milk penetrated into the body. This fact is the direct consequence of the circumstances that one has seen the child sucking, that the milk was introduced into the mouth and that the child swallowed it. It may also be established by indirect indications, e.g. that the child took the teat in its mouth, that the lips made a movement as if sucking, or that the throat moved either as if drinking the milk in gulps or as if swallowing it with a continuous movement, supposing it to be proved that the woman’s breasts were not dry.

BOOK 46.—MAINTENANCE

SECTION 1

A MAN who is quite solvent owes two modd of provisions a day to each of his wives, but a man who is insolvent owes only one, and a man of moderate means one and a half. A modd is equivalent to one hundred and seventy-three drahms and a third. [†It is equivalent to one hundred and seventy-one drahms and three-sevenths of a drahm.]

By “insolvent” is understood in this connection a man who has been admitted amongst those having right to the charity tax through poverty or indigence. A husband who has no such right is regarded as being of moderate means if he cannot give his wives two modd a day without ruining himself or without thus coming to have a claim to the charity tax. Where, on the contrary, his means permit him to give two modd without ruining himself, he is called quite solvent.

Provisions due as maintenance are such as form the principal nourishment of the majority of the inhabitants of the locality. [If there is no principal nourishment in general use one must give one's wives some suitable nourishment. Solvency, insolvency, or a condition of moderate means must be determined for each day at dawn.] One may give one's wives provisions either in grain †or in the state of flour or bread ; it being understood, however, that neither husband nor wife can be forced to give or to receive them except as grain, unless with their full consent. †The parties may also agree to substitute other objects for the provisions, provided only, according to our school, that the grains once given are not replaced by flour or bread of the same kind. †Moreover, a husband has no need to give provisions to a wife who comes and has her usual meals with him. [Where a wife is of limited intelligence the fact of her taking her meals with him does not free him from the obligation of giving her provisions, unless her curator consents to this.] Besides provisions properly so called, one must give one's wives the condiments in use in the locality, e.g. olive oil, butter, cheese, and dates, according to the season ; but the court when determining the quantity and quality of the condiments should observe a difference between a solvent and insolvent husband. As to meat, it is local custom that determines whether it need only be given by a husband who is quite solvent, or whether this obligation exists also for the insolvent husband ; condiments, on the other hand, are due by every husband, even though his wife receive no nourishment but bread.

A husband must not only supply his wife with necessary nourishment, but he must also give her—

1. Necessary clothing, that is to say, a chemise, a pair of drawers, a veil and a pair of sandals ; and to this must in winter be added a cotton jobba † for, if local custom requires it, a jobba of some other material, e.g. linen or silk.

2. Something to sit on, e.g. a carpet, a piece of felt or a mat ; † and a bed to lie on with a pillow, and in winter a blanket.

3. What is necessary for her toilet, e.g. a comb and pomade ; what she requires for washing her head ; litharge, etc., for removing the fetid odour of the body ; but not eye ointments, nor ingredients for dyeing, nor what only serves for beautifying the person.

4. Medicines, when she is sick, and doctor's and surgeon's fees. She may insist on having her ordinary nourishment during her illness, both the principal nourishment and the condiments.

5. † Money enough for the usual bath, as often as is customary, and also for the special bath prescribed after coition and accouchement ; but the husband is not bound to pay for the bath specially prescribed for menstruation and lascivious dreams, as these are impurities of which he is not the cause.

6. Utensils for eating, drinking, and preparing food, such as a pot, a basin, a vase, a jar, etc.

7. A suitable lodging ; of which the law does not require the husband to be the owner.

8. Necessary servants, at least where the wife is of a social position which does not permit her to dispense with this. The servant may be either a free woman, or a female slave of the husband, or one he has hired, or a free or slave woman brought for the purpose by the wife from her father's house, whom the husband undertakes to support. As to the duty of procuring a servant for one's wife, the law makes no distinction between a solvent and an insolvent husband, nor even between a free man and a slave. If the servant is a free woman or a slave woman whose services the husband has hired, he is liable merely for the wages agreed upon ; but if it is one of his own female slaves whom he has given his wife as servant, he owes her ordinary maintenance by virtue of his right of ownership. A servant brought by the wife from her father's house can claim from the husband the same nourishment as the wife, with the exception that she receives only one modd of provisions from an insolvent husband for one of moderate means, and one modd and a third from one quite solvent. Such a servant can also insist on the husband providing her with clothes and suitable condiments, but not what is required for her toilet. On the other hand, it is only in case of repulsive dirtiness, e.g. the presence of vermin, that the husband may take notice of the servant's toilet and insist upon her taking better care of her person, at his expense. A wife who in conformity with custom may dispense with a servant, may claim one all the same if necessary, e.g. in case of sickness either acute or chronic. A slave wife can never claim a servant in ordinary circumstances ; but in the case of a female slave of remarkable beauty jurists are not in agreement.

A wife must have the enjoyment of the premises she occupies ; but her husband need not transfer the ownership to her. On the other hand, what she receives for her maintenance becomes her own, in the case of things that are consumed by use, like provisions. She may also dispose of them as she pleases ; only if she imposes upon herself privations that affect her health, in order to make a profit out of what her husband gives her, has he the right to object. As to things that deteriorate but are not consumed by usage, such as clothes, household utensils, or a comb, these things also become the wife's property ; though some authorities maintain that the husband is merely bound to procure her the enjoyment of them. A wife may insist upon her husband's giving her new clothes twice a year, i.e. at the beginning of winter and the beginning of summer ; and where it is admitted that she becomes the owner of the things the husband is not bound to replace them in case of accidental loss. Where this doctrine is held, clothing given to a wife is not returned to the husband if she dies during the season for which such clothing was intended ; but she can claim the clothes or their value even later, if she does not receive them at the prescribed period.

SECTION 2

During his stay in Egypt Shafii adopted the doctrine that a wife's maintenance is obligatory only if she puts herself at her husband's disposition, and not in virtue of the contract of marriage. The husband has a presumption in favour of his assertions in any proceedings as to the putting of the wife at his disposition. Consequently, a husband owes his wife no maintenance so long as she refuses to come to him ; but owes it from the moment he hears she is willing to put herself at his disposition. If the husband is absent the court should send word to him that his wife wishes to come to him, through the court at the place where the husband is ; and the husband should then either return to receive her, or appoint an agent to do so and supply her with the prescribed maintenance. If he does neither within a reasonable time, the court may apply his property to the maintenance of his wife. As to a wife affected by madness, or one not yet adult, the curator or guardian should place her at her husband's disposition ; and this has the same consequence as when an adult or sane wife places herself at her husband's disposition.

A right to maintenance ceases if the wife is rebellious to marital authority ; even if it be merely her husband's touch which she refuses to permit without valid excuse. The law considers, among others, as valid excuses, giving a wife a right to refuse herself to her husband, an excessive development of the genital organ in the husband, or a malady of the wife that would be aggravated by coition. Leaving the conjugal domicile without first asking permission also constitutes a fact incompatible with a wife's submission to marital authority, unless the house is threatening to fall down. A journey undertaken with the husband's consent, either to accompany him, or in his interest, does not in any way interrupt his obligation to maintain his wife. Only when the journey is undertaken in the particular and exclusive interest of the wife is she unable to claim maintenance during her absence. †If a disobedient wife returns to her duty during her husband's absence on a journey, she cannot immediately re-enter into the enjoyment of her rights. She must plead her cause before the court, in order that it may communicate the fact to the husband in the manner already explained. A woman who, in the absence of her husband, quits the conjugal domicile, even without leave, to go and see her family, etc., does not lose her right to maintenance. An adult who marries a young girl in her minority is not bound to supply her with the prescribed maintenance ; but an adult woman married to a minor may claim this, since it is not her fault that the consummation of the marriage is deferred.

The entering into a state of ihram for the pilgrimage or the visit constitutes an act of disobedience on the part of the wife, if the husband has not authorised her to do so, and if he has not the right to break the ihram. Where he has this right the woman's conduct is not an act of disobedience, unless she quits the conjugal domicile. †In the latter case she is regarded as having undertaken a journey in her own interest, and must suffer all the consequences. †As to the wife whose husband has permitted her to undertake the ihram, she cannot claim ordinary maintenance from the moment of departure. The husband may object to his wife accomplishing a supererogatory fast, *and if she insists upon doing so in spite of his forbidding her, she is disobedient. †As to a fast which she is obliged to undertake late because the legal time is elapsed, the husband may object to his wife's keeping this as in the case of a supererogatory fast, provided that there is plenty of time ; but in no case can he forbid his wife accomplishing her obligatory daily prayers as soon as the legal hour has come. †And the same is the case as to those acts of devotion introduced by the Sonna, that are accomplished at fixed hours.

A woman revocably repudiated may claim during her period of legal retirement everything that was previously her due, excepting the expenses of her toilet. Where in these circumstances a woman is reputed to be pregnant and her husband consequently maintains her beyond the period of ordinary retirement, he may recover what she has unduly received, if the pregnancy appears never to have existed. On the other hand, a woman irrevocably separated, either by divorce, or by three repudiations, cannot claim maintenance, including clothing, during her period of legal retirement, unless she is pregnant, for in this latter case she can claim both on her own account ; or, according to one authority, by reason of the child she bears in her womb. Though we admit with the majority that she has this right on her own account, we cannot admit a right to maintenance of a woman who has become pregnant by the error of the husband who thought she was his wife, or who had really married her but in an illegal manner. [A woman whose marriage has been dissolved by her husband's decease can never claim maintenance during the period of her legal retirement out of the estate, even if she is pregnant.]

Maintenance during the period of legal retirement differs in no respect from maintenance during marriage ; though, according to some authorities, the former consists only of what is strictly necessary. A woman, however, cannot claim maintenance on account of pregnancy before the existence of the fœtus has been ascertained ; but in the latter case it must be accorded her day by day, or, according to others at the time of her accouchement. According to our school a woman's right to claim maintenance is not subject to limitation, i.e. her claim is receivable even after the expiration of the period of retirement.

When a husband during his marriage becomes so insolvent that he can no longer give the minimum maintenance prescribed, but his wife in spite of this continues to live with him, the maintenance becomes a debt due to her from him and exigible at any moment. *If she no longer can bear such an insolvent husband, she can at once demand the dissolution of the marriage, since her husband no longer fulfils his obligations; †but no such claim is admissible against a solvent husband refusing his wife the prescribed maintenance. In this latter case it matters little if the husband be present or absent. On the other hand, a claim for dissolution is admissible if the husband is present and solvent but his property is elsewhere, at a distance so great as to admit of prayer being abridged. If this is not the case the woman cannot obtain the dissolution of the marriage; but the court should then order the husband to send for the necessary money. A woman is not obliged to accept from another as a gift the maintenance owed her by her husband.

If a husband gains enough money by his work to maintain his wife, it may be admitted that he has sufficient substance to allow him to discharge his pecuniary obligations towards her. And a claim for dissolution of marriage on account of complete insolvency is not admissible unless the husband is incapable of supplying his wife even with the maintenance due from an insolvent husband in ordinary circumstances. A degree of complete insolvency is manifested where a husband is unable to give not only the provisions that constitute the principal nourishment, but also the clothing, the †condiments, or the habitation that the law requires. [†A claim for dissolution should be rejected if it is founded merely upon the fact that the husband is unable to supply condiments.]

*Where a husband is unable to pay dower, dissolution of marriage is admissible, if the claim is brought by the woman before cohabitation; but not where the marriage has been consummated; and, moreover, the court can pronounce dissolution only where insolvency has been duly established. Where this insolvency is proved the court must either pronounce dissolution of the marriage or authorise the wife to pronounce it herself. *Three days' respite must, however, first be allowed. Only one jurist admits that dissolution may be pronounced without allowing any respite to the husband. Where, with the majority, a respite of three days is insisted upon, the wife is free to leave on the morning of the fourth day, unless the husband then gives her maintenance for this day. Where for two whole days the wife has not received her maintenance and the husband gives it her only on the third day, and then omits to do so on the fourth, the days of omission are added together and the woman is free on the fifth. Only a few authors maintain that three consecutive days' omission is necessary before the respite expires. All agree that during the respite enjoyed by the husband the wife may quit the conjugal domicile to get necessary provisions, provided she returns at night.

A husband cannot oppose a demand for dissolution of marriage by alleging that his wife has consented to share his pecuniary embarrassments, or that the marriage was entered into by her with full knowledge of the circumstances, for she is not obliged to do without maintenance longer than she likes. Where, on the other hand, it is not the prescribed maintenance but the dower that the husband cannot pay, he may oppose a demand for dissolution of marriage by a plea in bar. A demand for dissolution of marriage cannot be brought by the guardian of a minor wife, nor by the curator of a mad woman, unless a distinction be made between incapacity to furnish maintenance and that to pay dower. A demand for dissolution may be made by a free wife or by a slave wife, but not by a master where the woman wishes to share her husband's lot. A master may only persuade his female slave to demand a dissolution of marriage indirectly, e.g. by informing her that he will not maintain her so long as she remains the wife of an insolvent husband, and that she must therefore choose between dissolution of marriage and starvation.

SECTION 4

Ancestors and descendants should maintain each other mutually without distinction of sex or religion, on the sole condition that the individual against whom the claim is brought, himself possesses more than is necessary for the maintenance of himself and his household. One should even if necessary sell one's property to acquit oneself of this obligation, as if to pay an ordinary debt ; †and in default of property that can be realised, one should, if able to do so, work for this purpose. Only the man who has or gains just what he requires in order to live is not bound to maintain his ancestors or descendants ; though he should even then admit them to his house and his table, in the case of—

1. A person who has nothing and through illness cannot work.
2. A minor or a madman.

In all other cases the duty of maintaining one's ancestors or descendants is rigorously obligatory ; though some authorities do not admit this principle, and others admit it only as to sustenance due to ascendants. [*These last-mentioned authorities are evidently right.]

Maintenance due to ancestors or descendants consists only in what is strictly necessary, and a claim for it is limited to the term for which it is due ; unless there is a judgment ordering the performance of this duty, or permitting the claimant to borrow in the case of the absence or the refusal of the opposite party.

A mother should nourish her child with the milk which is manifested immediately after parturition ; she should even continue to suckle it afterwards when no other nurse can be found but a foreign woman. Where, on the other hand, one can procure a nurse in the family, the mother is not obliged to give the child her breast, †and the child's father even has the right to oppose her performing this maternal duty. [†The husband's opposition is inadmissible ; this at least is the opinion of most authorities.] Where husband and wife agree that the suckling shall be done by the mother herself, she may require from him a reasonable but not exorbitant remuneration. *But he is not obliged to agree to this demand for reasonable remuneration on the part of his wife, if a foreign woman offers to nourish the child for nothing, or for some inferior remuneration.

Maintenance is due from all the descendants together, if there is no difference between them ; but if they are not equal under all respects †the obligation is incumbent on the nearest ; and in case of equality of degree of relationship, it exists only for that person who will be called to the succession. Another doctrine, however, tends to consider that a right to the succession constitutes primâ facie the basis of the obligation to maintain one's ancestors, while the degree of relationship is of secondary importance ; and besides this jurists are not agreed as to whether the heirs are jointly responsible for the nourishment, or only in proportion to their respective shares.

In the ascendant line a father is the first who should maintain his child ; and it is only in a secondary degree that the child can require maintenance from its mother ; only a few authors maintain that father and mother are equally responsible, at least towards an adult child. In default of father and mother, it is from one's nearest ancestors that one may claim nourishment, either those in the same line, or ancestors on the father's and on the mother's side. Some jurists, however, consider maintenance of descendants as a charge attached to the succession, while others consider it as a charge inhering to the right of guardianship or curatorship.

†A person who has both ancestors and descendants alive should first claim maintenance from the latter, without respect to the distance of degree of relationship. Where, on the other hand, one has several persons dependent upon one, one should first discharge one's duty towards one's wife, and then that towards one's nearest relative ; or, according to some authorities, towards the one who will be called to the succession ; or, according to others, to the one who would be called to the duty of guardian or curator towards oneself.

SECTION 5

By the education of a child is understood—

1. Its supervision for all those matters in which it could not act for itself.

2. The care given to it, and the cultivation of its mind.

The first of these occupations is more particularly a woman's duty. It is confided first of all to the mother and her female ancestors through women, in order of proximity. During his Egyptian period Shafi'i embraced the doctrine that, in default of a mother and her female ancestors, through women, the education goes to the father's mother and her female ancestors through women, and after that to the grandfather's mother and her female ancestors through women. In his first period, however, the Imam allowed priority to sisters, and even to maternal aunts, over all female ancestors on the father's side. In any case a sister has priority over a maternal aunt, and the latter over a niece. A niece has priority over a paternal aunt, a full sister over a half sister on either side, †a half sister on the father's side over a half sister on the mother's side, and an aunt who is half sister on the father's side of the father or mother over one who is half sister on the mother's side of the father or mother. †An incapacity to inherit, due to a male degree of relationship between two women, suffices also to exclude female ancestors from the function of education ; but incapacity to inherit is not a reason for the exclusion of other women whose degree of relationship would be no obstacle to marriage, e.g. a daughter of a maternal aunt. In default of women the education falls to the charge of all male inheritors within a prohibited degree, in the order in which they would be called to the succession, ††and secondarily it is confided to every male inheritor of a still more distant degree of relationship, such as the son of a paternal uncle. However, a young girl must never be confided to an inheritor with whom marriage is not prohibited and who shows a liking for her ; but if her education falls to his charge, he must confide her to the care of some reliable woman chosen by him. Male relatives, of whatever degree, who are not called to the succession, †are not called to the duty of education ; and in case of claims by male and female relatives, priority is accorded to the mother, then to the female ancestors through women, and lastly to the father ; while according to some authorities even a maternal aunt and a half sister on the mother's side have priority over him. In general the ascendant line has priority always over a collateral one ; where two persons are equally competent in this respect, priority belongs to the nearer ; †if they are of the same degree the woman has the priority ; and if there is no legal difference the matter should be decided by lot.

The education of a child can never be entrusted to—

1. A slave, a mad man or woman, or a person of notorious misconduct.
2. An infidel, if the child is a Moslem.
3. Its mother, if she has married again ; unless with its paternal uncle, cousin on the father's side, or son of half brother on the father's side.

††The education of a child implies also the duty of suckling it or having it suckled, if it is not yet weaned. Personal incapacity to undertake the duty of education ceases with its cause ; and so does incapacity due to a marriage or repudiation. In case of the mother's absence or incapacity, her mother is invested with all her rights.

The rules mentioned in the present section relate only to a child who has not yet reached the age of discernment. If the child has attained this age it may choose with which of its parents it prefers to stay after their separation, provided neither the father nor the mother are mad, infidel, a slave or of notorious misconduct, and provided the mother has not married again. In any of these cases the child must remain with the other parent. It has the right to choose, not only between its father and mother, but also between its mother and father's father in case of the predecease of its father, and also, if there is occasion for this, between its brother, father's brother and father on the one side, and its sister, half sister, or mother's sister on the other. Even if it has once chosen, there is no objection to its afterwards choosing the other parent ; and if a son chooses his father, this does not prejudice his right to go and visit his mother when he likes. But a daughter loses this right, when she has declared that she prefers to remain with her father instead of with her mother as she would naturally do. But the father may never prevent the mother coming to see her children of either sex, provided there is no more than one visit on one day. In case of sickness a mother has by preference the right of tending her child of either sex, and, if necessary, of having it taken to her house for that purpose, if the father refuses to allow her to go and stay at his house. A son who chooses his mother only remains with her for the night, but must pass the day with his father, in order that the latter may form his character, send him to school, and make him learn a trade. On the other hand, a daughter must in these circumstances remain with her mother, day and night, without prejudice to the father's right to come and see her as often as may be customary. When a child wants to live with its father and with its mother, the matter should be decided by lot ; and if it refuses to choose the mother has the preference as the person to whom the law entrusts the education in the first place. Only a few authors require that in this case the matter should be decided by lot. If one of the parents has to leave on a necessary journey, a child of either sex must remain with the other, until the return of the former ; but if the journey amounts to a change of domicile a father has a right to take his children with him, provided the place he is going to and the way there are safe. Some authorities also require that the new domicile must be at a distance permitting the abridgment of prayer.

In default of the father his agnates within the prohibited degrees are invested with his rights ; and so is the cousin on the father's side, in the case of a boy, though not in that of a girl. In the latter case the child must be intrusted to the cousin's daughter, if she lives with him.

SECTION 6

A master must give his slaves the nourishment and clothing of which they have need, even if the slave be blind or sickly, or one enfranchised by the terms of a will, or on account of maternity. Nourishment includes ordinary provisions given to slaves in that locality ; and the same with condiments. As to clothing, it is enough to give slaves merely what is sufficient to cover the shameful parts, but they must be clothed as local custom requires. The Sonna has also introduced the practice of giving them sound nourishment both in the principal food and in the condiments, and of supplying them with clothing suitable for the climate. A slave cannot afterwards claim damages for the maintenance his master has neglected to give him, but he should make a complaint at once to the court, which can proceed immediately to the sale of the master's property and apply the proceeds to the maintenance of the slave ; or, in default of any such property, may order the sale or even the enfranchisement of the slave.

A master may oblige his female slave to suckle a child to which she has given birth ; and even another's child, if she has more milk than is required to suckle her own. He may also oblige her, either to wean her child before the regular period of two years provided the weaning is not injurious to the nursling's health, or to continue suckling it after that term, provided this is not injurious to the health of the mother. It is only a free woman that has rights as to suckling and education which she can insist upon as against her husband. Thus, in case of marriage between free persons neither of the parties can cause the child to be weaned before the expiry of the prescribed period of two years, except with the other's consent ; and this can only be given on condition that the child's health does not suffer by it. On the other hand, either party may insist upon the child's being weaned at the time prescribed by the law ; while they may jointly agree to postpone this until after that term.

One may not exact from a slave any labour incompatible with his strength or aptitudes ; nor can he on his part oblige his master to excuse him from performing any suitable task. The law admits the validity of the mokharaja, i.e. an agreement between a master and his slave by which the latter may dispose of his labour for a daily or weekly wage to be paid to the former.

One is obliged to maintain one's domestic animals, by giving them necessary fodder and water, and if this duty is neglected the court may oblige the master either to sell the animal or suitably maintain it ; or kill it, at least if it is an animal that can be used as human food, otherwise the master has no choice between sale or maintenance. An animal must not be milked in such a way as to injure the young to which she has given birth ; but as to inanimate objects, such as an aqueduct or a house, the master may use or abuse them as he pleases, and no one can oblige him to see to their upkeep.

BOOK 47.—CRIMES AGAINST THE PERSON

CHAPTER I.—GENERAL PROVISIONS

SECTION 1

HOMICIDE is of three categories ; it may be premeditated, involuntary, or voluntary ; only premeditated homicide involves a penalty under the law of talion. Premeditation in homicide consists in the intention of attacking the person of a particular individual with a cutting, piercing, or blunt instrument, capable in ordinary circumstances of causing death. Where, on the other hand, there is no intention of committing a crime, or a crime against a particular individual, there is involuntary homicide, e.g. if one falls upon a person one knows to be underneath and kills that person, or if one wants to shoot at a tree and the projectile strikes some one. Voluntary homicide is intentionally attacking a particular individual with an instrument that under ordinary circumstances does not cause death, e.g. striking him with a whip or a stick. Thus premeditated homicide will include the act of introducing a needle into any part of the body if there ensues so painful a wound as to cause the death of the victim ; but it is only voluntary homicide where the prick is in some part of body where a wound is not mortal, and has left no visible trace, though death is caused. Other authorities, however, admit premeditation in these circumstances ; still others consider that such an act incurs no penalty at all, and all jurists agree in this where death has been caused by thrusting a needle, e.g., into the callosity of the heel, i.e. a place where there is no sensation.

The fact of having confined a person, and not only withheld necessary food and drink, but also prevented their being obtained by that person, so that death results, is premeditated homicide. It is understood that this confinement must have lasted long enough to be able in ordinary circumstances to cause death from inanition. It is only voluntary homicide if death occurs earlier than this, unless the victim had been deprived of food and drink before being confined, and the criminal was aware of this circumstance. In this case there is premeditated homicide all the same ; *but not where the criminal did not know that the person confined had already previously been deprived of food and drink.

The law of talion is applied not only to the immediate authors of a premeditated homicide, but also to the moral and distant authors. Thus, for example, if two witnesses by their testimony cause an innocent person to be condemned to death, and afterwards declare that they intentionally gave false evidence, they also should be put to death ; unless the representative of the person put to death declares that he knew the testimony was false, before the penalty had been pronounced.

A person who receives into his house a minor, or a madman, and offers him poisoned food, so that death results, incurs a penalty under the law of talion ; but where a sane adult tastes of a dish whose contents are unknown to him, the guilty person is simply liable for the price of blood, in consequence of his neglect to remove this dangerous dish. In this case there is only voluntary homicide ; though, according to one authority there is also premeditation and consequently the law of talion applies. On the other hand, another jurist has maintained that in this case there is no punishable crime, as the stranger takes the dish of his own accord. A similar controversy exists as to the nature of the act of poisoning dishes belonging to another, of which he is in the habit of partaking, and which he does in fact unsuspectingly eat, so that death ensues. One is still punishable under the law of talion though the injured person neglects to have a mortal wound one has given him attended to, at least if he dies in consequence.

Death caused by drowning admits of the following distinctions :—

1. Where the water into which the victim is thrown is so shallow that it cannot be considered likely to drown a man. If the victim rests lying on his side until he is drowned, this is not punishable, as it is the victim himself who has killed himself.

2. Where the water is so deep that escape is only possible by swimming, the following cases must be distinguished :—

- (a) it is premeditated homicide, if the victim cannot swim, or is prevented from doing so by being pinioned or by some chronic malady such as paralysis.

- (b) it is voluntary homicide if the victim is prevented from saving himself by swimming owing to some accidental circumstance, such as wind or waves ;

- (c) *the act is not a crime at all, and the guilty person is not even liable to the price of blood, if the victim could have saved himself, but voluntarily abstained from doing so.

Authorities are not agreed as to whether the act of throwing some one into the fire, admits of similar distinctions ; or whether this act should not always be regarded as premeditated homicide, where death has ensued.

When one kills a person whom another has seized, or throws him into a well which another has dug ; or when one throws him down from a height, and another waits underneath to cut him in two, there is no complicity ; and each individual is separately liable, under the law of talion, for killing, throwing down, or cutting in two the victim. *Where, on the other hand, one throws some one into the water in a place where under ordinary circumstances he could be drowned, but he is instead devoured by a fish, one is liable to the law of talion, though not the immediate cause of his death. If the water was not deep enough to drown the victim under ordinary circumstances, but he has nevertheless been devoured by a fish, the guilty person is not liable to punishment.

Premeditated homicide, committed under coercion by violence renders liable under the law of talion not only the person who exercised the coercion *but also the person who allowed himself to be intimidated ; for the law regards them as accomplices. In case of homicide that is not premeditated they should jointly pay the price of blood, if this is required ; and if one of them is not liable to the law of talion by reason of social superiority to the victim, the other must undergo it none the less. Only where the violence is irresistible, e.g. used by an adult to a minor, the former alone is amenable to the law of talion ; and this is admitted even by those authorities who in general allow that premeditation may exist in the case of a minor. Moreover, where one forces some one to shoot at a distant object one knows to be a man but the other thinks is game one incurs a penalty under the law of talion as the immediate cause ; but that other who has done the material act cannot be considered as an author of the homicide. The law of talion cannot be applied to any one where a hunter, obliged to shoot at game, by misfortune hits a man ; nor where some one, obliged to climb a tree, falls, causing death. In the latter case, however, there is voluntary homicide, and according to some jurists, it is premeditated. A person who forces some one to commit suicide is *not punishable under the law of talion ; nor, according to our school, if he kills some one who said to him, " Kill me, or I will kill you." In this latter case there is no ground either for a claim for the price of blood. On the other hand, where one person says to another, " Kill either Zaid or Amr, or I will kill you," there is no violence in the legal sense, and the person is punishable if he commits the homicide.

SECTION 2

Where two persons together attack and kill another, they are accomplices in premeditated homicide, and are both punishable under the law of talion. This rule applies first of all to the case where both criminals deal the victim an immediately mortal blow, e.g. if one cuts off his head, and the other cuts him in two ; but it is just the same if each deals him a blow that causes a grave but not immediately mortal wound, e.g. if each cuts off a limb. If one of two persons attacks another and leaves him for dead, i.e. unable to see or speak or communicate by signs, and the other gives him a wound that finishes him, the former alone is punishable under the law of talion, the other incurring only a correction at the discretion of the court. When, on the other hand, it is the former who merely deals the wound, and the second attacks the victim and leaves him for dead, the latter is considered guilty of premeditated homicide if the wound dealt by him is one immediately mortal, i.e. if he has cut off a wounded person's head. Under these circumstances the person who deals the first blow is punishable for that wound only, i.e. he is liable either under the law of talion or to a pecuniary penalty.

The premeditated homicide of a sick person at the point of death is punishable under the law of talion, although he has already lost consciousness.

SECTION 3

When one kills a Moslem in an enemy's country, under the belief that he is an infidel not subject to Moslem authority, one is liable neither to a penalty under the law of talion *nor to payment of the price of blood ; but when this act occurs in the territory of a believing ruler, the one or the other is applicable according to circumstances ; though one authority calls in question the applicability of the law of talion. On the other hand, our school admits a recourse to the law of talion in a case of premeditated homicide committed against some one designated as an apostate by public notoriety, or an infidel subject of a Moslem ruler, or a slave, or a reputed parricide, if it appears later that the person killed had not the legal character rendering inadmissible an application of the law of talion. It is in accordance with the same principles that a person is liable to the law of talion who strikes a sick person of whose dangerous state he was not aware, but who dies immediately, though in ordinary circumstances the blow would not have been mortal. This, however, is denied by some authorities.

To render applicable the law of talion it is legally necessary—

1. That the deceased was a Moslem, or an infidel enjoying our protection, on some ground or other. An infidel not subject to a Moslem ruler, and an apostate, are proscribed, and may be killed with impunity ; but the premeditated murder of a condemned criminal by any one other than the representative of the murdered man, the magistrate or the executioner is punishable like any other murder. As to a person guilty of the crime of fornication, if he is mohsan and consequently punishable with lapidation, his premeditated murder by an infidel subject of a Moslem prince involves an application of the law of talion ; †but this is not so if he is killed by a Moslem.

2. That the criminal is a sane adult. Drunkenness is not considered an excuse by our school. If the guilty person alleges as an excuse his minority or madness on the day of the crime, this assertion is presumed by law to be true, upon the double condition that the criminal takes an oath to that effect, and that his real age is not incompatible with his statement, or that his madness is of public notoriety. In a case where the guilty person declares in court that he has not yet attained his majority, his assertion is sufficient even though not on oath, provided a presumption is admitted in favour of the truth of his statement. An infidel not subject to Moslem authority is not liable to a penalty under the law of talion, as he is already proscribed by virtue of his belief ; but religion is not a cause of impunity for an apostate, nor for an infidel in any way under our protection.

3. That the criminal is not of a social position superior to that of the victim. Thus a Moslem cannot be put to death for killing an infidel, even though the latter may be the subject of a Moslem prince ; but an infidel who kills a Moslem or an infidel is liable to the law of talion, even though the two infidels are not of the same religion, or the criminal embraces the faith after committing the crime. This rule must also be observed in a case where the infidel in question, having merely wounded another, is immediately converted, and the victim dies of his wounds. But in both these cases the conversion of the criminal has this consequence that neither the Sovereign nor his delegate the judge can of their own initiative pronounce a penalty under the law of talion, but must wait until the representative of the victim claims its application. *An apostate is to be put to death for killing an infidel subject of a Moslem prince or another apostate ; but not an infidel subject of a Moslem prince for killing an apostate, nor a free man for killing a slave, even though the latter be partially enfranchised. A slave, a slave enfranchised by testament, a slave undergoing enfranchisement by contract, and a female slave enfranchised by reason of maternity, are all equal in this respect. But a slave enfranchised after killing another, or in the interval between the wounding and death of the victim, follows the rule as to the conversion of an infidel criminal ; while the death penalty is never applicable to a slave partially enfranchised who kills another, provided, according to some authorities, that he is free to a greater degree than his victim. By virtue of the same principles the law of talion is inapplicable to a premeditated homicide committed against a Moslem slave by a free infidel subject of a Moslem prince, or vice versâ; and also to an infanticide, i.e. a premeditated homicide against one's child or other descendant; but it is applicable to parricide, i.e. the premeditated murder of one's ancestor. The premeditated murder by one of two parties of the person whose paternity they dispute is punishable under the law of talion if the paternity is adjudged to the other party, even if this is done upon the expert testimony of a physiognomist, but not if the paternity is adjudged to the party who has committed the crime.

Where one of two brothers commits the premeditated murder of his father and the other of his mother, the following cases must be distinguished:—

1. If the two homicides are committed at the same time, each of the two criminals may claim in court the punishment of the other for killing an ancestor whom he represents; and which of the two is to bring the first accusation must be chosen by lot. When one of the guilty brothers has thus been put to death on the demand of the other, whether the latter has been so designated by lot, or whether he presented himself first of his own accord, it is the representative of the brother that has been executed who should demand an application of the death penalty against the other; at least where one admits that the faculty of representing the victim by virtue of the right of succession is lost as well by the fact of rightful as of unjust killing.

2. If the two homicides are committed one after the other, a case which again admits of two distinctions—

- (a) If the marriage between father and mother was dissolved before the first homicide, the first criminal must begin by demanding the execution of the other, after which the representative of the latter must demand the execution of the former, without any drawing of lots.

- (b) If the marriage between the father and the mother still existed intact at the time of the first homicide, it is only the brother who has just committed the second homicide who is put to death upon the demand of the other.

Where several individuals have concurred in the homicide of another they are all punishable under the law of talion, if it is applicable; but the representative of the victim may remit the capital punishment for some of the criminals, and content himself with the price of blood from them, in proportion to the number of criminals whose execution he has claimed. An accomplice in a case of homicide cannot be punished with death, if the principal acted without premeditation and committed only a voluntary or involuntary homicide; but the accomplice of a father in the premeditated murder of one of his children should be put to death in spite of the principal's impunity. Similarly, a slave who is the accomplice of a free man in the premeditated homicide of a slave, or an infidel subject of a Moslem prince who is the accomplice of a Moslem in the premeditated homicide of an infidel like himself, must none the less undergo the death penalty, though the free man and the Moslem are not liable to it, by reason of their respective personal qualities. *The same principle requires an application of the law of talion in the following cases of complicity :—

1. With an infidel not subject to Moslem authority, who has committed premeditated homicide, though we have just seen that a demand for an application of the law of talion cannot be brought against such infidel.

2. With an executioner or other person who carries out a sentence under the law of talion, or some definitely prescribed penalty, when this consists only in the loss of a bodily member or in a wound ; e.g. if a person gives the criminal another wound after he has suffered the penalty, which together with the first causes his death.

3. With a suicide, e.g. by giving a wound to some one who has already wounded himself intentionally, but who dies only because of receiving the second as well.

4. With a person on whose part the act constitutes only legitimate self-defence.

On the contrary, the law of talion is not applicable in the following cases :—

1. Where one gives the victim two wounds of which one is premeditated and the other involuntary, death resulting from the two combined.

2. Where one wounds an infidel not subject to Moslem authority or an apostate, who then becomes converted ; and after this one gives him another wound which in conjunction with the first is fatal.

3. Where one gives a wound that is not mortal to a person who applies to it an immediately fatal poison. Where the person in question has, in these circumstances, applied to the wound a substance that does not usually cause death, but appears to be fatal in this instance, the causer of the wound is guilty only of voluntary homicide. Where, however, the substance, though not in the category of immediately fatal poisons, ordinarily causes death in similar circumstances, and the victim knowingly applies it to the wound, the latter commits a suicide of which the causer of the wound is an accomplice. Other authorities, however, maintain that in this case there is only involuntary suicide.

†Where several persons give another cuts with the lash so that death is the consequence, though each stroke by itself is not mortal, the law of talion is applicable only if the attack is made by a joint agreement. This rule, however, is the subject of controversy. Where, on the other hand, a single person has successively killed several others, he should suffer the penalty of death for the first victim, and his estate is liable for the price of blood as regards the others. In the case of the pre-meditated homicide of several persons at once, it must first be decided by lot for which of the victims the criminal is to suffer death, after which his estate is liable for the price of blood of the others. [Where in these circumstances the criminal is put to death by the representative of one of the victims other than that one for whose homicide he ought to suffer death, it is a crime rendering that representative himself liable to the law of talion ; and the representative of the victim to whose homicide the law of talion applied, can claim the price of blood.]

SECTION 4

No responsibility is incurred by mortally wounding an infidel not subject to a Moslem prince, or an apostate, even though he should repent of his errors before death. This principle extends also to a master who mortally wounds his slave, and then frees him before his death. Others, however, do not admit impunity in these circumstances, but maintain that one is then liable for the price of blood. Where, on the other hand, one shoots at such infidel, or an apostate or one's own slave, after which the infidel or the apostate is converted, or one frees the slave, before the projectile hits him, our school exacts the price of blood on the lighter scale, for the killing of a free Moslem. This price of blood is exigible either from the criminal or from his aakila. Where one wounds an individual who abjures Islam before dying of the wound one is considered to have killed a proscribed person ; *but one is nevertheless liable for the wound inflicted, under the law of talion, and the nearest relative of the apostate should claim the application of the penalty. Only a few authorities consider that this is the duty of the Sovereign ; while if the nature of the wound does not admit of an application of the law of talion, but requires a pecuniary penalty, the criminal owes either an indemnity or the price of blood, whichever is the more advantageous. Some authorities insist in these circumstances upon the payment of an indemnity always ; others maintain that there is no punishable offence. Where one wounds a Moslem who thereupon abjures his faith but afterwards repents before dying of the wound, one is not punishable with death, unless, according to some authorities, the apostasy of the victim has lasted only a very short time. But one is always liable in these circumstances for the price of blood, or, according to one authority, to half the price of blood. When a Moslem wounds an infidel subject of one of our princes, and he embraces the faith after receiving the wound, or when a free man wounds another's slave who is enfranchised after being wounded, the victim's death in consequence of the wound does not render the criminal liable to the law of talion, but he owes the price of blood prescribed for the homicide of a free Moslem. In the case of an enfranchised slave this price of blood is payable to his former master in proportion to his value as a slave, and to his heirs for the remainder. If the slave's wound consists in the loss of a hand, and his master grants him his freedom before he dies in consequence of the wound, his master can claim either the price of blood due for the mutilation, or half the value of the slave, at the criminal's choice. One authority alone gives the criminal a choice between the price of blood and the full value of the slave. Where one man cuts off the hand of a slave whom his master thereupon frees, and two others then each give the slave a new wound, which combined with the loss of the hand cause the death of the victim, it is these two latter persons who should suffer the penalty under the law of talion, and not the one who cut off the hand.

SECTION 5

Punishment under the law of talion for the loss of one of the members of the body or for some other wound is regulated by the same principles as we have just explained relating to the application of the law of talion for homicide. Thus, for example, where several persons have concurred in the act of cutting off the victim's hand by placing a sabre upon his wrist and each giving it a blow so as to sever the hand from the arm, each must have his hand cut off under the law of talion.

Wounds on the head and face are of ten different kinds---

1. Harisa, i.e. if only the skin has been cut or scraped.
2. Damia, if blood has flowed.
3. Badia, if the flesh has been injured.
4. Mutalahima, if the flesh has been penetrated.
5. Simhak, if the membrane enters the flesh and the bone is injured.
6. Mudiha, if the bone has been uncovered.
7. Hashima, if the bone itself has been injured.
8. Munakkila, if the bone is broken, so that the fragments are separated.
9. Mamuma, if the membrane of the brain has been injured.
10. Damigha, if the brain is injured.

The law of talion is applicable only to wounds of the sixth category ; or, according to some authorities, to categories 2-6. As to other bodily wounds they involve an application of the law of talion where the bone is exposed, or where there has been mutilation of a part of the nose or of the ears without exposure of the bone. This penalty is also incurred by any one who cuts a member at a joint, even if this is at the beginning of a thigh or of an arm, at any rate where such an amputation can take place without wounding the interior of the body of the criminal. ††If this is impossible a mutilation under the law of talion cannot take place, for fear lest the punishment should exceed the crime. The law of talion applies also to a person who tears out an eye, or cuts off an ear, an eyelid, the nose, a lip, the tongue, the penis, the testicles, †the buttocks, †for the edges of the vagina. On the other hand, the law of talion does not apply to the breaking of a bone ; in this case it is enough to amputate the bone of the criminal at the nearest lower joint, and make him pay the fine, if the amputation is less serious than the hurt to the injured party. In the case of a wound under the category mudiha and also under the category hashima, the law of talion should be applied for the former, and a price of blood of five camels exacted for the latter. In the case of a wound under the category mudiha and also under munak kila, an application of the law of talion may be claimed for the former, and a price of blood of ten camels for the latter.

A person who may demand that the criminal's wrist be severed under the law of talion may not aggravate the penalty by exacting a separate amputation of each finger ; and if he has in this way exceeded his just due the court should inflict upon him a discretionary punishment, without, however, condemning him to pay any price of blood. †This punishment for an amputation of the fingers does not prevent an amputation of the criminal's hand.

Where the criminal breaks some one's bone in the upper part of the arm, and afterwards cuts the lower part, an amputation under the law of talion is effected only at the elbow, and a fine is also due for rendering useless the upper part of the arm. †The injured party may also content himself with the amputation of the criminal's wrist, together with the price of blood for the part of the arm comprised between the wrist and the place where the bone was broken.

A criminal who has caused some one a wound on the head under the category mudiha, in consequence of which the injured party loses his sight, should suffer a mudiha of the same kind under the law of talion ; and if the criminal then loses his sight the matter may be considered at an end. Otherwise he must suffer the loss of his sight in the most expeditious manner possible, e.g. by having a red-hot iron held close to his eyeballs. And the same procedure must be followed in a case where one of the parties has given the other a blow likely in ordinary circumstances to cause loss of sight, a blow which in fact does cause blindness. Hearing is subject to exactly the same principles as sight; and the loss of either of these faculties involves an application of the law of talion, even though it may be an indirect and not an immediate consequence of the wound. †The same principles regulate a case of loss of bodily strength, of taste, or of the sense of smell. On the other hand, where one has cut some one's finger, and the victim loses another in consequence of the wound, one is liable under the law of talion only for the finger one has cut, and not for the other lost as an indirect consequence of the wound.

CHAPTER II.—METHOD OF PUNISHMENT UNDER THE LAW OF TALION, AND THE PERSONS WHO CAN DEMAND ITS APPLICATION.

SECTION 1

THE left hand may not be amputated, by way of talion, in exchange for the right hand; nor the lower lip instead of the upper; nor vice versâ. Nor may the end of one finger be substituted for that of another; nor a member at one part of the body for a member at another. On the other hand, it is of no consequence if the member of the criminal to be amputated is thicker, longer, or stronger than that of the victim, whether such member be †or be not an organic member.

As to wounds of the category of the mudiha, i.e. the only ones that admit of an application of the law of talion, the length and width—but not the thickness—of the flesh and of the skin must be taken into consideration. If the mudiha extends to the entire surface of the skull, and the criminal's skull is smaller than that of the victim, it is enough to give him a similar wound extending to the entire surface of the skull, but not affecting the face or the neck. The criminal then owes in addition a pecuniary indemnity proportional to the greater gravity of the victim's wound. Where, on the other hand, the criminal's skull is the greater it is enough to give him a wound of the same extent as that of the victim, even though this does not affect the entire skull; ††and in this case the criminal may even indicate the part of the skull upon which he prefers to receive the wound. In the case of a mudiha that removes the scalp, this is applied to the criminal to the same extent, even though that part of the skull should be smaller than in the injured person, and that in consequence the wound inflicted by way of talion extends beyond the scalp. A person who may demand an application of the law of talion for a mudiha, and who exceeds the measure of the mudiha received, is liable himself under the law of talion for the excess. In a case where the injured party has involuntarily exceeded this measure, and also where the criminal is contented with a pecuniary penalty for the injury wrongly suffered by him, the injured party owes him the indemnity prescribed for the wound as a whole ; though some authorities consider that the injured party is liable merely for an indemnity proportional to the gravity of the excessive punishment he has inflicted. Where several persons jointly inflict a mudiha upon another, they are each individually liable to a mudiha ; or, according to some authorities, to a single mudiha in common, so that the total does not exceed the injury suffered by the victim.

A sound hand or a foot is not to be cut off for a mutilated hand or foot, even with the criminal's consent ; but if one commits a contravention of this rule, one is not liable under the law of talion, but only for the price of blood. Should, however, the criminal die in consequence of such an abuse, the injured party is liable under the law of talion to the punishment for premeditated homicide. On the other hand, a mutilated hand or foot may be amputated for a sound hand or foot, unless experts declare that it will be impossible to stop the flow of blood. And the injured party must in any case be content with the amputation of the mutilated member, and cannot claim any fine in addition. A sound hand or foot may be amputated for a crooked or lame hand or foot ; and no attention need be paid to the colour of the nails of the member to be amputated. ††A place where a nail has disappeared is amputated for an entire nail, but not vice versa. The penis is subject to the same principles as the hand or the foot, so far as regards normal or mutilated state ; but it must be understood that the term "mutilated" applies to a penis that has lost its natural elasticity, but not to one that has merely lost its power of erection. Consequently the penis of a man in full enjoyment of his virile faculties may be amputated for that of a castrated or impotent person. Similarly, a sound nose is amputated for a nose that has lost the sense of smell, a sound ear for a deaf one ; but not a good eye for a blind eye, nor a sound tongue for a mute tongue.

The law of talion applies to the extraction but not to the breaking of a tooth. Nothing is due for the moment from a person who tears out a tooth from a child that still has its milk teeth, but if it subsequently appears when the child changes its teeth that the tooth in question is not replaced, and experts declare it to be due to a defect in the jaw occasioned by the wound, the criminal is liable to the law of talion, but never before the child comes of age. *In the case of a tooth torn out from a person who has already lost his milk teeth, an application of the law of talion does not depend upon the ascertainment of a new tooth in the alveole.

If one cuts off a person's sound hand, having oneself a hand with only four fingers, one must suffer the amputation of this incomplete hand, and pay in addition an indemnity for the injured party's other finger. Where, on the other hand, it is the injured party who lacked a finger, he cannot claim the amputation of the criminal's hand, but must limit his demand either to the price of blood of his four fingers and nothing else, or to the amputation of four fingers of the criminal, †plus a fine for the part of the hand where the fingers were joined to it, ‡all without prejudice to a fine of one-fifth of the price of blood for the hand, due in the one case and in the other. Where, on the other hand, one cuts some one's hand that has no fingers at all, one is not liable under the law of talion unless one has oneself a similar hand. Where one cuts a sound hand, but lacks five fingers oneself, one suffers amputation of the mutilated hand, and pays in addition the price of blood of the victim's five fingers. Where a criminal who has only two mutilated fingers cuts the victim's sound hand, the latter may choose between the amputation of the criminal's three remaining fingers, plus the price of blood for the two others he has lost, and the amputation of the criminal's hand and nothing more.

SECTION 2

*When one cuts in two a person enveloped in some piece of cloth, and then maintains it was a corpse, the legal presumption is in favour of the representative of the victim, provided he takes an oath, and asserts the victim was alive at the moment of the crime. According to our school this presumption exists in favour of the criminal, though not on oath, when, summoned to court for cutting a member of the body, he alleges that the member had a natural defect, at least in the case of a member usually visible. In any other case the presumption is inadmissible. †Where one cuts some one's two hands and then his two feet, and the victim dies, and one maintains that death was the consequence of the wounds, while the victim's representative alleges the contrary, either on the ground that there was a sufficient interval for the victim to be healed, or because death was due to some other cause, the representative enjoys the benefit of the legal presumption, and the criminal owes the price of blood, not for killing the victim, but for cutting the two hands and the two feet, that is to say, the double. The representative also enjoys this presumption if the criminal has cut only one of the victim's hands, and maintains that death is due to some other cause, while the representative maintains that it is due to the wound, and that consequently he may claim the price of blood for homicide and not for the wound. When one gives some one two wounds of the category mudiha, and then removes a portion of the skin between the two, in order to make them appear to be only one, and so to be liable for only one indemnity, one has a presumption in one's favour if one alleges that the new wound was made before the two others were healed, at least if this is possible. In this case the injured party may confirm on oath his statement that the new wound was caused after the healing of the others, and the criminal must pay two indemnities, or even three, according to some authorities.

SECTION 3

††The victim's heirs have a joint right to demand the punishment of a criminal guilty of homicide, and if there are among them absentees, minors, or lunatics, the prosecution must be adjourned until the first return, the second come of age, and the last recover their reason. The criminal must remain in prison until then; and he cannot claim to be released on bail. The heirs, however, should designate one of their number to conduct the prosecution in their name as representative of the victim; and if they cannot agree it must be decided by lot who is to discharge this duty. Where, under these circumstances, there is chosen by lot a person who is in some respect unsuitable to perform the task satisfactorily, he should be replaced by a substitute. According to some authorities unsuitable persons should not be among those among whom the lots are cast. *Moreover, where, in contravention of this principle, one of the heirs presents himself of his own accord and proceeds to the application of the death penalty after obtaining the necessary authorisation, he does not himself become liable under the law of talion, and his coinheritors may still claim their share of the price of blood in the criminal's estate. Only one jurist maintains that it is the inheritor who has thus overstepped the limits of his authority who owes them this indemnity. If the heirs had already pardoned the criminal the inheritor who on his own initiative has carried on a prosecution and applied the capital punishment, is himself punishable with death under the law of talion. This rule, however, is limited by some authorities to the case where the inheritor in question, though knowing the others had pardoned the criminal, still proceeded to the application of the penalty in spite of the prohibition of the court.

Punishment under the law of talion may be carried out only after the authorisation of the Sovereign or of his deputy. An injured party or his representative who acts on his own initiative is liable to punishment at the discretion of the court. In any case the claimant is authorised personally to apply the penalty only when that penalty is death. In the case of all other punishments under the law of talion, such as the amputation of a bodily member, etc., it is the official executioner who must be charged with the duty of carrying them out. The penalty of death must be carried out in the manner ordered by the judgment. Thus a person who has been authorised to cut off the criminal's head, and who intentionally strikes him in another part of the body not indicated in the judgment, is liable to punishment at the discretion of the court, though his right to execute the judgment remains in its entirety. Where, on the other hand, this person declares that he erroneously struck the criminal in a place not indicated by the judgment, and the circumstances admit of the truth of this assertion, the court should transfer the execution of the judgment to some one else, without pronouncing any punishment. ††The hire of the executioner is defrayed by the condemned person.

A penalty under the law of talion must be executed no long time after the condemnation, without paying any attention to whether one is in the sacred territory of Mecca, or whether it is hot or cold, or whether the condemned person is sick. A death penalty or amputation cannot be carried out immediately in the case of a pregnant woman. She must remain in prison not only until she has suckled her child with the first milk occurring after her accouchement, but also until another nurse has been found, and if necessary until the child is weaned, that is, until it is two years old. ††The simple declaration of a condemned woman that she is pregnant is sufficient, even in the absence of visible signs.

Where the victim has been killed by means of an instrument for cutting, or by strangulation, burning, drowning, or starving, etc., the criminal must be put to death in the same way; but if the homicide has been committed by means of magic, he must perish by the sword. †This is also the case where the criminal killed his victim by making him swallow wine, or by pederasty. If in case of homicide by starvation the criminal remains without food for the same number of days as his victim without death resulting, the execution must continue until death ensues. According to one authority, however, the criminal should then perish by the sword. A criminal who has killed his victim by the sword may demand to be executed in the same way. If the victim did not immediately succumb from the wound received, but did so later the representative may, at his choice either at once cut off the condemned person's head, or first give him the wound he gave his victim and then either cut his head off or leave him to die of the first wound. If the victim succumbed to an internal wound, or to the breaking of his upper arm, the criminal should have his head cut off. Only one author maintains that the criminal should then receive the same wound as the victim, *and that if he does not die he cannot be given another wound to finish him. For instance, if the victim's wound consists in the loss of a hand, and he succumbs to the consequences of this wound after amputation of the criminal's hand under the law of talion, the victim's representative may either cut off the criminal's head, or pardon him for half the price of blood for homicide. When, in these circumstances the victim's wound consists in the loss of both hands, the representative may none the less cut off the criminal's head after he has suffered under the law of talion for the two hands ; but if he pardons him he can claim nothing more.

No responsibility is incurred where the criminal dies from wounds given him under the law of talion. Thus, where there is the loss of a hand, nothing is due from either side, when both the injured party and the criminal die simultaneously of their wounds. And it is the same where the injured party dies before the criminal. †But if in these circumstances the criminal dies first, the injured party may still claim the half of the price of blood.

Where the criminal, told to present his right hand to be amputated under the law of talion, presents his left, in order to have it also cut off, nothing is due by the person who has obtained the judgment if he in fact cuts off that left hand ; and he may then proceed to the amputation of the right hand. †But when, in these same circumstances, the criminal declares that he presented the left hand in order to suffer with it the penalty under the law of talion, and the injured party is not content with this, the amputation of the criminal's right hand may be proceeded with, but the price of blood must be paid for the left hand amputated by mistake. One is not liable under the law of talion in this respect. The same rule is applicable where the criminal declares that he presented the left hand in the confusion of the moment, believing it to be the right, and the injured party says he also made the same mistake.

All premeditated crimes are punishable under the law of talion and subsidiarily by the price of blood ; or, according to one jurist, either by the one or the other. In any case, however, the representative of the victim has the right to pardon the criminal, i.e. to grant him a remission of the penalty under the law of talion and content himself with the price of blood, even though this may be against the criminal's wish. However, if it be admitted that the price of blood is only a subsidiary penalty in place of that under the law of talion, an unreserved remission of the latter has, according to our school, the effect of implying a remission of the price of blood ; while the remission of the price of blood alone is invalid and forms no obstacle to a subsequent remission of the penalty under the law of talion for this same price of blood. A remission of the penalty under the law of talion may take place for an indemnity of some other nature than the price of blood prescribed by law ; but in that case the criminal's consent is necessary, and in default of this the remission is considered to be ipso facto retracted, so that the law of talion may be applied. Where it is admitted that the law of talion and the price of blood are equally applicable in the first instance, and that consequently a remission of the price of blood alone is possible, a bankrupt may not grant this remission. On the other hand, in the system maintained by the majority of jurists a remission of the penalty under the law of talion by a bankrupt for the price of blood, has the effect of rendering this price of blood claimable, and the unreserved remission of the penalty under the law of talion implies the remission of the price of blood as we have just shown. Even the remission of the penalty under the law of talion on the part of a bankrupt, on the special condition that no pecuniary penalty should be incurred at all, is lawful, at least according to our school. A person legally incapable by reason of prodigality is, so far as regards the subject with which we are now occupied, in the same position as the bankrupt ; or, according to other authorities, as the minor. The remission of the penalty under the law of talion for an indemnity of a similar nature to but greater than the price of blood, e.g. of two hundred camels, is void, in the second system referred to, even though the criminal consents ; †but, according to the authorities who consider the price of blood as a subsidiary penalty, such a compromise would be lawful.

An adult whose intelligence is sufficiently developed to allow of his managing his property may legally ask some one to give him a wound. In such a case there is no crime on the part of the person who gives the wound ; nor even where the individual in question asks to be killed at once. One jurist, however, considers such person to be liable for the price of blood.

Remission either of the penalty under the law of talion or of the indemnity has for its consequence that the criminal owes nothing, either in case of homicide or in case of a wound. Even where death is the indirect consequence of a wound for which remission of the penalty has been granted, the remission prevents any application of the law of talion ; but as to the indemnity due for the wound it is only considered to be remitted as well, under these circumstances, where the remission is made—

1. By the terms of a legacy, e.g. if one says, “ I leave to the criminal the indemnity he owes me ” ; or

2. Where one uses the explicit terms “ remission,” “ abolition,” or “ pardon.” According to some authorities this also would be a legacy.

All these provisions relate only to the amount of the original indemnity, that prescribed for the wound ; consequently, in case of subsequent death from the wound, the criminal owes the difference between this indemnity and the price of blood for homicide. Only one jurist considers a remission granted to the person who inflicts a wound as implying also the price of blood prescribed for loss of life, in all cases where one specially stipulates that this remission relates not only to the crime itself but also to its consequences. †Where a wound inflicted upon a member of the body does not cause death, but only the loss of another member, the criminal still owes, in case of a remission of the penalty under the law of talion for the original wound, the price of blood for the second member of the body lost by the victim as an indirect consequence of the crime. When one has the right to claim a criminal’s execution because the wound he has inflicted upon the injured party has indirectly caused death, one cannot exact a penalty under the law of talion for that wound, after granting pardon for the loss of life. †But, on the other hand, a pardon granted for the wound does not imply a remission of the capital penalty ; *but the criminal in these circumstances may claim to be executed in the most merciful way, by having his head cut off. Where the penalty for the wound under the law of talion has been already suffered, and the injured party then grants the criminal a remission of what he might claim in case his life was lost in consequence of the wound, this remission is ipso facto null and void, if the wound does in reality cause death, unless it has been granted for a consideration.

If the principal, after telling an agent to see to the application of the law of talion, pardons the criminal ; but the agent in ignorance of this carries out his instructions, he is not liable under the law of talion for the blood that has been unnecessarily shed. *But he is personally liable for the price of blood, to the exclusion of his aakila, without proceeding against the principal.

Where a woman incurs a penalty under the law of talion for a wound, she is freed from liability by marrying the injured party ; but if the parties are separated before the consummation of the marriage the woman in question owes the half of the indemnity, or, according to one authority, the half of her proportional dower.

BOOK 48.—THE PRICE OF BLOOD

CHAPTER I.—GENERAL PROVISIONS

SECTION 1

THE price of blood for the homicide of a free Moslem is one hundred camels ; that is to say—

1. In a case of premeditated homicide—thirty hikka, thirty jazaa, and forty khalifa, or pregnant camels.

2. In a case of involuntary homicide—twenty bent-makhad, twenty bent-labun, twenty ibu-labun, twenty hikka, and twenty jazaa, or four-year-old camels.

Involuntary homicide committed—

1. Within the sacred territory of Mecca, or

2. In one of the sacred months, Zulkaida, Zul-Hejja, Muharram, or Rejab, or

3. Upon a relative within the prohibited degrees, is punishable with the price of blood on the heavier scale, prescribed for cases of premeditation.

The price of blood for involuntary homicide, even when aggravated by one of the three circumstances just mentioned, is a debt for which the aakila of the criminal are responsible ; but the price of blood for premeditated homicide can only be recovered from the criminal himself, and is due at any moment. As to voluntary homicide, this involves payment of the price of blood under the heavier scale by a certain time, and may be recovered from the aakila.

Camels that are sick or that have redhibitory defects cannot be given except with the consent of the injured party ; and the state of the khalifa should be ascertained by experts. †On the other hand, it is of no consequence whether the khalifa have attained their fifth year, before which period camels do not usually become pregnant. One may give camels of one's own herd, without regard to the particular species, provided they have the required qualities ; though some jurists maintain that one can only give camels of that locality. Where one is not a camel owner it is agreed that one may only give camels of the locality.

A nomad must give camels of his tribe. If there are no camels of the locality then camels of the nearest locality must be given. But it is forbidden to give camels without the required qualities or not of the necessary age ; or even to pay the value of the camels due, except by mutual consent. If there are absolutely no camels one can oblige the injured party to accept, instead of camels, a thousand dinar or twelve thousand drahms. Such was Shafii's original doctrine ; but during his stay in Egypt he changed his opinion, and maintained that in such a case one should substitute for the camels their equivalent in the money current in the locality. Finally in a case where the camels can be procured only in part, it is enough to give as many camels as one can, and the money value of those that are wanting.

A woman, or a hermaphrodite, is worth half a man, whether in a case of homicide or in a case of wounding. A Jew or a Christian is worth the third of a Moslem. A fire-worshipper, or even an idolater who has a safe conduct, is worth a fifth. According to our school individuals belonging to foreign nations who have not yet been invited to embrace the faith, and whose religion has not been expressly abolished by the Prophet, keep their personal status so far as concerns crimes committed against their person. Consequently, if one kills or wounds them, one must pay the price of blood prescribed by their respective religions. Where, however, the invitation to be converted to Islam has been made to them, or where their religion has been expressly abolished, crimes committed against their person incur payment of the price of blood of a fire-worshipper.

SECTION 2 (1)

As regards wounds on the head or face, the indemnities due for causing such wounds to a free Moslem are as follows :—

1. For a mudiha, five camels.
2. For a hashima, which is also a mudiha, ten camels ; otherwise five. According to some authorities a hashima which is not a mudiha, is punishable with a fine.
3. For a munakkila, fifteen camels.
4. For a mamuma, a third of the price of blood prescribed for homicide.

Where, of four individuals, one gives the victim a mudiha, another a hashima, a third a munakkila, and the fourth a mamuma, the three first each owe five camels, and the fourth must make up what is wanting to amount to a third of the price of blood for homicide. Wounds on the head and face, classified as less serious than a mudiha, necessitate an indemnity fixed according to their gravity in due proportion to a mudiha. Where this proportion cannot be ascertained such wounds involve a fine, just in the same way as all other "external" wounds that do not come under the law of talion. As to "internal" wounds, these are punishable with a third of the price of blood for homicide. By "internal wound" is understood any wound that penetrates into the cavities of the body, such as the stomach, the chest, the hollow at the top of the sternum, the sides and the hips. The indemnity due for a mudiha is always the same, whatever the extent may be; but two mudihās are counted as two distinct wounds if separated from each other by pieces of flesh and skin; or, according to some jurists, if separated either by pieces of flesh or by pieces of skin. And each mudiha constitutes a distinct wound if one has been intentionally and the other involuntarily given; or even if a mudiha extends both to the head and to the face. This rule, however, is rejected by some authorities. If one enlarges a mudiha one has given to the injured party ††this mudiha is still none the less a single wound; but there are two where one enlarges a mudiha given by a third party. Internal wounds also follow this rule †except that there are considered to be two wounds if the weapon enters the body on one side and comes out of it on the other. And the same is the case with a wound made by a two-pointed lance. The indemnity is due, even though the wound should close up, without distinction between a mudiha and an internal wound.

According to our school the price of blood prescribed for homicide is due to the full amount by a criminal who cuts off some one's two ears; but if they withered away, the offence is punishable by fine only.

The loss of an eye involves payment of half the price of blood prescribed for homicide, even in the case of a squint-eyed, short-sighted, or one-eyed person, or in the case of an eye covered with a white pellicle not affecting the sight. But if the sight is affected only a proportional indemnity is owing, unless the proportion cannot be ascertained, in which case the fine is due.

For the loss of each eyelid the criminal owes a quarter of the price of blood prescribed for homicide, even where the injured party is blind.

For a loss of the nose the full price of blood prescribed for homicide is due. For each side of the nose, or for the diaphragm, the price of blood is one-third, though according to others the loss of the diaphragm involves the fine, and that of the two sides of the nose the full price of blood.

Each lip is paid for by half the price of blood prescribed for homicide. †By "lip" is understood that part of the face comprised from right to

A loss of the tongue involves payment of the price of blood for homicide, even if the injured party spoke with difficulty, or if he was a stammerer, or if he had the defect of pronunciation called tothgha, or if he stuttered because still a child. However, as to little children, some authorities consider them to be mutes, as long as they give no signs of having the tongue sufficiently developed, such as making a movement of the tongue when crying or sucking. Now in the case of a mute person a loss of the tongue does not involve payment of the price of blood but a fine.

The loss of each tooth of a free Moslem is indemnified by five camels, whether in the case of a broken tooth of which no remains are visible in the mouth, but of which the root remains intact, or in the case of a tooth completely torn out. A tooth in excess of the ordinary number is paid for by a fine ; while a tooth which is a little shaky is considered as a tooth that is quite intact. Only where the tooth is so shaky that it is of no use is the fine prescribed instead of the price of blood ; but it is of no consequence whether a shaky tooth causes trouble in manducation. A person who tears out a milk tooth from a child, owes merely the prescribed indemnity, if it appears at the time of the second teething that the child has no other in the empty alveole owing to a lesion of the jaw. *Consequently nothing is due if the child dies before the time of the second teething ; but a person who tears out a permanent tooth is liable for payment of the indemnity even though another tooth has appeared in the injured place. Moreover, the tearing out of several teeth involves payment of the indemnity as many times as there are teeth torn out ; only one jurist admits the restriction that the indemnity for the whole set can never exceed the amount of the price of blood prescribed for homicide, except where there is more than one offence, and more than one criminal. Half the price of blood is due for each half of the jaw, without prejudice to the indemnity due for the teeth.

The loss of each hand involves half the price of blood prescribed for homicide, provided the wound is not inflicted above the wrist, for in that case one is also liable to a fine. Each finger is paid for by ten camels ; each finger joint by a third of this amount, and each joint of the thumb by the half. The feet follow the same rule.

The two teats of a woman involve the price of blood for homicide ; but if this wound has been suffered by a man, the offender is punishable with fine. One authority, however, does not admit this distinction, and insists upon the price of blood whatever may be the sex of the person wounded.

The price of blood for homicide is also due in a case of the removal of the two testicles or of the penis ; even though the wounded person should be incapable of coition through youth, age, or impotence. The price of blood for homicide is due for the loss of the two buttocks, or for that of the two sides of the vagina, as also for flaying the victim. Where it is ascertained that the victim's life was not imperilled by the flaying, the criminal is not punishable with death, even though the victim may have lost his life later, e.g. by decapitation at the hands of a third party.

One owes the price of blood for homicide if one causes some one to lose his reason, and if madness is the consequence of a wound itself involving an indemnity or a fine, the criminal should pay one or other in addition. One jurist, however, maintains that in such a case the greater sum includes the less. If the affair took place in some isolated spot, and the injured party declares he lost his reason in consequence of the wound so received, the price of blood is adjudged to him without its being necessary for him to take an oath, even though his declaration may be somewhat incoherent.

The price of blood for homicide is due in case of loss of hearing ; and half is due if this loss is limited to one ear. Other authorities, however, admit in the latter case only a price of blood proportional to the damage sustained. The loss of both ears and of the sense of hearing involves payment of twice the price of blood for homicide. Loss of hearing is proved by the oath of the injured party, unless circumstances indicate that his assertion is false, e.g. if he jumps up at some cry uttered while he was asleep or not thinking of the part he was playing. In a case of incomplete deafness the criminal owes a proportional price of blood if the degree of deafness can be ascertained, but otherwise a fine of which the court should fix the amount after examination. According to some jurists the degree of deafness can always be ascertained by comparison with the strength of hearing of a normal individual of the same age as the injured person. Thus the proportional degree of deafness even of a single ear may be ascertained by first closing the wounded ear and ascertaining the strength of hearing of that still uninjured, and then closing that one and testing the strength of hearing of the other.

For loss of sight in each eye the criminal owes the half of the price of blood for homicide ; and if the eye is torn out nothing more is due. Blindness is ascertained by experts ; or, if necessary, by suddenly putting close to the alleged insensible eye a scorpion or a red-hot iron, when, if the injured party remains motionless the truth of his words may be believed. Partial loss of sight follows the same rule as that already established for cases of partial deafness.

††Loss of smell involves payment of the price of blood for homicide.

Loss of the faculty of speaking also involves payment of the price of blood for homicide ; but a loss of the faculty of pronouncing certain letters is estimated proportionally, taking the Arabic alphabet as a basis, i.e. twenty-eight letters, though some authorities do not count labials and gutturals. In the case of a person who cannot pronounce certain letters of the alphabet, the calculation differs according to whether this defect is an original one, or the consequence of some malady sent from heaven or resulting from a lesion. Now, if the defect was original or the consequence of a malady the price of blood is due as if the defect did not exist ; though some authorities in such case admit only a proportional price of blood ; whereas, if the defect was the consequence of a lesion, our school insists upon a proportional price of blood. A loss of half the tongue as well as a loss of the faculty of pronouncing a quarter of the letters renders the criminal liable to a payment of half the price of blood. For a total loss of voice the law exacts payment of the full price of blood for homicide. If the tongue has at the same time lost its mobility, so as no longer to be able to articulate or vibrate, the criminal is liable for twice the price of blood ; but some authorities have called this last rule in question.

The sense of taste is equally rated upon the price of blood for homicide. By taste is understood normally the human faculty of distinguishing if a thing be sweet, sour, bitter, salt, or agreeable ; and a partial loss of the faculty of distinguishing one or several of these five qualities involves payment of a proportional price of blood. If this partial loss means that one can still imperfectly distinguish all five, the criminal owes a fine.

Payment of the price of blood for homicide is, however, incurred for causing the loss of :—

1. The power to masticate.
2. The power to emit sperm, on account of some lesion of the spine.
3. A woman's power to become pregnant.
4. Pleasurable feeling in the act of coition.

The price of blood is claimable also in a case where a husband or another tears the perineum in the act of copulation. Some authorities deduce the same consequence from a tearing by coition of the separation between the vagina and the urethra ; and coition is forbidden, even to the husband, if this act cannot be effected without causing the woman such a wound.

As to loss of virginity, the following cases must be distinguished :—

1. Where it is caused by an individual who has no right to do so. Here again the following distinctions must be made :—

(a) If it is caused in some other manner than by the introduction of the penis into the vagina an indemnity is necessary.

(b) If it is caused by an introduction of the penis, either by mutual error, or by violation, there is necessary a payment of the proportional dower which the girl could claim after being deflowered, as well as an indemnity for the offence. According to other authorities the girl can claim only the proportional dower that she was worth before her deflowerment.

2. Where it is caused by some one who has the right to do so. In this case there is nothing punishable, though according to some authorities an indemnity is due even in this case, whenever copulation has taken place otherwise than by the introduction of the penis into the vagina.

Loss of muscular force or power of walking involves payment of the price of blood for homicide ; and a fine is due for partial loss of one or the other. Lesion of the spine, involving not only loss of power to walk, but also of pleasurable feeling in the act of coition or of power to emit sperm, is compensated by twice the price of blood for homicide, a rule, however, that is not accepted by some jurists who think that the price of blood is due only once.

SECTION 2 (3)

The price of blood for the members of the body and for the bodily organs is cumulative ; but if the victim dies from his wounds the price of blood for homicide is due and nothing more. †This is so even if the criminal cuts off his victim's head before the wounds that he has made are healed, provided only that the wounds and the mortal blow are of the same nature, i.e. that one of the crimes has not been perpetrated with premeditation and the other involuntarily. There is also plurality in the price of blood, where the wounds and the mortal blow were not caused by the same person.

SECTION 3

A fine is due for wounds that are not rated by law. The amount is determined by the court in accordance with the seriousness of the case, and in due proportion to the price of blood due for homicide ; or, according to some jurists, with the price of blood due for the wounded member. The proportion to be observed in the application of the fine is the same as the diminution in the value of a slave of the same qualities as the victim due to a similar mutilation. But a fine for the wounding or partial loss of a bodily member should always be less than the legal indemnity prescribed for the total loss of that member; and where an application of the above rule would lead to another result, the court should reduce the fine to an amount that appears to it to be reasonable. In the case of a member such as the thigh, for which no indemnity has been prescribed, the fine should always be less than the price of blood for homicide. The penalty for a wound should be estimated after healing, and where it appears that the victim has not suffered any appreciable permanent lesion, the gravity of the lesion must be taken into consideration immediately before complete recovery. Other authorities, however, maintain that in such a case the court should fix a reasonable amount as the fine, while yet others think that in these circumstances there is no occasion for a fine. Wounds rated by the law, such as the mudiha, may be taken as a basis for fixing the amount of fines due for disfigurement; †but fines for wounds not so rated may never be taken as a basis for fixing the amount of others.

The price of blood for the homicide of a slave is the value of the slave. As to lesions suffered by a slave, the price of blood varies in proportion to his value, at any rate in the case of wounds not rated for a free man. In the case of wounds that are rated by law, the same proportion must be observed between the price of blood and the value of the slave as between the price of blood for a similar wound to a free man, and the price of blood for the homicide of a similar individual. A single authority in these circumstances allows the amount to be estimated according to the diminution in the specific value of the slave. *Cutting off a slave's penis and testicles is punishable with a fine amounting to twice the value of the slave. It is true that another doctrine tends to maintain that even in this case the criminal should indemnify the master for the diminution in the slave's value. Finally the offender owes nothing for wounds that do not appreciably diminish the value of the slave.

CHAPTER II.—OBLIGATION TO PAY THE PRICE OF BLOOD; THE AAKILA: AND EXPIATION

SECTION 1

WHEN a minor who has not yet attained the age of discernment is upon the edge of a terrace, and is frightened at the cry of a passer-by, and falls down and is killed, the passer by owes the price of blood on the higher scale, and the obligation to pay it falls also on the aakila. According to one authority the law of talion may even be applied in these circumstances. †Where, on the other hand, the minor is on the ground, or where it is an adult who is on the edge of the terrace, an unexpected cry causing a fatal fall does not involve a payment of the price of blood. Under the above circumstance, drawing a sword is the same as uttering a cry; while a minor who is almost an adult is the same as an adult in this respect, provided he has a lively intelligence. Where a person utters a cry as a warning of the presence of a wild beast, and thereby so frightens a minor on the edge of a terrace that he falls down and is killed, the price of blood on the lower scale is due by the aakila.

If the Sultan, or a judge, etc., sends for a pregnant woman accused of some offence, and frightens her so that she has an untimely birth, he is responsible for the abortion.

There is no punishable offence where a minor placed in a cave of wild beasts is devoured by them; provided, according to some authorities, that he could have saved himself. Nor is there any punishable offence where one pursues with a drawn sword a person who from fear throws himself into the water or into the fire or from the top of a terrace and so kills himself; but if the person so pursued does not throw himself down, but falls accidentally, either through blindness or in the dark, †or if the terrace gives way under him, the pursuer is responsible for the accident. Where a minor, sent to a swimming master to learn how to swim, is drowned, the master is responsible for the price of blood.

One is responsible for digging a well into which some one has fallen, if the digging was in itself illicit. Consequently a man who digs a well on his own ground or on uncultivated ground, is not responsible for the accidents which may result from it; but if he does so in the courtyard of his house, he is responsible for the fall of a person he may invite to such a spot which he knows to be dangerous. And besides this, a responsibility for accidents exists where a well has been dug—

1. On another's land without his knowledge.
2. On a piece of land of which one is only the co-proprietor.
3. On a narrow public way, so as to obstruct it. But where the road is not obstructed there is no responsibility for a person who has dug a well on the public roadway in the following cases:—

(a) If the Sovereign has approved it.

(b) *If the well is dug for the benefit of the public; for where the profit is merely personal the responsibility does exist.

In this matter a mosque is subject to the same rules as a public road.

One is responsible for accidents caused by the construction of a balcony opening upon a public road ; and even, according to the opinion of Shafii in his second period, for having given too much prominence to the pipes collecting the rainwater from the roofs, although this is an act permitted to each proprietor. If the balcony or the water-pipe partly rests upon a wall, and the protruding portion of the balcony or the pipe falls, the proprietor is entirely responsible for the accident ; †while he is only responsible for half of it, where the part which rests upon the wall and the protruding portion both fall. A wall that leans upon the side of a public road follows the same rule as a balcony ; but no responsibility is incurred for accidents caused by the fall of a wall constructed in vertical equilibrium that afterwards leans over. Other authorities, however, admit this principle only where the proprietor could not have prevented the accident by a demolition or reparation of the wall that threatened to fall down. †The responsibility never extends to accidents that are the remote consequences of the fall of the wall on the public road, e.g. if some passer-by stumbles against the débris and falls, or where this débris affects another's property. ††On the other hand, one is responsible for throwing into the road ordures, melon skins, or other slippery objects that cause a passer-by to fall.

In a case where two causes of accident coincide, it is the more immediate which determines the responsibility. Consequently where one of two persons digs a well and the other places a stone at the edge of it, the latter alone is responsible if another person stumbles against the stone and falls into the well, where both of the two have acted illegally. Where, on the other hand, the person who places the stone thereby commits no illegal act, traditional doctrine admits the responsibility of the person who dug the well. Where one person places a stone somewhere and two others follow his example and together place another stone, and a passer-by stumbles against them and falls, all three are responsible for the accident ; though some authorities maintain that the first individual is responsible for the half, and the two others jointly for the other half. He who stumbles against a stone deposited by another person and so pushes it before him, and another then stumbles against it, is responsible for this latter accident ; but where he stumbles on a big wide road against some one sitting or sleeping upon it, or merely stopping upon it, no responsibility is incurred by either party even if the accident causes the death of either or both. Where, on the other hand, the accident occurs upon a narrow road, our school allows that the death of the person sitting or asleep involves no responsibility in the person who has stumbled against him ; but considers that the former would be responsible for the death of the latter. In similar circumstances a moving person is responsible for an accident to a person stopping upon the road, but not vice versâ.

SECTION 2

Where two persons inadvertently stumble against each other, the aakila of both are mutually liable for half the price of blood on the lighter scale, if the accident has caused the death of both. If the affair is intentional on both sides the aakila are responsible for half the price of blood on the heavier scale; if intentional upon one side only, each should be condemned to pay the price of blood prescribed for its particular case. ††In such a collision both estates are charged with double expiation. Where the death of the two individuals is caused by the collision of their respective mounts the consequences are the same except that each estate is charged also with half the value of the other's mount, if the accident involved the death or mutilation of the animals. And similarly where there is a collision, not between two sane adults, but between two minors or two lunatics; though according to some jurists the guardian or the curator must personally guarantee the minor or lunatic committed to their charge from the consequences of the suit if he advised him to ride. Where a third party has caused a minor or a lunatic to ride, jurists unanimously consider him to be responsible for the prices of blood and injuries and damage due on both sides. A collision between two pregnant women resulting in a double abortion is punishable with the price of blood in the way we have explained, ††and four times the expiation in each case; while the aakila of the two parties owe each other half the ghorra prescribed for abortions. A collision between two slaves that results in the death of both constitutes no offence.

A collision between two ships is regulated by the principles set out with reference to riders, so far as concerns their captains, at any rate where ships and cargoes belong to them. If the ships are loaded with goods belonging to other persons, each captain owes the charterers half the damage sustained by each of them. Finally, in a case where neither the goods nor the ships belong to the captains, these latter are liable for half the value both of the ships and of the goods committed to their charge.

When a vessel is in danger of shipwreck everything in it may be cast into the sea, and this course is even obligatory if it appears that the lives of the crew or of the passengers depend upon it. An indemnity is due for goods so cast that belong to a third party, unless he consented. The words, "Throw out your goods on my account," or "Throw out your goods, I will be responsible," involve an obligation to indemnify the owner ; but our school does not recognise this obligation where one merely says, even in the midst of a storm, " Throw out your goods," and nothing more. The responsibility we are speaking of exists only where the request to throw away the goods is made through fear of sinking, and not if made when there is no danger ; and it is of no legal consequence whether the casting is or is not profitable to the person making it.

When the projectile from an engine of war rebounds and returns and kills one of the soldiers serving it, the price of blood is divided into as many portions as the original number of soldiers, and each of the dead man's comrades owes his share to the estate. If the victim did not belong to the working of the engine of war the fact constitutes an involuntary homicide, if it is proved that the projectile was not aimed at the victim ; but it becomes a premeditated homicide if the thing is knowingly pointed at the victim, and the projectile can strike at that distance in ordinary circumstances.

SECTION 3

The price of blood for voluntary or involuntary homicide constitutes a debt recoverable in the first instance from the offender, and subsidiarily from his aakila, i.e. his agnates in collateral line. Some authorities also consider a son to be amongst the aakila, provided he is at the same time grandson of his father's brother, as may occur where a homicide is committed by a woman who has married her cousin on the father's side. Responsibility falls first upon the nearest aakila, and, if all the sum due cannot be recovered from him, then from his nearest full agnate, or, according to Shafii's first doctrine, from his nearest agnates whether full or only on the father's side. After this it is the offender's patron who is responsible as aakila, then his agnates, then the patron's patron and his agnates. After this again the responsibility falls upon the patron of the offender's father, then upon his agnates, his patron and his agnates, and so on. The aakila of a woman are responsible for that woman's freed slave, and if there is more than one owner, they are jointly responsible for the total amount due ; whereas each agnate of a patron is responsible only for the obligation of his principal. *An enfranchised slave is never considered as being amongst the aakila of his patron.

In default of aakila, or if their contributions are insufficient, the State is responsible for a Moslem offender ; *and if for some reason or other the amount cannot be recovered from the State, the responsibility relapses entirely upon the offender himself.

The aakila should acquit themselves of their obligation within the space of three years, if the price of blood is for the homicide of a free Moslem, i.e. a third each year. The price of blood for the homicide of an infidel subject of a Moslem prince must be paid in one year ; and that for the homicide of a woman in two years, i.e. a third of the full price of blood the first year and a sixth the second. However, according to some jurists, the price of blood for such infidel and that for a woman must be paid for in three years. The aakila are responsible just the same *if the victim is a slave ; but whatever may have been the slave's value, the aakila are never obliged to pay each year more than a third of the ordinary price of blood. According to some other authorities, however, they must see that the total price of the slave is paid up within the three years. In case of a homicide committed upon two victims the two prices of blood must be paid within the three years like a single one ; but according to some authorities the debt need only be paid within six years. As for the price of blood for a wound or for the loss of a bodily member, one need not pay more each year than a third of the price of blood prescribed for homicide. Other authorities, however, maintain that this is a debt payable in entirety at the end of the first year. All the limits of time we have mentioned are calculated in case of homicide from the moment of the victim's death, and in case of other offences from the moment the crime is committed.

The decease of one of the aakila in the course of the year has for its consequence that his debt falls upon the others ; but no such responsibility ever attaches to a poor man, a slave, a minor, or a madman. A Moslem aakila is not responsible for an infidel offender, nor an infidel aakila for a Moslem offender ; *but a Jew may be responsible for a Christian offender, and vice versa. The responsibility of a rich aakila never exceeds half a dinar, nor that of a man of moderate means a quarter per annum ; or, according to others, for the three years. The state of the fortune of the debtor is ascertained at the end of each year ; while he who becomes insolvent in the course of the year owes nothing.

SECTION 4

The person of a slave may be seized in satisfaction of a debt due for an offence committed by him, but his master may, instead of abandoning the culpable slave to be put up to auction, ransom him either with his value or with the indemnity prescribed for a lesion, whichever is the more advantageous for him. In his first period Shaffi did not accept this doctrine, maintaining that the prescribed indemnity is due in any case, if the master wishes to avoid the seizure of the slave. *The money due for the offending slave is a material debt, and not an obligation for which he is personally responsible after being enfranchised. If the slave, after being ransomed by his master, is guilty of another offence, the master has again the choice between seizure and ransom; but if the second offence is committed before the payment of the first ransom the slave may be seized for the total of the two debts, unless his master ransoms him either with his value, or with the indemnities prescribed for the two crimes, whichever is the more advantageous for him. In these circumstances Shafii's first doctrine allowed only the ransom with the two indemnities. In the case of the enfranchisement or sale of the slave after the offence, and supposing that the validity of these acts depends upon the master's solvency, the latter can no longer abandon his slave, but is obliged to ransom him, in the manner already explained. And it is the same if the master kills the slave after the offence. According, however, to other authorities Shafii's first doctrine insisted even in these circumstances upon the prescribed indemnity; but the master owes nothing where the slave, after committing the offence, takes to flight or dies a natural or accidental death, unless the master previously opposes his seizure. If he opposes the seizure he implies an intention to ransom the slave, †and though in ordinary circumstances he may withdraw from a promise to ransom his slave and declare that he prefers to abandon him, such retractation is no longer permissible as soon as the slave's death has rendered his seizure impossible. A master may ransom his female slave enfranchised by reason of maternity in the same way as his other slaves; though according to some jurists Shafii originally insisted for her also upon payment of the indemnity as the only possible ransom. *A plurality of offences committed by such female slave does not in any way affect her master's right of ransom.

SECTION 5

Abortion involves the ghorra as price of blood for the foetus if brought forth dead in consequence of the crime, without prejudice to the price of blood for the mother, where the abortion causes her death also. †It is the same if the foetus appears to be dead in the mother's womb in consequence of the crime, and cannot be extracted because of her death. If it is a question not of a foetus but of a child brought forth by abortive means, and remaining some time alive without showing signs of pain, its death is presumed to be natural and nothing is due for the abortion; but if the child dies immediately after birth, or some time afterwards, but with constant signs of pain, the person causing the abortion owes the ordinary price of blood due in case of homicide.

If there are two foetuses there are also two ghorras. The ghorra is due in full even where there issues from the womb merely a hand or a piece of flesh virtually containing a human form, according to the midwives ; or even, according to some jurists, where there remains in the womb a piece of flesh which, according to the midwives, could take a human form.

The ghorra consists in a male or female slave of the age of discernment without redhibitory defects. †Thus one may give as ghorra a slave of a certain age, provided that age does not approach decrepitude. The value of the slave must not be less than one-twentieth of the price of blood due for homicide ; and in default of a slave answering all these conditions one owes five camels. Some authorities, however, do not insist upon the slave having the value mentioned. In default of camels their value must be substituted for them. The ghorra is payable to the heirs of the foetus, and is a debt for which the aakila of the offender are responsible ; though according to some jurists the offender alone is responsible if the abortion has been caused with premeditation. According to some authorities the ghorra is the same for a foetus which at its birth would have been Moslem as for one that would have been Jewish or Christian. According to others nothing is due for the abortion of a foetus which would have been infidel by birth ; †but the majority allow for this foetus a ghorra of the amount of one-third of that for a foetus which would have been Moslem. The abortion of a female slave is punished with one-tenth of her value upon the day of the offence ; or, according to others, on the day of the abortion ; and the amount goes to the profit of the master. †If the mother is deprived of a bodily member or organ, but the foetus is without bodily defects, the value of which one-tenth is due is the mother's original value. *And the tenth due for the abortion of a female slave is also a debt for which the aakila are responsible.

SECTION 6

A homicide requires an expiation, even where the offender is a minor, a lunatic, a slave, or an infidel subject of a Moslem prince ; and it makes no difference whether the homicide is premeditated, voluntary, or involuntary. Expiation is even necessary :—

1. In case of excusable homicide, at least where the victim is a Moslem.
2. In case of homicide committed upon the territory of infidels not subject to Moslem authority, at least where the victim is a Moslem.
3. Where the victim is an infidel subject of a Moslem prince.
4. Where the victim is still in his mother's womb.

5. Where the victim is the offender's slave.

6. In case of suicide. This, however, has been called in question.

Expiation is not due—

1. For homicide committed upon an infidel woman or minor not subject to our authority.

2. For homicide committed upon a rebel.

3. In case of legitimate defence.

4. Where homicide is committed under the law of talion.

†An expiation is due for each accomplice. This expiation is equal to that prescribed for injurious comparison; *with the exception of the option of maintaining sixty indigent persons.

BOOK 49.—PROCEDURE IN CASE OF CRIMES AGAINST THE PERSON

SECTION 1

THE accuser must give a precise account of the offence, mentioning whether it was premeditated or involuntary, whether the criminal had accomplices or not, and so on ; and if he does not do this the court shall require him to give details of his complaint ; or, according to some authorities, it should dismiss him on the ground of there being no case. According to others the accuser should also name in his complaint the particular person alleged to have committed the crime. †Thus where the accuser confines himself to asserting that only one of several accused persons committed a homicide, the court has no right to compel them to take an oath, if they deny it. †This principle applies not only to the procedure we are here concerned with, but also in cases of usurpation, theft, and destruction. Moreover, an accusation can only be received from a sane adult, whether a Moslem or an infidel subject of our Sovereign or enjoying our protection, provided in the two last cases that the accused is of the same quality.

One may not accuse a person of homicide after having previously accused another person of the same offence, at any rate where one asserted there were no accomplices ; *but there is no objection to first bringing an accusation of premeditated homicide, and afterwards limiting it to that of voluntary homicide.

An oath fifty times repeated is admissible as legal proof only in case of grave suspicion, e.g. if the victim is found in the camp or village of his enemies, if a band of men run away leaving a corpse lying on the ground, or if two bands fight together furiously and a victim remains on the spot. In this last case suspicion falls upon the band to which the victim did not belong ; but if the bands did not fight, the fact of the victim remaining dead at that place constitutes a grave suspicion that he was killed by the band to which he belonged. The deposition of a single witness of irreproachable character or that of several slaves or women also constitutes a grave suspicion ; on condition, according to some authorities, that the latter are separately examined. †A similar suspicion results from the deposition of persons of notorious misconduct, of minors, or of infidels. On the other hand, grave suspicion never exists where the matter is open to doubt, e.g. where one of two sons of the victim declares that so-and-so is guilty, and the other asserts the contrary. A single jurist admits suspicion, even in these circumstances ; while others do not admit as a ground of doubt the denial of a person of notorious misconduct. Where, however, in the circumstances above mentioned, one of the sons declares that the homicide was committed by Zaid in complicity with a person he does not know, and the other declares it was committed by Amr in complicity with a person he does not know, each son may confirm upon oath, fifty times repeated, the truth of his deposition, and then afterwards claim from the person he has indicated one-quarter of the price of blood. As to grave suspicion falling upon a band of men, an accused person who denies having formed part of it has a presumption in his favour if he confirms his statement upon oath. †The oath fifty times repeated is not to be taken by an accuser, if the grave suspicion relates only to the material fact of homicide, and does not indicate whether it is premeditated or not ; and it can only be taken in case of homicide, not in cases of wounding or destruction of property, unless the object destroyed is a slave.

This oath consists in the accuser swearing fifty times that his complaint is true ; but our school does not insist upon the ceremony taking place without interruption. Consequently an accuser struck with an attack of madness or fainting may continue his oath upon coming to himself. ††But if the accuser dies before finishing the fifty oaths required, no right of continuation devolves upon his heir, who may, however, on his part, pronounce a new series of fifty oaths. Where the victim leaves several heirs who may jointly demand the punishment of the guilty person, the fifty oaths are divided among them in proportion to their respective shares in the estate ; except that any one who would in this way take merely part of an oath, must take it in its entirety. One authority even maintains that the oath should be taken fifty times by each heir. The refusal of an heir to take this oath makes his right pass to his coinheritor ; and if one of two coinheritors cannot perform his oaths through absence the other may either take by himself the fifty oaths prescribed and receive at once his portion of the price of blood, or await the return of the absent coinheritor. Finally, in cases of crimes against the person, our school insists all the same upon the repetition of the oath fifty times—

1. When it is taken by the accused, in default of grave suspicion.
2. When it is taken by the accuser, or by the accused, in case of grave suspicion.
3. When it is taken to supplement the deposition of a single witness.

The result of the repeating of the oath fifty times is that the price of blood becomes obligatory both for the criminal and for his aakila, in case of voluntary or involuntary homicide, and that it is due from the criminal alone in case of premeditated homicide. In his first period Shafi considered that even in this last case the repetition of the oath fifty times was sufficient proof for the law of talion.

Where there is grave suspicion of premeditated homicide against three persons of whom one only has been arrested, the accuser begins by taking an oath fifty times to give his complaint greater force against the one arrested; and after this the latter owes one-third of the price of blood. If afterwards another of the accused persons is arrested, the accuser again repeats the oath fifty times with respect to him; but doubt has been cast on this rule by a jurist who maintains that only twenty-five oaths can be insisted on against the second accused, if the accused does not mention him upon the first occasion. This jurist, however, admits, as do the majority, that on the contrary supposition the new oaths are of no value; in that case suffice the first fifty oaths legally pronounced in the absence of the second accused.

The oath fifty times repeated is administered also to an individual who can claim only a pecuniary penalty in place of talion, for instance, to the master of a slave, even where the master in question is a slave undergoing enfranchisement by contract. As to an accuser who becomes an apostate it is preferable not to administer to him the oath with which we are concerned, until he returns from his errors; though according to our school the validity of the oath is unquestionable if taken at once. And finally, the oath repeated fifty times is not administered if the victim leaves no heir.

SECTION 2

No one can be condemned to a penalty under the law of talion unless the fact has been proved, either by a confession, or by two male witnesses of irreproachable conduct. But a criminal's condemnation to a pecuniary penalty may be based as well upon the deposition of a single male witness, corroborated by that of two women or by an oath; †with the single exception that where an accuser demands an application of the law of talion and afterwards finds that he can produce as witnesses only one man and two women, he may not change his mind and remit any proceeding under the law of talion and content himself with asking for a pecuniary penalty; although these witnesses would have sufficed had he in the first instance applied for the imposition of a fine. And, in accordance with the same principle, where a hashima, constituting in the first instance a mudiha, is established by a man and two women, the penalty prescribed for a hashima cannot be exacted, at least according to our school, as the mudiha involves the law of talion, and consequently cannot be proved in that manner. The depositions should indicate precisely the fact with which the accused is charged. Thus a deposition to the effect that "the accused struck the victim with his sword and wounded him and he is dead," is not enough until completed by a deposition to the effect that "death was the consequence of the blow," or that "it was the accused who killed him." A damia is proved by a deposition that "the accused struck the victim on the head in such a way as to cause it to bleed," or "to make the blood spurt forth;" a mudiha by a deposition that the accused struck him in such a way as to uncover the bone; though according to some authorities it is enough to prove that the accused dealt the victim a mudiha upon the head. In the case of a mudiha the deposition should also indicate precisely the place and gravity of the wound, as otherwise it would be impossible to apply the law of talion. A homicide committed by means of magic is proved only by the criminal's confession, and not by the testimony of witnesses.

A deposition to the effect that a certain person, of whom one is the heir, has been wounded by another, is admissible only when the wound has been completely healed. Nor may one depose, in a civil action, in favour of any one of whom one is the heir, during that person's last malady; as the principle is admitted that no one may depose in his own favour. Consequently the aakila cannot give evidence to the effect that the witnesses for the accuser are of notorious misconduct, at any rate where these same aakila would contribute to the price of blood in case of condemnation. If two witnesses assert that two persons have killed some one, but these two accused persons in their turn accuse the two witnesses of being themselves the only guilty parties, the latter are none the less condemned, if the representative of the victim sides with the witnesses. On the other hand, the accusation on both sides should be rejected, if the representative sides with the accused, or if he declares that both the accused and the witnesses are guilty, or if he declares that they are all lying. A penalty may not be pronounced under the law of talion, where some of the heirs of the victim admit that their coheritors have already remitted this penalty; and the depositions of two witnesses who contradict one another as to the time, the place, the instrument or the circumstances of the crime, are void and of no effect. Some authorities admit depositions of this nature merely as establishing grave suspicions.

BOOK 50.—REBELS

By rebels are understood those who revolt against the Sovereign, either by attacking him, or by disobeying his orders, or by refusing services or taxes legally due to him. In case of armed rebellion in which the guilty parties are organised under chiefs, they must be marched against and reduced to obedience; provided, according to some authorities, that there exists a Sovereign, recognised as their head by all Moslems. As to persons whose rebellion consists only in their deviation from recognised orthodox doctrine, those, for instance, who no longer observe public prayer, or commit grave sins in secret, these must be left alone, unless they trouble the internal security of the state with armed force, for then they must be fought and punished like brigands.

Rebels remain capable of deposing as witnesses, and the judgments rendered by their courts may be executed, except judgments that would be illegal even if delivered by our courts, or such as approve of hostile acts committed against true believers. †Our courts may reply to letters of requisition addressed to them by rebel courts, and may accept as evidence informations drawn up by them. Definite penalties pronounced and carried into effect by them are recognised as legal; as are also their charity tax, poll-tax, and land-tax, and even the application of the proceeds of the charity-tax to the support of their soldiers. This last rule, however, is doubtful.

Rebels are civilly responsible for all damage caused by them to the property of loyal subjects; and the latter are similarly responsible for all damage caused by them to the property of the rebels otherwise than in the war. One jurist, however, does not admit the responsibility of loyal subjects in any case. Individuals forming part of an organisation, though not united in armed bands, are civilly responsible for any destructive act, just like any other person; but those who, though not organised, are united in armed bands, should be considered in this respect as rebels, even where there are no chiefs among them, and they offer no opposition to lawful authority.

Rebels may not be fought with, until there has been previously sent them some trustworthy and intelligent person, capable of advising them to lay down their arms. He should begin by inquiring as to their grievances, and if they complain of vexatious treatment or error on the part of the lawful authorities, he should put a stop to this at once, and give the advice that may be necessary for the submission of the rebels. If the rebels refuse to take this advice, the Sovereign should threaten to reduce them to obedience by force of arms; and if they ask for a delay he may accord or refuse it as seems to him best.

It is forbidden to kill rebels when they take to flight, or when disabled or when made prisoners. Prisoners, including minors and women, must be retained until the end of the war and the complete dispersion of the rebel bands, unless they declare their submission to lawful authority. After the pacification captured arms and horses are to be returned to their owners, provided that nothing further is to be feared from them. In warfare against rebels it is forbidden to make use of the arms and horses taken from them, except in case of absolute necessity, or to use methods of great destructiveness, such as fire or warlike machines, unless such a course is rendered necessary by the rebels themselves using these things in their defence, or by there being no other means for our escape when surrounded by them.

It is equally forbidden to reduce rebels to obedience by means of troops recruited from amongst the infidels, or even from amongst Moslems who, like followers of the school of Abu Hanifa, maintain that rebels who have taken to flight may be killed. Infidels not subject to Moslem authority, enrolled by rebels in a war against us, and thus enjoying their protection, have no title to be so considered by us; †the rebels themselves, however, are bound to observe the engagements they have contracted with the infidels in question. Infidel subjects of our Sovereign who take part with the rebels against us, knowingly, and of their own free will, lose all right to our protection; but if they are forced to join in the war, our engagements towards them remain intact. It is the same where the infidels in question declare that they believed in good faith that it was lawful for them to take part in the war, and that the rebels were in the right. At least this is the theory of our school. In all these circumstances infidel subjects of our Sovereign should be treated in warfare like the rebels themselves.

SECTION 2

Essential requisites for a Sovereign are to be a free, sane, adult, male Moslem of the tribe of the Koraish; of sufficient courage, discretion and knowledge of the law; of sound sight, hearing, and speech. Sovereignty is conferred—

1. By election ; †to be carried out by the best scholars, chiefs, and other persons occupying a high social position, or so many of them as can be united in one place.

2. By designation ; the Sovereign having the right to designate his successor, and even to grant to several persons the right of designating one of them to be his successor.

3. By the right of the stronger ; and this title to the supreme authority is to be recognised not only where the Sovereign who is thus imposed upon the faithful unites in his person all the requisite qualities, ‡but also if he possesses none of them, and is even of notorious misconduct, or an ignorant person.

[A tax-payer who alleges that he has paid the rebels the tax due from him, has a presumption in his favour ; but this presumption does not exist with regard to the poll-tax †or the land-tax. The same presumption exists in favour of a person who asserts that he has suffered a definite penalty, unless the crime was proved by witnesses ; or unless no trace of punishment can be found on the criminal's body.]

BOOK 51.—APOSTASY

APOSTASY consists in the abjuration of Islam, either mentally, or by words, or by acts incompatible with faith. As to oral abjuration it matters little whether the words are said in joke, or through a spirit of contradiction, or in good faith. But before such words can be considered as a sign of apostasy, they must contain a precise declaration—

1. That one does not believe in the existence of the Creator, or of His apostles ; or

2. That Muhammad, or one of the other apostles, is an impostor ; or

3. That one considers lawful what is strictly forbidden by the ijmaa, e.g. the crime of fornication ; or

4. That one considers to be forbidden what is lawful according to the ijmaa.

5. That one is not obliged to follow the precepts of the ijmaa, as well positive as negative ; or

6. That one intends shortly to change one's religion ; or that one has doubts upon the subject of the truth of Islam, etc.

As to acts, these are not considered to be incompatible with faith, unless they show a clear indication of a mockery or denial of religion, as, e.g. throwing the Koran upon a muck heap, or prostrating oneself before an idol, or worshipping the sun. No account is taken of the apostasy of a minor or a lunatic, nor of acts committed under violent compulsion. Even where the guilty person, after pronouncing the words or committing the acts, becomes mad, he may not be put to death until he has recovered his sanity. This favour, however, does not, according to our school, extend to the case of drunkenness. Apostasy, and a declaration of having returned from one's errors, pronounced by a drunken person, have the ordinary legal consequences.

Witnesses need not recount in all their details the facts that constitute apostasy ; they may confine themselves to affirming that the guilty person is an apostate. Other authorities are of the contrary opinion ; but the majority go so far as to make no account of the mere denial of the accused, even where the assertions of the witnesses are made in general terms. But where, on the other hand, the accused declares that he acted under compulsion, and the circumstances render this assertion plausible, e.g. if he has been kept a prisoner by infidels, he has a presumption in his favour, provided he takes an oath ; but this presumption does not arise in the absence of such circumstances. Only where the two witnesses required by law do not declare that "the accused is apostate," but that "the words pronounced by him are words implying apostasy," and the accused then maintains that he only pronounced them under compulsion, the presumption is in his favour, and it is not necessary for him to give more detailed explanations. Where, after the death of an individual whose faith has never been suspected, one of his sons who are both Moslems declares that his father abjured Islam and died impenitent, and adds the cause of the apostasy, this son alone is excluded from the succession, and his portion escheats to the state as a tax ; but his deposition has no effect upon the rights of his coinheritors. *The same rule applies also where the cause of the crime is not mentioned, and the son limits himself to saying that his father died apostate.

An attempt should be made to induce the apostate to return from his or her errors ; though, according to one authority, this is only a commendable proceeding. The exhortation should take place immediately, or, according to one jurist, in the first three days ; and if it is of no effect, the guilty man or woman should be put to death. Where, on the contrary, the guilty party returns from his or her errors, this conversion must be accepted as sincere, and the converted person left alone ; unless, according to some authorities, he has embraced an occult religion such as the Zend, whose adherents, while professing Islam, are none the less infidels in their heart, or some doctrine admitting of a mystic or allegorical interpretation of the Koran.

The child of an apostate remains a Moslem, without regard to the time of its conception, or to one of its parents remaining a Moslem or not. One authority, however, considers the child whose father and mother have abjured the faith to be an apostate ; while another considers such a child to be by origin an infidel. [*The child should be considered as an apostate. This is what the jurists of Irak have handed down to us as the universally accepted theory.]

*As to the ownership of the property of an apostate dead in impenitence, it remains in suspense, i.e. the law considers it as lost from the moment of abjuration of the faith, but in case of repentance it is considered to have been never lost. However, there are several other theories upon the subject ; though all authorities agree that debts contracted before apostasy, as well as the personal maintenance of the apostate during the period of exhortation, are charges upon the estate.

†It is the same with any damages due in consequence of pecuniary prejudice caused to other persons, the maintenance of his wives, whose marriage remains in suspense, and the maintenance of his ascendants or descendants. Where it is admitted that ownership remains in suspense, the same principle must be applied to dispositions subsequent to apostasy, in so far as they are capable of being suspended, such as enfranchisement by will, and legacies, which all remain intact where the exhortation is successful, though not otherwise. On the other hand, dispositions which, by their very nature, do not admit of such suspension, such as sale, pledging, gift, and enfranchisement by contract, are null and void ab initio ; though Shafii, in his first period, wished to leave them in suspense. All authorities, moreover, are agreed that an apostate's property may in no case be left at his disposition from the moment that a state of apostasy has been ascertained, but must be deposited in charge of some person of irreproachable character. But a female slave may not be so entrusted to a man ; she must be confided to some trustworthy woman. An apostate's property must be leased out ; and it is to the court that his slave undergoing enfranchisement by contract should make his periodical payments.

BOOK 52.—FORNICATION

THE crime of fornication consists in the introduction of the penis into the vagina of a woman with whom one has no right of coition, without one being able to allege any cause of error. The crime is punishable with a definite penalty; and this punishment is also applicable, according to our school, to whoever introduces his penis into the podex of a man or of a woman. On the other hand, the penalty does not apply to a person who merely indulges in voluptuous touching of the thighs, nor to coition—

1. With one's own wife or female slave during their menstrues, during a fast, or while in a state of ihram.

2. *With one's own female slave married to another man.

3. *With one's wife, during her period of legal retirement.

4. *With a female slave of whom one is the owner, in case of relationship or affinity within the prohibited degrees.

5. *Under violent compulsion.

6. ††In cases where authorities are not in agreement as to the illegality of coition, e.g. in case of a marriage concluded without witnesses, of which the Malekites do not admit the absolute nullity.

7. †With a corpse, *or with an animal.

Thus the law only punishes coition with a free woman, or with the slave of another person, in the case of an individual—

1. With whom one is not engaged in the bonds of matrimony, and who has surrendered herself for nothing or for a remuneration.

2. With whom one is related by family or marriage within the prohibited degrees, even though one may have married her in fact, but in contravention of the law.

One is not punishable for the crime of fornication unless one is an adult sane Moslem, and unless one knew the act was forbidden. Drunkenness cannot be pleaded as an excuse.

The penalty is as follows.

1. For a guilty person whom the law considers as mohsan, by which word is understood in this respect an adult sane free Moslem man or woman who has already experienced coition in a legitimate marriage, the penalty is lapidation. *If this marriage is attackable in any respect, the penalty of lapidation cannot be pronounced. †It is necessary that coition under the marriage must have consisted in the introduction of the penis into the vagina, and that the man should have been an adult sane free Moslem at the moment. Infidel subjects of our Sovereign are considered as Moslems so far as regards this matter. †The fact that one of the accomplices in the crime of fornication does not satisfy all the conditions required for lapidation, constitutes no excuse for the other.

2. For a free person who is not mohsan, the punishment for fornication is one hundred stripes, followed by banishment for one year to a distance at least permitting prayer to be abridged; †and if the Sovereign designates a particular spot as the criminal's residence, he must submit to this aggravation of his punishment. In any case, during the period of his banishment, the criminal may not remain in the place where the crime was committed, nor in the place of his domicile; †and if he makes his appearance in one or other of these places, the authorities should drive him away. †A banished woman need not set out on her journey alone; she has a right to be accompanied either by her husband, or by some one within the prohibited degrees, at the expense of the state when she has not sufficient means of her own. †But no one can be obliged to accompany the guilty woman, even for hire.

3. For a slave, the punishment for fornication is fifty stripes, followed by banishment for half a year, or according to one authority a whole year. One jurist, however, does not admit banishment as a punishment where the criminal is a slave.

The crime of fornication is proved only by the evidence of witnesses and by confession. A confession need only be uttered once, and has no effect when retracted; †but a retraction is null and void where the guilty party asks for pardon or takes to flight. As to the evidence of witness the reader must note that the law requires four male witnesses; but the definite penalty is not pronounced, even on the deposition of these four witnesses, if four women ascertain that the woman accused is still a virgin. But the deposition of these four women is not enough to convict the accuser of defamation. If one of the witnesses indicates a certain part of the house where the crime was committed, and the three others a different place, the legal proof is not attained.

It is the Sovereign or his delegate who should have the definite penalty executed, where the criminal is free or partially enfranchised; and it is preferable that the execution of the sentence should take place in presence of the person who ordered it, and of the witnesses. In the case of a slave the execution of the sentence should be ordered either by his master or by the Sovereign, †the latter having priority in case of a dispute. †As to banishment it is always the master who should see to the execution of the sentence in the case of a slave ; but in this matter a slave undergoing enfranchisement by contract is considered as a free man. †The right of the master to see to the execution of a sentence of definite punishment pronounced against his slave exists none the less should the master be a man of notorious misconduct, or an infidel, or himself a slave undergoing enfranchisement by contract ; and in the case of a penalty at the discretion of the court, the right of execution of the sentence belongs exclusively to the master. †The master may also examine the witnesses in a penal matter.

Lapidation takes place by means of pieces of dry earth or of stones of convenient form and size. If the criminal is a man, he is not half buried in the ground ; †but this procedure is commendable in the case of a woman, at least where the crime has been established by the evidence of witnesses. The sickness of the criminal, excessive heat or cold, are no grounds for postponing the execution ; unless, according to some authorities, where the proof of the crime is a confession. On the other hand, sickness is a good ground for postponing the execution of a sentence of flogging, unless no hope can be entertained of a cure. In these circumstances, however, flogging is effected by means of one stroke with a rod with a hundred bands, instead of by means of one hundred strokes with a whip with a thong ; if it is impossible to procure a rod with more than fifty bands, then the flogging consists of two strokes. Even in this case, however, the flogging must be done in such a way that the criminal experiences some pain ; i.e. that the bands must all touch him or at least contribute by their weight to make the instrument fall more heavily ; for if the patient unexpectedly recover, that is no reason for repeating the flogging. Flogging should not take place at a moment when it is excessively hot or cold ; though, according to Shafii's personal opinion, the Sovereign, if he proceeds to carry out the execution of the sentence, in spite of the criminal's sickness, is not responsible for the consequences that may ensue. According to that view it is merely commendable to adjourn the punishment in that case, but it is not a rule of rigorous observance.

BOOK 53.—DEFAMATION

DEFAMATION is punishable only when committed by a sane adult Moslem. Drunkenness is no excuse. The law requires that the crime should have been committed spontaneously. As to a minor who has attained the age of discernment, he is punishable at the discretion of the court. Ascendants are not punishable for defamation against their descendants.

The penalty for a free person is eighty stripes, and for a slave forty, provided that the injured party possesses the character of mohsan, i.e. would be punishable with lapidation if the accusation were well founded. As to the legal meaning of the word mohsan, we explained this when treating of imprecation.

There are punishable as defamers : *witnesses who prove in court the crime of fornication, but are not of the prescribed number of four ; and even witnesses, of whatever number, who are not male, free, and, according to our school, Moslem. On the other hand, a witness cannot be punished as a defamer who proves that the accused confessed the crime of fornication, even though he be the only witness.

Where two persons mutually defame each other there is no ground for compensation ; and where the injured party has himself of his own accord applied the definite prescribed penalty, the flogging has not been legally executed, and must be repeated.

BOOK 54.—CRIMES PUNISHABLE WITH AMPUTATION

CHAPTER I.—THEFT

SECTION 1

AMPUTATION for theft is applicable only under the following circumstances :—

1. That at least the quarter of an entire dinar has been stolen, or an object of that value. †Thus if one steals a piece of unminted gold of the volume of a quarter of a dinar, that would not have this volume after being placed under the die, one is not liable to the definite prescribed penalty. This penalty should be pronounced against a thief who takes several dinars, believing them to be pieces of copper of less than the required value ; †and also against a person who steals an old coat of less than the required value ; but in the pocket of which, accidentally and without his knowledge, there is something of which the value, added to that of the coat, does amount to the value required. Where one commits two thefts at the same place, each less than the quarter of a dinar, but more when taken together, one has committed two non-punishable thefts, if the owner perceived the first before the second took place, and repaired the fastening in the meanwhile. †Otherwise there is considered to be only one theft, of the required amount, and consequently the thief is punishable with amputation. †The penalty is applicable also to the case of a person who makes an opening in a sack of corn, etc., so that its contents are abstracted, to the minimum value required. Two persons committing this abstraction together are punishable with amputation only when they take twice the minimum, as otherwise each would be considered to have taken an inferior amount. Amputation is never applicable to a person who steals things impure in themselves, and consequently without legal value, such as wine, pork, a dog, or the untanned skin of an animal that has died a natural death or been killed in any other manner than by slaughtering or in hunting in accordance with the precepts of the law. ††But where the vessel in which some prohibited liquid is contained is stolen at the same time, and the value of this vessel reaches the required minimum, amputation should be pronounced, without regard to the contents. And in accordance with this same principle amputation does not take place for the theft of a guitar or other instrument of music, though some authorities exact it where the different fragments of the guitar have the required value. [†These authorities are right.]

2. That the stolen property belongs to another. Consequently amputation does not take place where the stolen object has already become the property of the thief before its abstraction; even though this may be unknown to him, as by succession. Nor does it take place where the original value of the things stolen has already diminished, before their abstraction, below the minimum, as where the owner eats some of his provisions, etc. According to Shafi's personal opinion it is not absolutely necessary that one should be the owner of the object to render amputation inapplicable; it is enough if one has claimed it in a court of justice. †Where only one of two accomplices makes some claim to an object either for himself or for both of them, while the other opposes this claim, the former alone is exempt from amputation; his claim does not save his accomplice from amputation. *And it follows also from this principle that amputation is not rigorously required in the case of theft of an object of which one is co-proprietor, when this object is in a jointly owned shop, however small may be the thief's share.

3. That the abstraction cannot have been committed by error. Consequently amputation does not take place for abstractions to the prejudice of one's ascendants or descendants, nor for those committed by a slave to the prejudice of his master; *though amputation is rigorously necessary for abstractions committed by one of two married persons to the prejudice of the other. As to thefts to the prejudice of the public treasury, they do not involve amputation in the following cases :—

(a) Where the stolen object is intended specially for a corporation of which the thief is a member.

(b) †Where the thief has a claim to the stolen object under some respect, e.g. where a Moslem steals money intended for the public good, or where a poor person steals money forming part of the charity tax.

Our school insists upon amputation for taking a door or a beam from a mosque, but not for taking a mat or a lighted lamp. †On the other hand, amputation is rigorously necessary for any one who steals any fixed object, or carries off a female slave enfranchised on account of maternity, asleep or mad.

4. That the stolen object is kept sufficiently safe, either in sight, or in a sure place. When one deposits an object on a desert plain or in a mosque one ought not to lose sight of it; but when one deposits it somewhere inside an enclosed place, it is sufficient to take the usual amount of care to see to the fastenings. A stable is a sure place for animals, but not for household goods or wearing apparel; the courtyard of a house and the soffa are sure places for utensils and daily clothes, but not for finery, nor for gold and silver coin. If one lies down upon a coat in a desert plain or in a mosque, or uses something as a pillow, these objects are kept sufficiently safe, provided the sleeper does not turn over in his sleep and does not lie down to the side. A coat or other object placed upon a desert plain close to the owner are considered to be kept safely so long as he does not lose sight of them, and is able to defend them from attack, either by his own strength or by calling for assistance. A solitary house is a safe place if a strong man is in charge of it, it matters little if the door is open or closed. A house surrounded by other houses is a safe place if the door is closed, and there is a guardian, even though he should be in the habit of going to sleep; but if the guardian goes to bed leaving the door open the house is not a safe place by night, for by day. †It is the same where a guardian is a person to be easily duped by thieves. An uninhabited house, surrounded by other houses, constitutes a safe place, according to our school, only during the day; provided it is during a time of peace, and the door is closed. A tent in a desert plain, if the ropes are not stretched tight and the lower extremities not firmly attached to the soil, is regarded, with everything it contains, in the same way as objects placed upon the plain. If the ropes are stretched tight, and the extremities attached to the soil, the tent is a safe place, if it has a strong guardian, even though he is in the habit of going to sleep. Cattle in a stable or an enclosed place belonging to a house is sufficiently safe even without a guardian; but such a place in a desert requires a guardian, who need not, however, always be awake. As to camels on a desert plain they are sufficiently guarded if in charge of a herdsman; and the same is the case with camels or elephants attached to one another, so as to walk in file, provided that their conductor ascertains every hour that they are all there, and provided there are no more than nine head. †Animals not attached to one another on the march are not considered to be sufficiently guarded. A shroud is sufficiently guarded in a tomb situated in some closed construction, for in a cemetery on the outskirts of habitations, but not in a tomb situated in some desert place.

SECTION 2

The lessor †for the lender of a shop is punishable with amputation for abstracting an object deposited in the shop by the lessee or borrower ; but if the shop is occupied by a person who has usurped it, neither the owner †nor any one else is punishable for committing such abstraction.

Nor is amputation applicable :—

1. If a person who has usurped an object places it in a shop which belongs to him, and the owner of the object so usurped comes and takes another object belonging to the usurper and deposited in the same shop.

2. †If any other person takes the usurped object from the shop.

3. In case of open theft, or robbery, or denial of a deposit.

†Amputation is applicable to a person who penetrates a wall and by this means steals something the next night. [Unless before the theft the owner is informed of the fact that a hole has been made in his wall, or the hole is visible to passers by, for under these circumstances the place is insufficiently safe and consequently there is no ground for amputation.]

In a case where one criminal makes a hole in the wall, and another makes use of it for theft, neither are liable to amputation ; and where both together make the hole but only one commits the abstraction, the latter alone suffers amputation. Even if one of the two places the stolen object close to the hole and the other takes it, the latter alone is punishable with amputation ; *and this principle is carried so far that amputation is not pronounced against the accomplice even though he places the object in the middle of the hole and the value exceeds twice the legal minimum.

Amputation is rigorously necessary where the object is taken from the owner under the following circumstances :—

1. If the thief throws the thing to some one who is about to go away.

2. If he throws it into running water.

3. If he places it on the back of a moving animal.

4. If he exposes it in the open when a violent wind is blowing.

†On the other hand, this penalty is not applicable where the thief merely places the object upon the back of an animal that happens to stop at that place, and goes on with it as a load. A free person, not being an object of commerce, cannot be stolen ; consequently one is not punishable with amputation for carrying off a free person ; †even though it may be a small child wearing a collar the value of which reaches the legal minimum. It follows from this principle that one who finds a slave sleeping on a camel and leads the beast far from the caravan without waking the sleeper, should be amputated; †but if the sleeper is a free man he is still in possession of his mount, and consequently amputation is not applicable. On the other hand, amputation is prescribed for transporting an object belonging to another from a closed room into the courtyard of the house if the main door is open, but not if the room is open and the house door shut. According to some authorities amputation is rigorously necessary even where the doors of both room and house are shut; †while the same rules are applicable in the case of a room at an inn from which one has abstracted another's baggage and deposited it in the courtyard.

Theft committed by a minor or a lunatic, or under violent compulsion does not involve amputation; but it is of small consequence whether the injured party or the criminal are Moslems or infidel subjects of our Sovereign. As to an infidel living among us by virtue of a safe conduct or an armistice jurists are not in agreement, though the better doctrine tends to regard as liable to amputation those who are expressly subject to our laws in this respect. [The generally accepted doctrine forbids the amputation of such infidel.]

Theft is proved †by the accuser's oath, if the accused challenges him to it; and also by the accused's confession, which may, however be retracted, according to our school. ††Where the accused confesses some crime incurring a penalty of reparation towards God and consequently not remissible, the court should have it explained to him that retraction is permissible, without however, imposing it upon him as an order. Moreover, if any one of his own accord presents himself before the court and admits having stolen the property of another person who is absent, †the penalty of amputation may not be pronounced before the return of the injured party, and his confirmation of the fact; †but execution should take place at once where the accused admits forcing the slave of another to commit the crime of fornication. Theft is also proved by the deposition of two male witnesses; the deposition of one man and two women is not sufficient for pronouncing the definite prescribed penalty, though enough for the civil action resulting from the crime. The witnesses should make a detailed account of the fact, and if the details do not agree, if, for example one of the witnesses declares that it happened at dawn, and the other at the beginning of the night, their depositions cancel each other.

Without prejudice to the penalty incurred the thief should be condemned to a restitution of the object stolen, or if it be lost to a payment of its value.

Amputation of the right hand takes place for the first offence ; that of the left foot for the second ; that of the left hand for the third, and that of the right foot for the fourth. Subsequent offences are punishable at the discretion of the court. The joint where the amputation is to be effected should first be anointed with boiled fat and oil. This act is considered by some jurists as a necessary accompaniment of the penalty. †The majority, however, regard it as the sufferer's right, so that he has to bear the expense, and the Sovereign need not order it ex officio. The hand is amputated at the wrist, and the foot at the joint below the ankle. A person who commits several thefts for the first time suffers only the amputation of the right hand, even though there were missing from it four fingers [†or even five]. The hand is amputated without regard to the fact that it may have an extra finger. If the criminal has already lost the right hand in consequence of some malady, amputation does not take place for the first theft. But, according to our school, it is not a reason for dispensing with the amputation of the right hand that the sufferer has already lost the left, although on that account the penalty is in his case much more serious than it otherwise would be.

CHAPTER II.—BRIGANDS

SECTION 1

By “ brigand ” is understood an adult sane Moslem who troubles the security of the roads by armed force ; but not a person who furtively joins the rear of a caravan, intending to escape after a few thefts. Those who confine themselves to attacking and robbing travellers who are alone or in small groups should be considered as brigands in respect to the persons they can get the better of, but not in respect of a large caravan. Besides, in the term brigandage is not included an attack at a moment, when, or in a place where, one can call for help ; but the term does cover an attack when this is not the case, either on account of distance, or on account of the weakness of persons living near by, even though it may be in a town.

Brigands who trouble the security of the roads by menace only, and do not rob or murder travellers should be punished by the Sovereign with imprisonment, etc., by way of punishment at discretion ; but a brigand guilty of theft, to an amount usually involving amputation, should lose the right hand and the left foot ; or, for a second offence, the left hand and the right foot. Homicide committed by a brigand renders rigorously necessary an application of the death penalty ; and homicide accompanied by theft is punished with death ; and the corpse is exposed for three days upon a cross. After this period it should be taken down. According, however, to some authorities it should remain until a clear liquid begins to flow from it. One jurist even maintains that the guilty person should first be crucified for some time and then taken down to be put to death.

A person who takes part in the misdeeds of brigands, and joins their band, but is not employed in it, and is not guilty of any criminal act, should be punished with imprisonment, banishment, etc., by way of punishment at discretion. As to banishment, some jurists maintain that the Sovereign should indicate the place where the guilty party should reside.

The death penalty, to which a brigand is liable for homicide, is equivalent to a penalty under the law of talion ; though, according to one authority, it is even then a definite prescribed penalty. According to the theory adopted by the majority a brigand cannot be put to death for killing his descendant or an infidel subject of our Sovereign ; and if he dies before execution the price of blood due for his victims constitutes a debt payable from his estate. If a brigand has committed several homicides this theory requires that he should be put to death for one of these homicides, while his estate remains burdened with the price of blood due for the others ; but even when one adopts that theory the brigand should none the less be put to death as subject to a definite prescribed penalty when the representative of the victim pardons him for a fine, though the talion does not exist in these circumstances. A brigand who kills his victim either by means of a blunt instrument, or by cutting off a limb, should suffer death in the same way ; but if his victim recovers from the effects of his wound, the brigand is not punishable under the law of talion. Nor is he liable to the special penalties formulated against him, if he changes his conduct before falling into the hands of the authorities ; all without prejudice to the penalties to be pronounced for the special offences of which he is guilty. As to a brigand whose repentance is only manifested after his arrest, our school grants him no such favour ; *and in general the other definite prescribed penalties should be undergone in spite of the criminal's repentance.

SECTION 2

In a case where the offender has to undergo several penalties for offences against men, and consequently capable of being remitted, such as the death penalty, amputation of a limb, and the penalty for defamation, he is first flogged, then suffers amputation, and is finally put to death. The death penalty should be executed immediately after the amputation. Consequently the latter penalty should be put off in the absence of the person who has the right to demand the penalty of death, †and even if he is present and insists upon proceeding at once to amputation. On the other hand, where the person who has the right to demand the death penalty, wishes the execution to be put off, there is no objection to proceeding at once to the flogging; and this penalty should be followed immediately by amputation, if the person who has the right to exact the death penalty pardons the criminal. In a case where the person who can exact the penalty of amputation, wishes its execution to be put off, the person who can exact the penalty of flogging need not wait; but the penalty of death may not on any consideration be executed before amputation; and the person who proceeds in spite of this to the execution of the criminal owes to the injured party who had the right to exact amputation the price of blood for the limb that should have been amputated. The person who has the right to exact flogging may oblige the two others to wait as long as he pleases; this at least is what strict logic requires. Where the offender has to suffer not penalties capable of remission, but penalties for offences committed against God, the lightest is executed first, and so on in order. If he has to undergo a penalty for an offence against God and also a penalty that may be remitted, a penalty pronounced for defamation has priority over one pronounced for fornication, ‡or over one pronounced for wine-drinking. †And similarly a penalty under the law of talion, whether of death or of amputation, has priority over a penalty incurred for the crime of fornication.

BOOK 55.—OF FORBIDDEN BEVERAGES, AND OF PUNISHMENT AT THE DISCRETION OF THE COURT

SECTION 1

EVERY beverage that induces intoxication when taken in great quantity is forbidden, even when only a small quantity is taken. The fact of taking it involves an application of the definite prescribed penalty. This penalty, however, is applicable neither to a minor, nor to a lunatic, nor to an infidel, whether he be or be not the subject of a Moslem prince, nor to any one into whose mouth the drink has been introduced by force, nor, according to our school, to any one who has been otherwise forced to drink it. He who drinks wine without knowing what it is is not punishable; and it is the same with a new convert to Islam who drinks it without knowing that it is forbidden; the punishment, however, is incurred by a new convert who merely alleges as his excuse that he knew the drink was forbidden but was not aware of the punishment. It is also incurred for taking the lees of wine, but not for eating bread that has been kneaded with wine, or preserves prepared with wine, †nor for introducing forbidden liquid into one's body by means of injection or sniffing. Besides this, one may take wine in case of immediate necessity, e.g. if there is in the throat a piece of food which it is difficult to get down, and there is no other liquid handy at the moment; ‡but one is liable to punishment if one takes wine as medicine or to quench one's thirst.

The definite prescribed penalty for the crime we are here concerned with is forty stripes, if the guilty person is free, and twenty if a slave. In case of attenuating circumstances the strokes may be given not only with a lash, but also with the hand, with a sandal, or with the end of a coat rolled round like a cord. Few authorities require in all cases stripes with a lash. The Sovereign, or his deputy the judge, has a right to increase the number of blows †up to the double if it seems good to him, but in that case these extra blows constitute a punishment at the discretion of the court. According to others they should be considered also as the definite prescribed penalty.

The crime is proved either by the culprit's confession, or by the testimony of two male witnesses ; the odour of the breath, drunkenness or vomiting are insufficient by themselves to establish it. It is enough that the accused states that he drank wine, etc., or that the witnesses state they saw him drink wine, etc., without its being necessary to enter into more precise details ; provided that it is also established, according to some authorities, that the act was done knowingly and willingly.

Whipping cannot be administered during the state of drunkenness resulting from the crime. It is effected, as in all cases of definite prescribed punishment, by means of a whip with a handle of a thickness between a stalk and a stick, neither green nor quite dry. The stripes should be administered upon all the limbs of the body, except places where the wound would be mortal. One should avoid hitting the face, and, according to some, the head. The hands of the sufferer are not tied, nor is he made to put down his clothes ; but the blows should be repeated rapidly in such a way as to make him cry out and inflict upon him an exemplary chastisement.

SECTION 2

Contraventions that are not punishable with some definite prescribed penalty, and involve no sort of expiation, should be punished at the discretion of the court either by imprisonment, whipping, a slap, or a reprimand. The nature and gravity of the punishment are at the discretion of the Sovereign or his deputy the judge ; except that, according to some authorities a simple reprimand is not sufficient if the offence is committed against men, but only where it is committed against God. Whipping should always be under twenty strokes in the case of a slave, and forty in the case of a free man ; though some think that twenty is the limit for any person. †Moreover, the principle that a punishment at discretion should always be below the minimum pronounced as a definite prescribed penalty extends to all contraventions.

†Where the injured party grants a remission to the criminal, e.g. of the definite prescribed penalty for defamation, the Sovereign may not substitute for it a punishment at his discretion ; but the remission of a punishment at discretion, by the injured party, leaves intact the right of the Sovereign to inflict upon the guilty person the punishment he deserves.

BOOK 56.—EXCUSABLE HOMICIDE, WOUNDING AND RESPONSIBILITY FOR DAMAGE

SECTION 1

ONE has a right to resist any attack upon one's life, property, bodily members, or modesty ; and if the person so assailed kills the aggressor, the law admits no responsibility in the matter. Defence against attacks upon one's property, though recognised as legitimate, is not obligatory ; but one ought to defend one's life or one's modesty, *at least when one's life is attacked by an infidel or an animal, but not when attacked by a Moslem. Defence of another is regulated by the same principles as defence of one's own person, though according to some authorities it is always obligatory. †When a jar falls accidentally upon some one who cannot protect himself against it without breaking the jar, he is civilly responsible for damages. An aggressor should be repulsed with the least possible roughness ; thus one should not have recourse to blows if the object can be attained by words or by calling for assistance ; strokes with a whip are forbidden where a slap would be enough ; a stick is forbidden where a whip would be sufficient ; and one must not kill the aggressor, if one could render him incapable of any hurt by cutting a limb. Where one can save oneself by flight our school requires that this should be done, instead of defending oneself ; and where the aggressor has taken one's hand between his teeth, one should withdraw it in such a way as to cause him the least possible pain, i.e. by opening the jaws and striking the corners of the mouth ; but if one is obliged to withdraw one's hand by force, one is not responsible for making the aggressor lose some of his teeth.

A person who perceives a man intentionally looking through a skylight or a hole at the women of the house, may throw at the indiscreet man some light object, such as a pebble, and if by accident the missile causes the man to lose his sight, or causes a wound near the eye, the person is not responsible, even should death be the consequence. Only in the case where the woman observed is a relative of the man within the prohibited degrees, or his wife, it is not permissible to use missiles to drive him away. Some authorities also add a reservation that the woman in question is not veiled ; others require a previous admonition before adopting the extreme course of throwing a missile.

A guardian, chief, husband, or schoolmaster, inflicting punishment upon the persons submitted to their authority are responsible for the consequences, except in the following cases :—

1. In the case of a definite prescribed penalty, applied to the guilty person within the limits allowed by law.

2. ††Where a drinker of forbidden beverages is beaten with a sandal or a piece of clothing.

3. Where one inflicts upon a drunkard the prescribed forty stripes with a lash ; but where the number of blows exceeds forty, the person ordering them is responsible for the consequences in proportion to the excess, or, according to one jurist, up to half the price of blood. This controversy exists also with regard to the crime of defamation ; where, for example, eighty-one strokes are inflicted upon the guilty party.

Any free, adult, sane person may cut a tumour appearing upon his body, unless the operation would be dangerous, and there is no danger in leaving the tumour, or at any rate the danger of the operation is the greater. In the case of a minor or of a lunatic, it is for the father or grandfather to order the operation, even if there is some danger, provided that in this case the danger incurred by not proceeding with the operation is yet greater. The Sultan may not order an operation in these circumstances as subsidiary guardian, nor may his deputy the judge. It is only where the operation is not dangerous that the Sultan, as well as the father or grandfather, may give his authorisation for the operation to be performed.

†A surgeon who bleeds a patient or applies leeches to him does not incur any responsibility, even though the sick man succumbs, provided that the operator does not overstep the limits imposed by science in operations of that nature. The Sultan, or his deputy the judge, as subsidiary guardian, who goes beyond his competence and orders a minor to undergo an operation, is personally responsible for the price of blood on the higher scale ; while the price of blood due for an error on his part, either in the application of a definite prescribed penalty or in his decisions, is a debt recoverable from his aakila, or, according to one authority, from the public treasury. All jurists admit the responsibility of the magistrate who pronounces a definite prescribed penalty upon the deposition of two witnesses who subsequently turn out to be slaves, infidel subjects of a Moslem prince, or minors near their majority, at least if he accepted them as witnesses without preliminary inquiry ; but jurists are not in agreement as to the magistrate's responsibility where he has done all he could in the matter. But where it is admitted that the aakila or the public treasury can be held responsible for the price of blood, due to an error of judgment, †one cannot admit any right to proceed against the witnesses who turn out not to have the requisite qualities. A surgeon who, on proper authorisation, bleeds any one or applies leeches to him, is in no way responsible for the consequences; and an executioner who carries out a sentence of death or of flogging upon the authorisation of the Sovereign is merely the latter's instrument, unless he knows that the order is from a tyrant, or given in error. In these two cases he would himself be liable under the law of talion, unless acting under violent compulsion.

The circumcision of a woman is effected by the removal of a little of her flesh, in the upper part of the vagina, and that of a man by the removal of the foreskin. It is not obligatory before majority, though it is recommended to proceed to this operation on the seventh day after birth, and not to put it off unless the child has not yet sufficient strength to support it. Any one who performs circumcision at an age when the child is not yet strong enough to support it is liable under the law of talion if the operation causes death. This rule, however, does not apply to the child's ascendants. †On the other hand a guardian is not responsible for the consequences of circumcision effected at an epoch when the child has a constitution sufficiently developed to be able to undergo the operation. The hire of the person who performs the circumcision is at the charge of the patient.

One is responsible for the damage caused by animals in one's charge, both as regards the person and the property of others, and both by day and by night. However, the person in charge is not responsible for accidents that may happen to people or property by reason of the animal passing water upon the public road or making it filthy with their excrement. But care must be taken that the animals do not do anything extraordinary as, for example, even excessive trampling in the mire. The person in charge is responsible for acts not natural to the animals in question. Any one who carries wood upon his back, or loads an animal with it, is responsible for the consequences of the fall of the wood, if it is caused by a collision with some building. When a person carrying wood, or some one in charge of an animal with a load of wood, enters a market and causes damage to person or property, he is responsible if there is a crowd, but not otherwise. A blind man, or a person with his back turned at the moment the animal passes, may only make a claim against the individual we are speaking of, if he has torn their clothes without warning them to get out of the way. This responsibility, however, only exists where the owner of the things damaged has committed no imprudence; for if he has, for example, deposited things on the public road, or placed them before the animal, his claim is unfounded. The owner of a domestic animal that has broken its leash and damaged a sown field is not responsible for the accident if the damage is caused by day. On the other hand, he is responsible if it happens by night, unless :—

1. The animal escapes after being properly tied up.

2. The owner of the field was present at the spot, but neglected to protect his crop from the trespassing animal.

3. †The field was surrounded by a wall or other inclosure in which there was a gate that the owner had left open.

‡The owner of a cat that has eaten a bird or some food belonging to another person is responsible only if he knew that the animal was particularly voracious. It is of no consequence whether the fact occurred by night or by day. †Where, on the contrary, the owner was ignorant of the cat's voracity he is not responsible for the damage it has caused.

BOOK 57.—MILITARY EXPEDITIONS

SECTION 1

WAR against infidels was already during the lifetime of the Prophet an obligation for which the Moslem community was jointly responsible ; though some authorities maintain that at that period it was an obligation incumbent upon each individual Moslem. As to the nature of this obligation in modern times the following distinctions must be made :—

1. War against infidels living in their own country is a common obligation ; that is to say that if a sufficient number of Moslems acquit themselves of it, the others may lawfully remain at home. Among obligations for which the Moslem community is responsible in common, and not individually, are also included that of defending the faith and refuting infidel errors ; that of solving difficulties as to religious practices ; that of the study of the sciences relating to the law, such as the interpretation of the Koran and the criticism of traditions ; that of the study of the solution of subordinate questions of jurisprudence, so that justice may be done ; that of exhorting people to do good and abstain from evil ; that of taking care that the sacred temple of Mecca should be visited each year by a large number of the faithful ; that of relieving the sufferings of Moslems by giving clothing and nourishment to those that are in need, at any rate if the charity tax and the public treasury do not suffice ; that of appearing as witness and making a deposition ; and that of making a study of trades, arts, and all that serves to ameliorate the lot of man. For an assembly it is a common obligation to return a salutation. As to this last obligation, the reader should be informed that the Sonna has introduced the practice that a person who is performing a duty of nature, or is at table or in a bath, need not either give or acknowledge a salutation ; even individually. To return to the subject, the obligation to take part in the war against infidels does not apply to a minor, a lunatic, a woman, a sick person, a man obviously lame, a man wanting a hand or a foot, or one of whose limbs is mutilated, a slave, nor to a man who has not the arms and equipment necessary for the war. Moreover, any excuse that is valid for not accomplishing the pilgrimage, is also valid for not taking part in the war for the propagation of the faith, except fear of being assaulted on the way by the infidels, ††or by highway robbers even though Moslems. Debts due instanter are an obstacle to the departure of the debtor, whether for the war against the infidels or for any other journey, unless it is undertaken with his creditor's consent ; but debts due upon a certain date to come are no obstacle to one's quitting one's domicile ; unless, according to some authorities, the journey is one of exceptional danger. Nor can one lawfully depart for a war against infidels until authorised to do so by one's ascendants, if Moslems ; such authorisation, however, is not necessary for a traveller who goes for the purpose of inquiry as to his religious duties, whether individual †or collective. An authorisation by a creditor or by ascendants is revocable so long as one is not actually enrolled ; but if the revocation does not occur until one is about to fight, it is rigorously forbidden to pay any attention to it.

2. Infidels who invade our territory should be driven out by armed force by all possible means, and by all the inhabitants of the territory invaded, poor, children, debtors, and slaves, without previous authorisation. According to a few authorities a slave should obtain his master's authorisation where there are enough free men. If it is impossible to offer the enemy an organised resistance, each Moslem attacked by infidels should defend his life by all possible means, if he has to deal with miscreants who do not allow quarter ; otherwise he may allow himself to be taken prisoner. Under these circumstances to enroll oneself is a duty not only for persons domiciled in the threatened locality, but also for all who live at a distance not permitting of the abridgment of prayer. Travellers from a greater distance than this, who happen to be temporarily at the spot, are obliged to take arms if the inhabitants of the town and suburbs need assistance ; and even this condition is disallowed by some authorities. †When the infidels have made a Moslem prisoner of war, they should be attacked immediately in order to deliver him, if there is any chance of success.

SECTION 2

It is blamable to invade the territory of infidels without the authorisation of the Sovereign or of his deputy. The Sonna also requires that the Sovereign should give precise and detailed instructions to the commander he has appointed for each detachment ordered upon an expedition, and should have an oath administered to each warrior to remain faithful to the flag.

The Sovereign has a right to enroll as auxiliary troops—

1. Infidels whose treachery he does not fear ; provided that the number of Moslems is always high enough to oppose twice the number of infidels.

2. Slaves, with their master's consent.

3. Minors near their majority, and of sufficient strength to stand a campaign.

All these irregular troops receive their ammunition, equipment, arms, etc., either from the public treasury, or from particular funds of the Sovereign. Moreover, it is not lawful to enroll Moslems, for the war against the infidels, as mercenaries, for the propagation of the faith is a religious duty for each believer ; but the Sovereign may legally enroll in that manner his infidel subjects ; and indeed, according to some authorities, any person may do so.

It is blamable for a Moslem forming part of an army in campaign to kill his near relatives who are infidels, and all the more his relatives within the prohibited degrees. [Unless he hears them blaspheme God and the Prophet.]

In a war against infidels it is forbidden to kill minors, lunatics, women, and hermaphrodites that do not incline towards the masculine sex ; *but one may lawfully kill monks, mercenaries in the service of the infidels, old men, persons that are weak, blind, or sickly, even though they have taken no part in the fighting, nor given information to the enemy. If they are not killed, they must at any rate be reduced to slavery. The wives of infidels should also be reduced to slavery, and infidels' property should be confiscated. It is lawful to besiege infidels in their towns and fortresses, and employ against them inundation, fire, and warlike machines ; and to attack them unawares at night, without having regard to the presence among them of a Moslem prisoner or merchant, for whom these general methods of destruction may be equally dangerous. This is the doctrine of our school. By virtue of this same principle one may even shoot women and children, if the infidels continue the combat while hiding behind them ; *but this must not be done if the infidels conceal themselves thus with the sole object of saving their own lives, and the nature of the military operations does not make it absolutely necessary to have recourse to extreme measures. †The same principles must be followed where infidels conceal themselves behind Moslems. Our combatants have no right to retire before the infidels, unless the number of the latter exceeds twice that of our troops, except in the case where one retires in order to return to the charge on another side, or where one falls back upon the reserve in order to recruit strength. In such a case one may retire, †even if the reserve is at some distance ; but in that case one cannot claim one's share in the booty captured in one's absence ; †as one may do if the reserve is close by. On the other hand, one may legally retire before the enemy, where their number exceeds twice the number of our troops ; †with the single exception that if, e.g. one hundred able-bodied Moslems are attacked by one hundred and one infidels, the Moslems must hold out against them if the infidels are wholly or partly weak men.

Each Moslem soldier may engage in single combat with an infidel soldier. It is even commendable to accept a challenge ; but the Moslem who sends a challenge is praiseworthy only if he is certain of his aptitude in handling his arms, and the Sovereign gives his consent.

It is lawful to destroy the houses and plantations of infidels, where this is necessary from a military point of view, or if it renders the victory easier ; it is even a good thing to have recourse to this measure in all cases where it is unlikely that the houses and plantations will one day become our property. Where this is probable it is better not to proceed to destroy them. It is rigorously forbidden to kill infidels' domestic animals, except cattle for our food, and their cavalry horses which can always be killed either in the defence or in the attack. Where it is feared that the cattle taken from the enemy may fall again into their hands, or that this cattle may cause us some annoyance, it may be killed.

SECTION 3

Women and minors of the infidels made prisoners of war should be reduced to slavery ; and slaves taken in their country become ours. As to free adults, males, the Sovereign may choose between the five following courses, as seems to him most advantageous for the Moslems ; that is to say he may either :—

1. Put them to death.
2. Give them their liberty.
3. Exchange them for Moslem prisoners of war.
4. Release them for a ransom.
5. Reduce them to slavery.

Where circumstances do not indicate which of these measures is to be preferred, the prisoners should be retained until the best method becomes clear. Some authorities do not allow an idolater to be made a slave, and one jurist considers this to be unlawful for a pagan Arab. An infidel prisoner of war who embraces the faith saves his life in all cases by so doing ; and the Sovereign has with regard to him a choice between methods Nos. 2 to 5. According, however, to other authorities, such a prisoner must always be reduced to slavery. The conversion of an infidel before his defeat assures him not only of life but of possession of his property and of his children who are under age ; but our school does not extend this favour to his wife.

A woman who is reduced to slavery ceases immediately to belong to her husband ; though, according to some authorities, the marriage, if it has been consummated, remains good until the end of the period of legal retirement, as the woman may be enfranchised before its termination. The wife of an infidel subject of our Sovereign made a prisoner of war, †for a prisoner of war previously enfranchised by such infidel, may be reduced to slavery ; but not, according to our school, the infidel wife or infidel enfranchised slave of a Moslem. The captivity of both husband and wife, or of one of them, involves the dissolution of the marriage, in the case of free persons ; and even, according to some authorities, in the case of persons already slaves. But captivity does not affect the debts contracted by the prisoner of war during his freedom in favour of a Moslem or of an infidel subject of our Sovereign. These debts are recoverable from the prisoner's property seized after his reduction to slavery. Where two infidels not our subjects have contracted a debt towards each other, or one has bought something from the other, the agreement holds good if both embrace the faith, or become the subjects of our Sovereign liable to a poll-tax. †But damages due for some material loss cannot be recovered if both embrace Islam.

By the term " booty of war " is understood—

1. Property taken by force from the enemy.
2. Property abstracted from the territory of the enemy, either by oneself or in the company of others, in a furtive manner.
3. †Property found upon the enemy's territory that cannot be supposed to belong to a Moslem ; for otherwise the regular announcements must be made, and the appropriation take place, in conformity with the requirements of the law relating to things found.

Soldiers may freely take from the booty all necessary food, and also what is required for preparing it, including meat, fat, and other ordinary provisions. They may also take the necessary forage for their animals, straw, barley, and so on ; they may kill the infidels' cattle for their personal needs, ††and they may take not only food properly so-called, but also fruit. ††They are not liable for the value of the cattle thus killed, and need not limit themselves to what is strictly necessary ; but these requisitions are forbidden to marauders who only join the army after the end of the war, and after the booty has been collected. ††And the portion that has been levied by way of requisition and not yet employed upon return to Moslem territory must go into the total booty to be divided. It is only upon the territory of the enemy that these requisitions may be levied, †and also upon the space between the utmost Moslem habitations and the boundaries of our Empire.

A lawful claimant may renounce his share in the booty, provided he is capable of administering his property himself ; even if he happens to have been declared bankrupt. The only condition required is that he must declare his intention before the partition, ‡or rather before the reservation of the fifth to be shared amongst those who have taken the booty. Such renunciation need not be expressed by each individual, but may be the intention of a whole troop. In no case may a member of the Prophet's family renounce his claim to the share reserved to him ; nor may one renounce one's right to the equipment of a slain foe. A person renouncing his share in the booty is in the same position as one not present at the battle. The claim of a soldier who dies before receiving his share falls to his heirs.

The booty becomes the property of those entitled to it only by the fact of distribution ; though before this they may take possession of it provisionally. Some jurists consider that right of property in the booty is acquired at the moment the booty is taken ; and others attribute to the distribution a retroactive force, which means that if the booty taken by a soldier is assigned him as his share, he is considered to have had full ownership of it from the moment he took it, whereas on the contrary supposition his right of ownership has never existed. The immovable property forming part of the booty is, so far as regards appropriation, regulated by the same law as movable property ; even objects forbidden to Moslems, such as dogs, may be attributed to the person having a claim to them, and who wishes to accept them, provided he can make some profit out of them. If claims are made to forbidden things by several persons entitled to them, they must be equally divided between them ; and where this is impossible, the matter must be decided by casting lots.

††The country of Sawad in Irak was conquered from the infidels and divided amongst the soldiers of the army, who afterwards made a gift of it to the state. It was then made wakaf in favour of the Moslem community ; and the annual land tax paid by the cultivators has become the rent. The revenue has been employed in the public interest. The country of Sawad extends in length from Abbadan to Haditha in the neighbourhood of Mosul, and in breadth from Kadisia to Holwan. [††The town and suburb of Basra, though included in the country of Sawad, is regulated by this law only so far as concerns one spot situated to the west of the Tigris and another situated to the east of that river.]

The city of Mecca surrendered to the Prophet by virtue of a capitulation, and was not taken by assault ; consequently its houses and cultivated fields remained in the full possession of their inhabitants.

SECTION 4

An adult, sane Moslem may grant a safe-conduct or quarter to one or more enemies ; provided it is for a fixed number, and the act is done of his own free will, and not under any constraint. †Thus a Moslem who is a prisoner of war amongst infidels, cannot grant a safe-conduct. But the law does not insist, for the validity of either safe-conduct or quarter, that any special words shall be used, provided the terms employed clearly express the intention. A document may be drawn up, or the grant may be made by letter, provided only that the infidel whom one wishes to benefit is informed of it. A safe-conduct or a grant of quarter is null and void if the infidel declares that he declines it ; †for even if he does not formally accept it ; but the acceptance may, however, if necessary, be expressed by signs.

A safe-conduct or a grant of quarter cannot be given for a period exceeding four months ; only one authority admits a validity for any period less than a year. Moreover, the law requires that the grant should not prejudice the interest of the Moslems ; it is forbidden, for example, to grant a safe-conduct to a spy. On the other hand, the Sovereign should respect a safe-conduct or a grant of quarter duly obtained, so long as he has no reason to fear fraud or intrigue on the part of the infidel. A safe-conduct or a grant of quarter are purely personal, and cannot be transferred to the family or property of the infidel, whether these are still in the enemy's territory, †for the infidel has taken them with him ; all without prejudice to any special stipulations that may be made upon the subject.

The law recommends a Moslem inhabiting an infidel country to emigrate, even though he may enjoy there the free exercise of his religion ; and this emigration becomes obligatory if he is deprived of the exercise of his religion, and he possesses the means enabling him to emigrate. A Moslem made prisoner of war by infidels should endeavour to escape upon the first opportunity. If released unreservedly he may do the enemy all the harm he can even by means of an ambush. On the other hand, this is forbidden where he has accepted liberty in exchange for granting infidels a safe-conduct, or granting them quarter. Infidels endeavouring to accompany the prisoner must be repulsed, and if necessary, killed ; and it is forbidden to keep a promise to remain in the territory of the enemy, after being released on parole.

The Sovereign may take one of the infidels into his service as a guide to point out the way to some fortress, and promise him by way of recompense some gift such as one of the young women to be made prisoners. Under these circumstances the woman must be given him if the fortress is taken in consequence of the information supplied, †but not if it is taken in some other manner. If the fortress is not taken the guide receives nothing. Some authorities allow him even then a reasonable remuneration in proportion to the service he has rendered ; unless there was an express stipulation that nothing would be due to him in case of failure. Moreover, the contract with the guide admits of the following distinctions :—

1. Nothing is due to him if there is no young woman in the fortress ; or if she was already dead at the time the contract was made ; or even if she died after this, but before the fortress was taken.

2. The guide should be remunerated in some other manner :—

(a) If the young woman dies after the taking of the fortress, but before being handed over to the guide.

(b) If she embraces the faith, at any rate according to our school.

The remuneration consists in a reasonable sum ; or, according to some authorities, in the value of the young woman.

BOOK 58.—THE POLL-TAX

CHAPTER I.—GENERAL PROVISIONS

SECTION 1

WHEN it is desired to impose a poll-tax upon infidels the following terms are employed :—" I establish you upon Moslem territory," or " I grant you permission to live there on condition of paying a poll-tax, and submitting to our laws." †It is necessary to stipulate the amount of the tax ; but it is not necessary to add a clause to the effect that the infidels must abstain from uttering insults against God, Mohammed, or Islam. Our school forbids stipulating for a poll-tax for a specified term ; and moreover an agreement to pay the tax is not complete unless it is formally accepted by the infidels. An infidel found upon Moslem territory, without any such agreement, who declares that he has come there either to hear the word of God, or as ambassador, or under a safe-conduct granted by a Moslem, has a presumption in his favour. This presumption is only rebuttable as to the safe-conduct.

An agreement for the payment of poll-tax can be concluded only by the Sovereign or his deputy. The proposals of the infidels with regard to this must be taken into consideration, unless the person charged by them with the negotiation is a suspected person. Such an agreement may be come to only with Jews, Christians, and Fire-worshippers, provided the peoples concerned already practised their religion before the mission of Mohammed, or at any rate at some uncertain date. This benefit extends also to those who think themselves in possession of books revealed to Abraham or of the Psalter of David ; it even extends, according to our rite, to individuals one of whose parents is an adherent of a religion founded upon some holy book, and the other an idolater.

A woman, a hermaphrodite, a slave even when partially enfranchised, a minor and a lunatic are exempt from poll-tax. A lunatic, however, owes the tax, if he has only rare attacks of madness, e.g. once a month or once a year ; †as to a lunatic whose attacks are in rapid succession, e.g. every day, he owes payment of the tax only when his lucid intervals added together amount to a year. The son of an infidel subject of our Sovereign owes, upon his majority the same poll-tax as the other inhabitants of his country ; and as soon as he has paid it, the law assumes that a new agreement has been come to with him to this effect ; though, according to some authorities, the agreement effected with his father should be considered as ipso facto extending to him. Our school insists upon the payment of poll-tax by sickly persons, old men, even if decrepit, blind men, monks, workmen, and poor persons incapable of exercising a trade. As to persons who are found to be insolvent at the end of the year, the amount of the tax remains due from them until they become solvent again.

No infidel may establish his domicile in the Hejaz, i.e. at Mecca, Medina, Yamama, or the villages situated in the suburbs of these sacred cities. Some jurists, it is true, allow that they may have their domicile on the side of the great roads uniting these towns. An infidel may not even enter the Hejaz without the permission of the Sovereign, even to cross the country, under penalty of being taken to the frontier, and also of having to undergo punishment at the discretion of the court, if he acts knowingly. An infidel, however, who asks for permission to cross the Hejaz should obtain it if his journey is in the interest of Moslems, e.g. if he comes as ambassador or to import necessities for the inhabitants. But if he wishes to import other things the Sovereign may not permit it without levying a tax upon his goods and requiring him to leave within three days. Entry into the sacred territory of Mecca is absolutely forbidden to infidels, even as ambassadors. If a duly qualified ambassador should approach, the Sovereign or his delegate should go out to meet him and give him audience upon the limit of the territory. An infidel who, in spite of the prohibition, enters the sacred territory and falls sick there, should be carried out to the boundary, even though this is likely to cause death ; and if he dies upon the sacred territory not only must he not be buried in it, but if the burial has already taken place the corpse must be disinterred. Where, on the other hand, it is not upon the sacred territory of Mecca, but in some other part of the Hejaz, there the infidel falls sick, and the carrying out of the body would involve great difficulty, it may be left at the spot where it is ; otherwise it must be immediately taken away. By virtue of the same principle the corpse of an infidel who has died in any other part of the Hejaz than the sacred territory of Mecca requires merely to be carried out beyond the limits of that province, where this can be done without too great inconvenience, but otherwise it may be buried in the place where it is.

SECTION 2

The minimum amount of the poll-tax is one dinar per person per annum ; but it is commendable to raise the amount, if it be possible to two dinars, for those possessed of moderate means, and to four for rich persons. Infidels who promise payment of the tax at a higher rate are none the less liable for this higher amount, although they may subsequently discover that, strictly speaking, they need not have promised more than the minimum of one dinar ; †and if they refuse to pay the amount agreed upon, they should be treated as people who fail to carry out their engagements towards us. An infidel who embraces Islam in the third year after the conquest owes poll-tax only for the two previous years, and not for the third ; and the same rule applies to the infidel who dies during the third year. In the latter case the amount due by him is a debt owing by his estate in preference to the legacies, but ranking equal with other civil debts according to our school. In case of conversion or decease during the course of any year a proportional amount of poll-tax is due for that year ; according to one jurist nothing at all is due in these circumstances.

An infidel who has to pay his poll-tax should be treated by the tax-collector with disdain ; the collector remaining seated and the infidel standing before him, the head bent and the body bowed. The infidel should personally place the money in the balance, while the collector holds him by the beard and strikes him upon both cheeks. These practices, however, according to most jurists, are merely commendable, but not obligatory, as some think. The latter forbid an infidel to commission a Moslem to pay the poll-tax for him, or to pay it by means of the transfer of a debt due to him by a Moslem, or to get a Moslem to be answerable for it. Most jurists, however, permit these usages. [For a collector to act in the manner here described is absolutely forbidden, and it is a grave error to declare it to be commendable.]

The law recommends that the Sovereign should also stipulate that the infidels should as much as possible practice hospitality in regard to Moslem travellers passing through their country, all without prejudice to the legal minimum of the poll-tax. It is true that some jurists maintain that this charge may be taken into account when it is desired to ascertain whether the infidels do pay the minimum. †In any case, however, the duty of hospitality must not be imposed upon the poor, but only upon the rich and those in the enjoyment of moderate means. When stipulating for the practice of hospitality the Sovereign should mention the number of guests each individual must receive, the men and their horses ; the nature and the quantity of the food, as well principal as accessory, due to each individual ; and the forage for the animals. The guests should be lodged either in the church or in the synagogue or in the best uninhabited house in the place. The length of stay should be stipulated up to a maximum of three days.

The Sovereign may accept the offer of the infidels to pay the charity-tax, instead of the poll-tax, provided that the interest of the Moslems is not opposed to that course ; and provided that the charity-tax paid by the infidels is double that of the ordinary charity-tax ; that is to say that they pay two shahs for five camels, two “ bent makhad ” for twenty-five camels, one dinar for twenty dinars, ten drahms for two hundred drahms, and a fifth instead of a tenth. †Moreover, the excess that the tax-payer may recover by giving two “ bent makhad ” is not doubled in the case of an infidel ; *but where the taxable property does not reach the minimum taxable a proportional charity-tax is not exacted. The charity tax levied in this way is legally considered as a poll-tax, and is so distributed. In consequence it follows that nothing is levied from persons who are for some reason exempt from poll-tax, e.g. women, even where their property reaches the minimum taxable.

SECTION 3

The obligations which we undertake, when stipulating for a poll-tax, are as follows :—

1. To abstain from any hostile act against the infidels concerned ; that is to say that we are responsible for any damage illegally caused by us to their person or property.

2. To protect them against attacks on the part of infidels not subject to our laws ; and also against other enemies, external and internal. This obligation, however, does not exist, according to some jurists, where the tax-payers do not fix their domicile amongst us, but occupy a separate territory.

Infidels who by virtue of the poll-tax are subjects of our Sovereign must be forbidden to build churches or synagogues in a town founded by us and whose inhabitants embraced Islam of their own free will. As to places taken by assault the infidels must abstain, not from building new churches or synagogues there, †but even from using for that purpose any such edifices as may be already there. Where, on the other hand, the country submitted by virtue of a capitulation, the following cases must be distinguished :—

1. If the capitulation is to the effect that the land shall be ours, but the infidels are to remain there by title of hereditary possession, they may continue to make use of it ; †but if nothing is decided upon the subject of these edifices, they may not put them to that use.

2. If the capitulation is to the effect that the infidels continue to be owners of the land, they may not only continue to make use of their churches or synagogues, †but may even build new ones.

Some jurists merely recommend, but the majority declare it obligatory, that the infidels should be forbidden to have houses higher than those of their Moslem neighbours, †or even to have them as high ; a rule, however, that does not apply to the infidels who inhabit a separate quarter. An infidel subject of our Sovereign may not ride a horse ; but a donkey or a mule is permitted him, whatever may be its value. He must use an ikaf, and wooden spurs, those of iron being forbidden him, as well as a saddle. He must go to the side of the road to let a Moslem pass. He must not be treated as a person of importance, nor given the first place at a gathering. He should be distinguished by a suit of coloured cloth and a girdle outside his clothes. If he enters a bathing-house where there are Moslems, or if he undresses anywhere else in their presence, the infidel should wear round his neck an iron or leaden necklace, or some other mark of servitude. He is forbidden to offend Moslems, either by making them hear his false doctrines, or by speaking aloud of Esdras or of the Messiah, or by ostentatiously drinking wine or eating pork. And infidels are forbidden to sound the bells of their churches or of their synagogues, or celebrate ostentatiously their sacrilegious rites.

When the infidels do not observe the conditions imposed on them, the agreement made with them remains none the less intact, but they must be forced from that time to fulfil their engagements more strictly. It is only when they make war upon us, or refuse to pay the poll-tax or to submit to our laws, that the agreement is ipso facto broken, and we are freed from our obligations in that respect. When an infidel commits the crime of fornication with a Moslem woman, or makes her his wife ; or shows our enemies the places where our frontiers are exposed ; or seeks to turn a Moslem from the faith, or speaks insultingly of Islam or of the Koran, or defames the Prophet—†the agreement, so far as it concerns him is ipso facto broken, provided that this penal clause has been expressly stipulated. *An infidel who breaks the agreement by armed force should be at once resisted and killed. An infidel who breaks the agreement in any other way cannot claim to be deported to his own country ; but the Sovereign may have him killed or reduced to slavery, or may pardon him or release him for a ransom, as may seem to him most advantageous. He cannot, however, be made a slave if he embraces Islam before the Sovereign decides upon his fate. †The loss of a safe conduct, or of a grant of quarter, does not affect an infidel's wife or children. An infidel who renounces the agreement made with us, and asks to be henceforth considered as an enemy, has a right to be conveyed in safety beyond our frontiers.

CHAPTER II.—ARMISTICES

THE Sovereign or his deputy has the right to grant an armistice to the infidels, in the case of the inhabitants of a country ; in the case of the inhabitants of a town, the governor of the frontier province may also grant it. An armistice is permitted only when there is some advantage for the Moslems ; if, for example, we are weak in number ; or if money and munitions of war fail us ; or if there is reason to hope that the infidels will be converted, or will offer to submit and pay poll-tax. An armistice which, though advantageous, is not caused by our weakness, may be agreed upon for four months ; *or more, provided it is for less than one year ; but if we are the weaker, a maximum period of ten years may be stipulated for. Where this maximum has been exceeded all jurists regard the armistice as valid for the legal period, and only the excess period to be illegal ; but an armistice is invalid where no precise period has been stipulated for ; ††or where some illegal clause is included in it. It is considered, for instance, an illegal clause to stipulate that persons made prisoners of war by the infidel shall not be released ; or that infidels shall retain property they have captured ; or that they shall pay a poll-tax of less than one dinar per person ; or that we shall pay them tribute, etc. On the other hand, it is quite lawful that the Sovereign, when granting an armistice should reserve the right of recommencing hostilities when he pleases. In any case the Sovereign should abstain from committing any act of hostility so long as the armistice lasts ; he should not begin again to wage war until after the legal expiration of the armistice, unless the infidels themselves terminate it by an explicit and formal declaration, or by again taking up arms, or by giving information to our enemies as to the places where our frontiers are exposed, or by killing a Moslem. At the end of the armistice one may attack the enemy immediately, either by day or by night. The armistice is broken as to all the infidels if some of them take up arms again, unless the others oppose it by words or actions. If these latter prove that they do not wish to break the armistice, and separate from those who are recommencing hostilities, and inform our Sovereign that they intend to keep their engagements, the armistice remains intact so far as they are concerned. All this, however, does not prevent the Sovereign from revoking the armistice at any moment, if he has reason to fear that the infidels have only consented to it in order to weave some intrigue ; in this case those who have established themselves in our country upon the faith of the treaty must be conveyed to the frontier. But the Sovereign must never revoke an armistice upon ill-founded suspicions.

In an armistice one may not promise to the infidels the extradition of a Moslem woman who has taken refuge with us ; an infraction of this rule renders illegal not only the clause but the whole treaty. *Even in a case where one has stipulated the extradition “ of all the refugees,” or said nothing about extradition, it is not necessary to restore to her husband the dower of a woman who has taken refuge with us. Extradition is also illegal in the case of a minor, a lunatic, and, according to our school, a slave or a free man who has no near relatives on the father’s side. If a refugee has such relatives, the extradition may take place only upon their demand ; but if the refugee has some power over the person who demands the extradition, and can consequently return to us when he pleases, extradition is lawful even upon the demand of some person not a near relative on the father’s side. Extradition consists in our ceasing to retain or to protect the individual claimed ; but the Sovereign should never force him to return to his country. The individual is free to remain amongst us ; and he may, if necessary, in the exercise of his right of legitimate defence, kill with impunity any one who seeks to take him. We may exhort him to resist, but may not formally counsel him to kill the person who seeks to take him. A stipulation that the infidels should surrender apostates from us is lawful and should be faithfully executed by them, under penalty of the armistice being considered ipso facto broken ; *though it may also be stipulated that apostates shall not be extradited.

BOOK 59.—HUNTING AND SLAUGHTER OF ANIMALS

SECTION 1

IN order that one may lawfully eat of the flesh of animals suitable for the nourishment of the body, the neck should be cut if possible either in the upper or the lower part ; where this is impossible, as in hunting, it is enough to cause some mortal wound. Flesh of animals otherwise slaughtered is forbidden to Moslems ; moreover the butcher and the hunter should be Moslems, or at any rate belong to those religious persuasions among whom Moslems may choose their wives. One may also eat of the flesh of an animal killed by a female infidel slave, professing a religion founded upon some holy book, although she cannot become the wife of a Moslem. The law forbids to eat of the flesh of an animal slaughtered or killed in hunting by a Moslem with the assistance of a fire-worshipper ; but where the Moslem and the fire-worshipper have both set their dogs or fired upon a piece of game, and it is the Moslem's dog or arrow that has killed it, before the other's dog or arrow reached it, this game may lawfully be eaten. It is the same where the game was not killed immediately, but left for dead upon the spot. Where, on the contrary, it is the fire-worshipper who has out-distanced the Moslem under these circumstances, or where they have both wounded the animal without causing immediate death, the flesh is forbidden. It does not matter then whether they wounded it at the same moment, or one after the other, or if they do not know which wound was the first. An animal is lawfully killed by a minor, *even though he may not have attained the age of discernment ; *by a lunatic ; *or by a drunkard ; but it is blamable for a blind man to undertake doing so ; †and hunting both by shooting and by coursing, is rigorously forbidden him.

Fish and locusts may be eaten, even if they have died a natural death, or been killed by a fire-worshipper ; †and the rules about slaughtering do not apply either to worms in food, such as vinegar and certain fruit, provided that these worms are swallowed with the food in which they occur. †And one may, strictly speaking, kill a fish by cutting it in pieces, or swallowing it alive ; though these cruelties are always blamable.

When one fires at a piece of game, or a fugitive camel or sheep, or when one lets loose upon these animals a hunting beast or a bird of prey, and when in this way they are wounded and die in a few moments, the flesh may be eaten although the neck has not been cut. A domestic animal that has fallen into a well where its neck cannot be cut is subject to the same law as the fugitive camel. [†One should not kill a domestic animal fallen into a well by letting loose upon it a hunting dog, at any rate it has been so established by Er Royani and Esh Shashi.]

An animal may not be killed in any other than the ordinary way if it is easy to run after it and catch it, or to do so by the help of another person. In any case the law requires that a fugitive domestic animal, or one fallen into a well, should receive a mortal wound; and some jurists even maintain that the wound should cause immediate death.

One may lawfully eat of a piece of game killed by means of an arrow, or of a hunting dog, or of a bird of prey, if one only reached it at the moment it ceased to live, or even after its death, and so could not give it the coup de grace, and it died of the wound it had received. This is, however, on condition that it is not the hunter's fault that he was unable to deal the animal the decisive blow, e.g. if it was dead before he could draw his knife, or before he could get hold of it so as to kill it. Consequently, an animal killed while hunting in the manner we have just described is forbidden, if the hunter by his fault has let it die of the wound it received, although this wound was not immediately mortal, e.g. if he went out hunting without his knife, or if he let another hunter take it, or if the knife was firmly fixed in the sheath. When one fires upon a piece of game so as to cut it in two, the flesh of each half may lawfully be eaten; and even when a member of the animal's body has been cut in this way, both this member and the rest of the body may be eaten, provided the wound was immediately fatal. But if the wound did not immediately cause death, so that the animal has had to be killed either in the normal way, or by giving it a second and decisive blow, the rest of the body may be eaten, but not the member cut by the original wound. Only where it is impossible to give the animal a decisive wound or to kill it in the ordinary way may all the body be eaten. Some authorities, however, consider that the cut member is prohibited even in these circumstances.

The slaughtering of any animal that has been in one's power is effected by cutting the larynx and the œsophagus; it is commendable to cut also at the same time the two jugular veins. To slaughter an animal by cutting the nape of the neck is forbidden; and the flesh of an animal so killed may be eaten only if the butcher perceives his error and cuts at once the larynx and the œsophagus, before the animal ceases to live.

Nor may one eat the flesh of a fox that has been killed by introducing a knife into the ears, as some hunters do in order not to spoil the skin.

The Sonna has introduced the following practices relative to the slaughtering of animals :—

1. Camels are killed by cutting the throat near the chest ; in the case of bullocks and small cattle the throat is cut higher up ; though, strictly speaking, one may do the opposite of this.

2. Camels are killed standing upon their four legs ; as to bullocks and small cattle, they are made to lie upon the left side, the right foreleg being free and the three others strongly bound.

3. The slaughtering knife is sharpened.

4. The animal's head is turned in the direction of the holy temple of Mecca.

5. One should pronounce the formula, " In the name of God," and invoke His blessing upon the Prophet ; but one should never say, " In the name of God and of Mahommed," as do some of the faithful.

SECTION 2

For the regular slaughtering of animals that one has had in one's power, and for the hunting of animals that one has not had in one's power, one may lawfully use any instrument for cutting, suitable for causing a wound, without caring whether it is an instrument of iron, copper, gold, wood, reed, stone, or glass ; provided it is not of horn, ivory, or bone. The law forbids the eating of the flesh of animals killed by an instrument for bruising, or for both bruising and cutting, such as a ball, a lash, an arrow without a point, and not sharpened, an arrow and a ball together, or an arrow whose point and shaft have both dealt a mortal wound while the game was in motion. The same principle prevents one eating the flesh of animals strangled in a hunter's net, or of an animal wounded by an arrow and fallen from some height and killed by the fall.

Hunting by coursing is lawful, either with hunting beasts or by birds of prey ; as e.g. with a dog, a cheetah, or a white or ordinary falcon, provided that these animals are trained to remain quiet upon their master's order, to attack the game the moment they are let loose, and to seize it with their claws or their teeth without eating it. *This last condition, however, concerns only birds of prey and not dogs, etc. Its training must have accustomed the beast to hunting so that one may be sure that it will not eat the game. Where the hunting beast devours the game in spite of this, the flesh is prohibited, and the beast must be trained again. It matters little if the beast licks the blood of its prey. As to the part of the body rendered impure by the dog's bite, it need merely be washed with water and sand, in order to become lawfully edible. It is not necessary to take out and throw away this part of the body. *It is also lawful to eat a piece of game attacked by a hunting beast or a bird of prey and killed by the beast's weight or the force of the fall.

The law forbids eating—

1. A piece of game wounded by a knife dropped from the hand by accident.

2. A sheep that has rubbed or knocked against a knife held in the hand, so that the throat is cut, even though both larynx and œsophagus may be cut through.

3. A piece of game pursued and killed by a dog of its own accord ; even though the master, seeing the dog started, may have urged it on.

On the other hand, the game is lawfully killed where an arrow reaches it driven accidentally by the wind ; †though its flesh is forbidden if the arrow has been drawn at random, to test it, or upon some object, and then driven by the wind upon the game so as to kill it. A person who fires upon a piece of game that he took for a stone, or upon a troop of gazelles of which he hit only one, may eat of the flesh of the slain animal. ‡And similarly, if he fires upon a particular piece of game and kills another. When a dog let loose upon a piece of game flies away out of sight of the hunter, and the game is afterwards found dead, the law forbids that it should be eaten. *The same principle requires one to abstain from eating the flesh of a piece of game that has escaped from the hunter's sight after he has wounded it, and the body of which has only been found later.

SECTION 3

A hunter becomes owner of the game he has seized in his hand, or upon which he has inflicted an immediately mortal wound, or which he has rendered incapable of defending itself or of escaping, or whose wings he has broken, or which he has taken in a net placed for that object, or which he has driven into a place from which it cannot escape. †The owner of a piece of land has not yet acquired the ownership of a piece of game that comes upon his land and remains in the mud, etc., until he actually takes possession of it. The ownership of the game, once acquired, remains until the animal escapes, by its own effort or by the act of the owner. Thus a pigeon perched upon another person's dove-cot should be restored to the owner, and where the pigeon is so mixed up among the other pigeons of the dove-cot that it can no longer be distinguished, then neither the owner of the dove-cot where it is, nor the owner of the pigeon, can by sale or gift transfer the ownership of any of the pigeons of the dove-cot ; †though such a transfer, made by the owner of the pigeon to the owner of the dove-cot is perfectly valid. The owner of the pigeon and that of the dove-cot can, moreover, jointly transfer the whole of the dove-cot and pigeons to any one else, provided that the number of the pigeons is known, and that they are all of the same value.

Where two persons fire, one after the other, upon the same piece of game, and both wound it, the following cases must be distinguished :—

1. If the second hunter causes the game a wound immediately mortal or so serious as to render the animal incapable of defending itself or of escaping, it belongs to him. In this case the wound given by the first hunter is of no consequence.

2. If the wound caused by the first hunter is immediately mortal or so serious as to render the animal incapable of defending itself or of escaping, the game belongs to him unless the wound caused by the second hunter cuts the larynx and the œsophagus. In these latter circumstances the game belongs to the second hunter, and may be lawfully eaten provided he pays the first hunter damage for having killed the game which the first hunter had already secured. If the second hunter kills the game, already incapable of defending itself or of escaping, not by cutting the larynx and œsophagus but in some other manner, or if he gives it a wound not immediately mortal in itself, but fatal in combination with the previous wound, the flesh of that game is forbidden. But the second hunter must pay the first its value.

Where the two hunters fire at the same time and wound the game, either in some way immediately fatal, or so seriously as to render it incapable of defending itself or of escaping, the game belongs to them both in common. If only one of the two caused the wound in question, the game belongs to him.. But our school forbids that the game should be eaten if one of the hunters causes a wound immediately fatal, and the other a wound rendering it incapable of defending itself or of escaping, and it is not known which of the two wounds was given first.

BOOK 60.—SACRIFICES

SECTION 1

THE Sonna has introduced the custom of sacrifices that are obligatory only for the person who has imposed them upon himself as a duty. The Sonna prescribes moreover to him who would immolate a victim upon the tenth day of the month Zul Hejja not to cut his hair or his nails before completing this act of devotion, and to discharge the duty in person, or at least be present. One cannot immolate by way of sacrifice any other animals but camels, bullocks, and small cattle ; and the camels must have attained their sixteenth year, the bullocks and goats their third, and the sheep their second. It matters little if the animal be male or female or castrated. Though a camel or a bullock suffices for seven persons, and one head of small cattle for one person only, it is preferable to immolate a camel on one's own account, a bullock taking the second rank, a sheep the third, and a goat the last. Seven head of small cattle are preferable to a camel. It is commendable to immolate a single head of small cattle on one's own account, rather than to join with others in immolating a camel. The animal sacrificed should be exempt from defects that prejudice the quantity or quality of the flesh ; one cannot take a thin animal, or one attacked by rabies ; or an animal wanting an ear or an eye ; or a lame, sickly or manifestly mangy beast. But there is no objection to immolating an animal that is but slightly affected by one of these physical defects, or one that has lost its horns, or one that has its ears split, torn, or pierced.

[†As to mange, it is enough that the animal should be affected by it, to however slight an extent, to render it unsuitable for sacrifice. This is Shafii's personal opinion.]

The hour of sacrifice on the occasion of the pilgrimage, on the prescribed day called yaum en nahr, is that when the sun has reached the height of a lance, after which one must still pray two rakas and listen to two short sermons before proceeding to the ceremony. It must be finished by the last of the three following days, called ayyam at tashrik, at sunset. [It is merely preferable, but not obligatory, that the sun should have risen to such and such a height ; for, strictly speaking, one may proceed to the ceremony as soon as the sun has risen and the time necessary for the rakas and the sermons has elapsed.]

The believer who has made a vow to immolate a particular animal by saying, "By God, I undertake to immolate such-and-such an animal," must keep his engagement at the hour prescribed; but if the animal dies before this he owes nothing unless he killed it himself. In the latter case he must buy another animal of equal value and sacrifice it. On the other hand, the believer who vows to sacrifice an animal, and afterwards specifies a particular beast, must keep his engagement at the hour prescribed; †but if the animal dies the original vow still remains obligatory.

The act of immolation should be accompanied by an intention; except in case of a particular victim, †for where one has already uttered the words, "This animal will serve for my sacrifice." A person who does not perform the sacrifice himself may express his intention either at the moment he gives the animal to his agent or when the latter proceeds to the immolation.

The sacrificer may himself eat the flesh of a supererogatory victim, or give it to his guests, even though the latter may be rich enough to pay for their own meal; in this latter case, however, they may not be permitted to take away any of the flesh. For one's private table one may only dispose of a third, or, according to one authority, of a half, of the flesh. The rest, or, better still, the whole, should be given to the poor; with the exception, however, of one or two mouthfuls which must always be eaten as a sacrament. As to the skin one may either give it away or make use of it oneself, as one chooses. In the case of an obligatory sacrifice a believer has a right to eat the whole of the victim, as well as the young of the animal immolated, which, though it has a separate existence, follows the same rule as its mother. Milk left in the udder of the animal may be drunk.

A slave may not sacrifice. If his master authorises him to perform such act of devotion, it is in his master's favour. Even a slave undergoing enfranchisement by contract may not sacrifice without his master's consent. Nor may one immolate a victim for a third party without his consent; nor for a deceased person who has not so directed in his will.

SECTION 2

The Sonna has also introduced the practice of a sacrifice upon the occasion of the first shaving of a child's head. This sacrifice consists of two shahs for a boy, and one shah for a girl; it being of course understood that the victim is subject to the already mentioned prescriptions as regards age, absence of physical defects, and also as to the permission of eating the flesh or giving it to other persons to eat.

The Sonna requires for this sacrifice in particular—

1. That the victim should be cooked without breaking the bones.
2. That it should be immolated upon the seventh day after the birth of the child.
3. That on the same day the child should be given a name.
4. That the child's head should be shaved after the sacrifice ; and the weight of the hair in gold or silver given to the poor.
5. That the first call to prayer should be uttered into the child's ear immediately after birth.
6. That its palate should be rubbed with dates.

BOOK 61.—EATABLES

ALL manner of fish may serve as lawful nourishment, however they have been killed or if they have died a natural death ; †and it is the same with aquatic animals that are not fish properly so called. Some authorities, however, maintain that aquatic animals not comprised under the denomination of fish cannot be eaten ; others consider that this depends upon whether their terrestrial namesakes are eatable or not. Consequently neither the dog-fish nor the sea-hog can be eaten any more than a dog or a pig. Amphibians such as frogs, crayfish, and serpents are all forbidden food.

Amongst animals living only upon the land, the flesh of which may lawfully be eaten, may be mentioned cattle belonging to the camel, bovine, caprine, or ovine race ; one may also eat the flesh of the horse, the antelope, the onager, the gazelle, the hyæna, the African lizard, the hare, the fox, the jerboa, the fennec and the sable. On the other hand, the law forbids eating the mule and the domestic ass ; all quadrupeds and birds that have means of defence such as claws and talons, e.g. the lion, leopard, wolf, bear, elephant, monkey, falcon of any kind, vulture, and eagle ; †as well as the jackal and wild cat. †Forbidden also is any animal which it is recommended to slay, such as a serpent, scorpion, Egyptian crow, kite, rat, and in general any carnivorous animal, and even the rakhama and the baghath. †The harvest crow may lawfully be eaten ; but not the parrot, nor the peacock. One may eat the ostrich, crane, duck, goose, fowl, pigeon—by which term is legally understood any bird that drinks by sucking in the water and that coos—sparrow of any colour and species, e.g. nightingale, bull-finch, starling ; but one may not eat swallows, ants, bees, flies, nor any kind of vermin, such as beetles or worms. All animals born of an animal that can be eaten and of one that cannot are forbidden.

As to those animals about which the law makes no express provision, they can be eaten if well-to-do and respectable Arabs eat them under ordinary circumstances ; but one must abstain from food that such persons regard with abhorrence and eat only in time of famine. Where there is a doubt as to the proper name by which an animal should be described these same persons should be consulted. If even they do not know the proper name of it, it may be called by the name of the animal that is like it.

An animal of any kind is forbidden as food if it eats ordure, and its skin shows traces of this habit. According to others, however, the use of such an animal's skin is merely blameworthy. [†This latter doctrine seems to me to be preferred.] The flesh of such an animal may, however, be eaten when the skin has lost its repulsive quality, through the animal being fed for some time on pure and wholesome food.

It is also forbidden to make use of provisions that have become impure, at least where it is impossible to purify them, or to cut away the contaminated portion, as in the case of liquids, such as vinegar or liquefied date syrup. This principle is carried so far that it is considered blamable to eat food obtained as the wages of some impure labour such as applying leeches or sweeping a house. Such eatables are given, in conformity with the Sonna, to slaves and beasts of burden, not to free men. A foetus found dead in the body of an animal killed in accordance with the precepts of the law may serve as lawful nourishment.

Any one who fears that he will die of inanition, or at least fall dangerously ill, should make use of any sort of eatable, even those most rigorously forbidden, if there is a hope of saving his life by so doing. According, however, to other authorities an individual who fears death from inanition is never obliged to eat forbidden food, he is merely permitted to do so; and if he has near by him eatables that are forbidden, he may in no case partake of more forbidden food than is absolutely necessary to keep him alive. Where there are no eatables not forbidden within reach, he can, according to one authority, eat forbidden food until he is replete; *but most jurists insist that no more may be taken than is absolutely necessary to keep one alive, unless one fears death if the appetite is not completely satisfied. In case of urgency one may even eat a human corpse, or kill an apostate or an infidel not subject to Moslem authority in order to eat him; but one may never kill for this purpose an infidel subject of a Moslem prince, or an infidel minor not so subject, nor an infidel who has obtained a safe-conduct. [†In case of urgency one may kill and eat even a minor or a woman among infidels not subject to Moslem authority.]

A person suffering from hunger who can only find eatables belonging to an absent person, has a right to take them on condition of restoring their equivalent in kind or money; but the owner of eatables who has immediate want of them himself, is not obliged to share them with another suffering from hunger who asks him to do so. Such a sacrifice is even forbidden unless it is a Moslem who makes the request. But the person who is not in immediate want of his own provisions should give to another who asks for food, saying he is suffering from hunger, provided that other is either a Moslem or an infidel subject of one of our princes ; and in case of a refusal the owner may even be forced to comply, under menace of death. Those who use their right to take another's provisions should restore the value immediately, if they have money with them ; but otherwise they should be allowed time for payment. †A person who gives nourishment to a really famished person, without stipulating for any recompense, is considered to have acted from generosity, and can claim nothing for it. A person suffering from hunger who finds a corpse, and at the same time eatables not forbidden but belonging to another, should, according to our school, eat the corpse, rather than take the eatables that do not belong to him. Our school extends this rule even to a person in a state of ihram who finds upon the sacred territory a corpse and a piece of game that he could kill if hunting were not forbidden him. †The law forbids a Moslem to cut off a limb of his body and eat it. [†This act is lawful if one is upon the point of dying of inanition and cannot find even a corpse to eat, and has a better chance of remaining alive by cutting off a bodily member than by braving hunger. But one may in no case cut off a limb of one's own body in order to nourish another person, nor cut off the limb of another person under one's protection in order to nourish oneself.

BOOK 62.—RACING AND SHOOTING COMPETITIONS

THE Somma permits challenges to racing matches or shooting competitions even for a prize. The shooting may lawfully be effected not only with arrows, but according to our school also with javelins, lances, stones, balisters, or other weapon of war. On the other hand, the law forbids challenges to a game of mall on horseback, throwing the ball, swimming, chess, or the game of rings; it forbids also challenges to certain bodily exercises, such as standing upon one foot; and challenges to certain games of chance, as, for instance, guessing the number of the objects held closed in the hand. The law allows challenges as to horse races, *and even as to races of elephants, mules or donkeys; †challenges are forbidden only in case of a flight of birds, or of a fight.

*Challenges to racing matches or shooting competitions become obligatory on both sides once they have been accepted; neither of the parties can then cancel the agreement of his own accord without the other's consent. A person who accepts a challenge cannot withdraw from it, either before acting in prosecution of it or after. And neither the conditions of the challenge, nor the prize, can be altered in any way after it has been accepted.

Essential conditions for a challenge to a racing match are—

1. That both parties are acquainted with the place of departure and the goal of the course.
2. That each has an equal chance with regard to the line travelled and the distance.
3. That it is a matter of certain specified horses, belonging to certain specified persons.
4. That it is possible for either party to reach the goal first.
5. That both know the amount of the prize.

The prize may be offered by one of the parties or by a third person, e.g. the Sovereign. In this last case it is offered in the following words:—“To whichever of you two whose courser arrives first I will give a draft upon the Treasury for so much,” or “I will pay so much.” A prize offered by one of the competitors is in these terms: “If you win this race I will pay you so much,” and one may if one likes add, “and if I win you need not give me anything." The parties are forbidden to offer each other an equal prize, unless a third competitor takes part in the race, without any wager, and his courser is strong enough to rival the coursers of the two parties who have challenged each other. In this last case, however, the law admits the following distinctions :—

1. If the third courser, whose master has offered no prize, reaches the goal first, his master takes the wagers of both the other competitors.
2. If the coursers of the parties who gave the challenge beat the third courser, or if the three arrive together at the goal, no one pays anything.
3. If the third courser reaches the goal at the same time as one of the others, the master of the latter keeps his wager and divides that of the one who has lost with the master of the third courser.
4. If the courser of one of the parties who gave the challenge wins and the courser of the third party comes in second, †the owner of the winning horse takes the wager of the other challenging party.

Where three or more persons challenge one another, the agreement becomes illegal if the second party stipulates for a prize equal to that of the first ; ‡but if the price stipulated by the second person remains lower than that which the first reserves to himself in case of success, the validity of the contract is admitted.

In a camel race the animal whose shoulder first reaches the goal wins the prize ; in a horse race the result depends on whether the neck reaches the goal ; according to some authorities victory is always decided by the forefeet reaching the goal.

In a shooting competition it is necessary to stipulate in advance—

1. Whether it is of the kind called mabadara, where the prize is gained by whoever first hits the mark a certain number of times ; or of the kind called mohatta, where the winner is the man who first hits the mark a certain number of times in excess of his rival.

2. The number of times each person may fire, as a maximum ; and the number of times he must hit the mark.

3. The distance, the length and the breadth of the target, except in case of a habitual known shooting range.

4. What is meant by " hitting the target." Thus it may be agreed that it is enough to hit the target without leaving a mark, or that the projectile must pierce the target without necessarily remaining fixed in it, or that it must remain so fixed, or that it must traverse it. Where not otherwise specified the first of these arrangements is assumed to have been come to.

The prize at a shooting competition is subject to the same rules as in the case of a racing match, both as regards the cases in which it is permitted to be offered, and as regards the conditions that must be satisfied. But it is not necessary to use certain particular bows and arrows, and a clause to that effect would even be null and void. Thus, at any moment a bow or an arrow may be changed for another of the same sort ; and any stipulation interfering with this liberty to change would cause the agreement to become illegal. *It is necessary to stipulate in advance which of the competitors is to shoot first.

Where a great number of competitors wish to take part in the shooting match, it is lawful for two of them to be chosen as chiefs, and for these in their turn to choose the shooters who will form their troop ; but the law does not permit this to be decided by casting lots. When one of the chiefs has placed in the number of the shooters some one he supposed had come to take part in the shooting, but who appears later to have been present at the contest merely by chance, the choice is null and void as regards that individual, and one of the competitors in the rival group must abstain from taking part in the shooting. As to the other individuals chosen to make up the two groups, there is the same divergence of opinion as upon the subject of the combination of an illegal with a valid contract ; but if it is admitted that the choice of the others remains intact, each competitor should be given a right of option, as to whether he desires to adhere to the agreement or to withdraw from it. Even where all declare that they wish to continue the shooting, the agreement is ipso facto dissolved, if no agreement can be come to as to which person shall be eliminated for the individual wrongly chosen by the chief of the opposite troop. In this sort of shooting the prize is shared among the winners in proportion to the number of times they have each hit the mark ; or, according to other authorities, in equal parts.

When special stipulations are made as to what is to be understood by " hitting the mark," arrows that do not hit it in the manner agreed upon do not count ; but it is of no consequence if the shooter when discharging the arrow breaks the bow-string or the bow, or if the arrow hits the mark only by glancing off from some object, unexpectedly presenting itself between the shooter and the target. Even where the wind carries the target away after the arrow has sped, it must be considered to have hit the mark, if it touches the place where the target was at the moment it left the bow. Arrows that miss the mark, either because they glance off from something, or because the target is carried away by the wind, are not counted in favour of the opponent. But if it is agreed that an arrow must remain fixed in the target, an arrow that pierces it and remains fixed there may be counted, even though it afterwards falls out. And it is the same with an arrow that does not pierce the target, because it hits it at some spot of exceptional hardness.

BOOK 63.—OATHS

AN oath creates an obligation for the person uttering it only when there is invoked one of the attributes or qualities of God, e.g. in the phrases “by God,” “by the Master of all created things,” “by Him that lives and never dies,” “by Him in whose hand is my life,” and in general for all expressions employed to designate the supreme being. When one makes use of one of these expressions one may not add a reservation to the effect that one did not intend to take an oath; but if one makes use of an expression which, though it may be used to designate God, may also be used of a human being, such a reservation may be added. Such expressions are “the merciful,” “the creator,” “the nourisher,” “the lord,” etc. Expressions that are strictly applicable both to God and man, such as “being,” “he who exists,” “the wise,” or “he who is in life,” constitute an oath only where such is the intention of the person using them. The use of one of the qualities of God as a substantive, e.g. “by the greatness of God,” “by His glory,” “by His word,” “by His majesty,” “by His knowledge,” “by His power,” or “by His will,” constitute an oath if one had not the intention of designating the knowledge, power, etc., that emanate from him upon men. Thus the expression “by the hakk of God” implies an oath where the word hakk is used in the sense of “justice”; but not where it is used in the sense of “law,” for then it means the religious ceremonies of which God may exact the accomplishment as His right. Arabic prefixes, denoting an oath are bi, wa, ta; it being understood that the prefix ta is only employed with the noun Allah; in default of these prefixes the noun Allah, without distinction between the nominative, the accusative, and the genitive, implies an oath only where such is the intention of the person using it. The words, “I swear” or “I will swear,” “I take oath” or “I will take oath by God that I will do such and such a thing,” constitute an oath whether such is the intention or whether they are pronounced without any special intention. Only when one formally declares that one did not intend to make an oath, but merely to state a present or future fact, one has a presumption in one’s favour that one merely intended to state that fact, and nothing more, and to state it in explicit terms, according to our school. He who says to some one, "By God, I implore you," or "By God, I ask you to do such-and-such a thing," has taken an oath if such was his intention; but it is no oath if he says, "If I did that I am a Jew," or "I abjure Islam," whatever his intention may be. And it is the same where, without thinking of their meaning, one utters words which necessarily imply an oath. But it is of small consequence whether one uses the past tense or the aorist.

It is blamable to take an oath that has not for its special object a work pleasing to God. A person commits a grave sin who takes an oath to neglect an obligatory act of devotion, or to accomplish some forbidden act. In such case he must perjure himself and have recourse to expiation. And the Sonna prescribes expiation to any one who swears to abstain from some commendable act, or to accomplish a blamable action; but in the case of some indifferent act one may have sworn to refrain from or to accomplish, it is always better to keep one's oath. Some authorities, however, prefer even then that a person should perjure himself and have recourse to expiation, on the principle that any oath is blamable when its object is not some work certainly pleasing to God. Where the expiation does not consist in a fast, one may acquit oneself of it in anticipation, before perjuring oneself, in all cases where such perjury is lawful; and even, according to some authorities, where it is forbidden. [†I adopt the doctrine of the latter.]

By virtue of this principle one may acquit oneself of an expiation due for injurious comparison, before resuming cohabitation; or of one due for homicide before the death of the victim; and one may perform the expiation prescribed for the non-fulfilment of a vow before that non-fulfilment has occurred, provided that the vow consists merely in a money obligation.

SECTION 2

A person who owes expiation for perjury may at his choice either enfranchise a slave, of the same quality as one enfranchised to expiate an injurious comparison, or give to each of ten indigent persons a modd of vegetables, forming the principal nourishment of that locality, or clothe them by giving them, e.g. a shirt, a turban, or a cloak, but not boots, a pair of gloves, or a belt. The law does not require that the person receiving the clothes must be able to wear them; and one may give a short pair of trousers to a tall individual, and garments of cotton, linen, or silk indifferently to a man or to a woman, and such old clothes as have not quite lost their utility. A person who cannot perform his expiation in one of these three ways must fast for three days, *not necessarily consecutive; but where this incapacity of performance is only temporary, as when he has property elsewhere, he should wait until the means of performing his expiation reach him, rather than have recourse immediately to a fast. It is understood that a slave cannot impose upon himself a pecuniary expiation, unless his master supplies him with the provisions and clothing necessary for acquitting himself of his obligation, and unless it is admitted that he may become owner. In default of such liberality on the master's part, or when it is not admitted that the slave can ever become owner, and consequently donator, the slave must in all cases have recourse to a fast, provided that this act does not prejudice his work or his health. And in this case the fast can take place without the master's special authorisation only when he has authorised the slave to take the oath and then avoid its fulfilment. But where, on the other hand, these two acts have taken place without previous authorisation the master may object to a fast prejudicial to the slave's work or health. †Where the master has authorised his slave to swear but not to forswear, or vice versâ, it is the authorisation or want of authorisation that decides, according to the principles we have mentioned, whether he can or cannot oppose a prejudicial fast. A partially enfranchised slave, who possesses savings, should acquit himself of his expiation by giving food and clothing, but not by freeing a slave.

SECTION 3

An oath taken e.g. by a tenant "to stop no longer," or "to live no longer" in a house obliges him to quit it immediately, under penalty of becoming perjured if he personally remains in it without lawful excuse. The time required to remove his effects or his family or to dress himself does not constitute a case of perjury. An oath "not to remain as the neighbour of so-and-so in such and such a house" is accomplished by the swearer or his neighbour quitting the house immediately, for even by the house being divided into two by a wall, each part with a separate entrance. An oath "not to enter a certain house," or "not to leave it," uttered when respectively inside or outside, implies no obligation to change one's position; for he who remains where he is neither leaves nor enters. Where, however, the act from which one must abstain does not consist in a simple isolated fact, like entering or leaving a house, but in some continuous course of action, as, for example, when one swears not to marry, or wash, or dress, or ride, or stand up, or sit down while being already married, etc., one becomes perjured by the fact of remaining married, etc. [This rule is a mistake as to marriage or ablution; †and similarly one cannot regard as "perfuming oneself"

the mere fact of not having removed the perfumes with which one had previously scented oneself. The rule is also applicable to an oath not to indulge in coition, not to fast, or not to pray.]

A person who swears not to enter such-and-such a house becomes perjured if he enters the vestibule; and it does not matter whether the vestibule is situated between the door and the rooms, or between the front door and the back door; but there is no breaking of the oath if he enters the arcade in front of the door, or mounts upon the terrace surrounded or not by a wall. Nor is there any breaking of the oath by putting into the house one's hand, head, or foot; but the introduction of both feet supporting the body constitutes a perjury. The prohibition to enter remains intact in the case of a fall of the house, as long as the foundations of the walls are still visible, and then applies to the site. It ceases only when the land has been completely levelled, or when the house has become a place open to the public, such as a mosque or a bath-house, or where the site has become a garden with the outer walls partly left standing as an inclosure.

A person who swears "not to enter Zaid's house" cannot enter a house occupied by Zaid as owner, but may enter one occupied by Zaid as borrower, lodger, or usurper; unless one intended to refer in general to any house inhabited by Zaid, for in that case the prohibition applies to any house which Zaid borrows, rents or usurps. The phrase cited includes also any house of which Zaid is the owner, though not living in it; unless one intended to refer specially to his habitation and not to his ownership. In accordance with the same principles an oath "not to enter Zaid's house" or "not to speak to Zaid's slave" or "wife," ceases to be of effect as regards a house or slave which Zaid has sold, or a wife whom he has repudiated; but where one refers to such-and-such a house, or such-and-such a wife, or such-and-such a slave of Zaid, one is understood to refer to that particular building or person. In that case words indicating that they belong to Zaid merely make the definition more exact. These last quoted expressions would only admit that the validity of the oath should cease with the actual right of property or status of marriage if such was manifestly the intention of the person taking the oath. †An oath "not to enter the house by such-and-such a door" does not prevent one's entering by that door when it has been removed to another place. An oath "not to enter any room" applies to every room, large or small, or any shed made of clay, stone, brick, or wood, and even to a tent; but not to a mosque, a bath-house, a church, or a mountain cave. Similarly, an oath "not to go to Zaid's" is violated by entering the chamber occupied by Zaid in common with another person, at least according to one jurist, unless the person taking the oath intended to visit this person and not Zaid. As to the consequences of a visit to a place where the presence of Zaid was not known there is the same controversy as to whether the violation of an oath by inadvertence constitutes perjury. [*An oath "not to salute Zaid" is violated by saluting a group of men including Zaid, unless he is specially excepted.]

SECTION 4

An oath "not to eat animals' heads," without specifying any particular animals, implies an obligation not to eat the head of any animal whose head is sold separately. This oath does not apply to birds, fish, or game that are ordinarily prepared for food without cutting off the head, unless local custom has introduced the practice of selling separately the heads of these animals. The word "eggs" includes all eggs that are eaten without killing the animal that lays them, such as hen's eggs, ostrich eggs, and pigeon's eggs; but not the eggs of fish, that are only eaten as roe after the fish has been killed; nor locust's eggs, that are not eaten at all unless in the body of the animal that bears them. The word "meat" is used of cattle, horses, game, and birds, but not of fish, nor of fat in the interior of the body, †nor of the intestines, the liver, the spleen, nor the heart. †The word "meat" includes the flesh of the head or the tongue, and the fat of the back and sides. The word "fat" in general does not include the fat upon the back nor on the thighs nor on the hump, parts of the animal's body to which the word "meat" does not apply either. The "fat upon the thighs" may not be confounded with "the fat upon the hump," and where one wishes to indicate both one must use the Arabic word dasam, which signifies all the fat parts of the body and consequently implies not only the fat properly so called, but also the fat upon the back or in the interior of the body. Any expression signifying beef applies also to buffalo meat.

When one indicates wheat and swears "not to eat any," one must abstain from wheat in grains, as well as from wheat in the state of flour or loaf; but when one swears, "I will not eat of this wheat," and utters the word wheat, one need abstain from it only when the grains have been cooked, mixed with fat, or fried; not when flour, a decoction, a paste, or bread, has been made of it. An oath as to "dates freshly gathered" includes neither dry dates nor dates that are not yet ripe, though they may be large enough, and vice versâ. The word "grape" does not include raisins, and vice versâ. †And a person who swears not to eat "these freshly plucked dates" is not obliged to abstain from them when they are dry. Similarly, if he swears "not to speak to such-and-such a young man," he can speak to him all the same when he has become an old one. The word "bread" includes as well wheaten bread as barley bread, or bread made of rice, beans, millet, chick peas, etc., and an oath to abstain from it applies also to bread cut in pieces and dipped in soup. An oath "not to eat of a certain decoction" includes an obligation not to introduce it into the mouth with the tongue or the fingers; but the decoction may freely be drunk when diluted with water. Where, on the other hand, one has used the expression "not to drink the decoction," one may introduce it into the mouth with the tongue or the fingers, but not dilute nor drink it. An oath "not to eat milk" or any other liquid requires abstention from eating bread prepared with milk, but not from drinking milk; an oath "not to drink" the liquid in question requires one to abstain from this act but not from eating bread prepared with the liquid. An oath "not to eat butter" is violated by eating it upon one's bread either in a solid or a liquid state, but not by drinking it in a liquid state, nor by eating it in the preparation called asida, unless the butter is manifestly apparent. The word "fruit" (fakiha) includes dates, grapes, pomegranates, and citrons, either immediately after plucking, or dried. [It is the same with lemons and lotus-fruit, melons and pistachio nuts or filberts. On the other hand, the word "fakiha" does not include cucumbers, nor egg-plants, nor parsnip; while the word "thamar," though a synonym of fakiha, does not include dried fruits.

A person who speaks of melons, dates, or nuts, and nothing more, is not understood to refer to those called "Indian," i.e. water-melons, tamarinds, and coco-nuts. In "foodstuffs" are included both the principal nourishment and also fruit, seasoning, and cakes. An oath "not to eat of a certain cow" only applies to the flesh, but not to the calf nor to the milk; a similar oath with regard to a "tree" includes only the fruit, and not the leaves nor the ends of the branches.

SECTION 5

An oath "not to eat such-and-such a date" is not violated when that date is mixed with other dates, and one eats all but one date, without knowing exactly whether it is the date in question. On the other hand, an oath "to eat such-and-such a date" can only be accomplished by eating all the dates with which it is mixed; and an oath "to eat such-and-such a pomegranate" by eating all the pips. If one swears "not to wear these two coats" one becomes perjured by doing so either at once or one after the other, but one need have no fear in wearing one. To render such an act unlawful it would be necessary to have said "neither this coat nor that coat."

An oath "to eat certain food to-morrow" has no consequence if the person who takes it dies before the time comes ; but if he dies, or if the food is destroyed, upon the day on which he should have kept his oath, it is necessary to make the following distinction :—

1. In a case where the person's death or the loss of the food takes place at an hour by which he could already have eaten it, he becomes perjured, even though the day be not entirely passed by.

2. In a case where the person's death or the loss of the food takes place at an hour by which the person in question has not been able to eat the food there exists the same controversy as about a person who becomes perjured in consequence of some violence used towards him.

Where the person taking the oath is himself the cause of the loss of the food before the time indicated, either by eating it or in any other manner he has ipso facto failed to fulfil his obligation. Here one must again decide in accordance with the principles relating to violence when the food is lost accidentally or by the fault of a third party before the expiry of the time. An oath in the following terms : “ I will pay you your debt at the beginning of next month ” obliges the debtor to pay at sunset on the last day of the current month ; but the oath is violated by an anticipated payment, or if the debtor allows to pass by, after the sunset, an interval in which he might have acquitted his engagement. However, one is not perjured if in these circumstances one has begun to measure out the articles promised, even though the quantity does not admit of the operation being finished in a short time.

An oath “ not to speak ” does not prevent one exclaiming, “ Praise to God,” nor does it prevent a recitation of the Koran ; but a person who swears “ not to speak to so-and-so,” violates his oath by merely saluting him. Shafii, however, in his second period, did not consider as a violation the fact of writing him a letter, or sending him a message, or pointing him out with the hand. This oath does not permit one to intimate to such person what one wants by reciting a verse of the Koran, unless this act is accomplished with the single intention of making a recitation.

An oath to the effect “ that so-and-so has no property ” means that the individual in question possesses nothing at all of any value, not even the coat he wears, nor a slave to be enfranchised by will, nor a slave whose enfranchisement depends upon a condition, nor an object he has bequeathed to another person, nor a debt due for to become due. †On the other hand, this oath is not violated by the circumstance that the individual in question has a slave undergoing enfranchisement by contract, i.e. one who has ceased to be marketable.

An oath to “ beat so-and-so ” is accomplished by any act constituting “ a blow,” without its being necessary that the patient should experience any pain, unless one added the adverb "soundly." The mere fact, however, of touching the patient's body with a whip cannot be considered as a blow, nor merely biting him, nor partly strangling him, nor tearing out his hair, nor even, according to some authorities, giving him a buffet or pushing him away. An oath "to inflict upon some one one hundred lashes with a whip" is fulfilled by inflicting a single blow with one hundred whips or batons bound together, or with a bough with a hundred branches, provided only that one is certain that each whip and branch has touched, or at least that all together, one upon another, have contributed to the sufferer's pain. [In case of doubt it should be admitted that all the whips, batons, or branches have had their effect; this is Shafi's personal opinion.] Where, on the other hand, the oath was to the effect that one would go and beat the patient one hundred times one may not limit oneself to a single blow in this way.

If one swears to the effect that "I will not leave you until the payment of my debt," one is not perjured if the debtor runs away and one is not able to pursue him. [††Even if one can pursue the debtor one is not obliged to do so, and one does not become perjured by allowing him to escape.] For an oath in these terms only obliges one not to separate from the debtor; not to stop when he walks on; not to remit the debt if one is walking with him; not to quit him, even after transferring the debt to a third party, or after the debtor is declared bankrupt, and even though in this latter case it should be in order to allow him to put his affairs in order. On the other hand, one can always leave the debtor after the debt has been paid. It matters little then if one discovers afterwards that one has not received all that one might claim, e.g. if the debtor has given things of inferior quality, though of the stipulated kind. Where the creditor accepts articles of another kind, but not knowingly, there is the same controversy as to becoming perjured by inadvertence.

An oath to bring to the knowledge of the judge any blamable act to which one may be a witness is violated if the person bound by it, on seeing a bad action committed, omits to bring a complaint before the court, though he is able to do so; and if he dies before repairing his neglect. By the word "judge" is understood the judge of the locality, for one cannot bring the matter before another court; but one may bring it before the successor of the man who was the judge at the time, in case of the death or dismissal of the latter. Where, on the other hand, one does not say "before the judge," but "before a judge," one may bring the case in any court. The expression "before such-and-such a judge" admits of a distinction—

1. It may mean "before so-and-so, as long as he is a judge." In this case one becomes perjured, if, upon seeing some blamable action, one does not bring it to the knowledge of the judge indicated, though one is able to do so, even though the judge may be subsequently dismissed. If it is impossible to bring the matter before the judge while he remains in office, one is then in the same position as a person perjured in consequence of some violence.

2. It may mean the judge personally and not officially. In this case the matter should be brought before him even after his dismissal.

SECTION 6

A person who swears "not to sell" or "not to buy" should abstain from selling or buying, whether upon his own account or for another; but he may sell or buy through an agent. Similarly an oath not to "give in marriage" or "repudiate" or "enfranchise" or "beat" is no obstacle to doing these things through an agent, unless one intended to say that one would not do these things either personally or through a third party. On the other hand, an oath "not to marry" prevents marriage by proxy, but does not prevent one accepting a woman in marriage as agent for a third party. An oath not to sell Zaid's things refers only to a sale with Zaid's consent. An oath "not to make a donation to Zaid" is not violated by offering him something he does not accept, †or something he accepts but does not take possession of; but such an oath prevents giving him a life interest, or a donation revocable at the donor's death, or a charitable gift. On the other hand, one may lend or bequeath him something, or even immobilise property in his favour. ‡A man who swears "not to give some one an alms," is not perjured by making him a donation properly so called. A person swearing "not to eat the provisions Zaid has just bought," may eat those purchased by Zaid jointly with another person. †And it is the same if the expression is "provisions" instead of "the provisions." Such an oath refers not only to a sale properly so called but also to a sale by advance. Where food bought by Zaid is mixed with food bought by another, eating the mixture does not involve perjury unless one is certain to have really taken food bought by Zaid. And an oath "not to enter the house Zaid has just bought" does not include a house acquired by Zaid in virtue of his right of redemption.

BOOK 64.—VOWS

SECTION 1

Vows are of two kinds—

1. A vow with a penalty, consisting, e.g., in the following words :—“ If I speak to him I engage before God to fast,” or “ to enfranchise a slave.” If not kept this vow obliges the person formulating it to accomplish the expiation prescribed for perjury, or, according to one authority, to accomplish the expiatory action promised. A single authority gives the person who owes expiation a choice between the expiation for perjury and the expiatory act promised. [†It is to this latter doctrine I give the preference, as do the jurists of Irak.] On the other hand, a person who says, “ If I enter such-and-such a house I engage to perform the expiation prescribed for perjury, need only undergo the expiation for perjury.

2. A vow of gratitude, consisting in an engagement towards God to acquit oneself of some good work in the hope of obtaining from Him some favour or of avoiding some calamity. This vow may be formulated, for example, in the following terms :—“ If God heals my sickness I engage to accomplish before Him such-and-such an act,” or “ I engage to perform such-and-such an action.” A promise such as this should be accomplished if the event hoped for takes place, i.e. if the condition is fulfilled. *The accomplishment of the promise is obligatory even where it is not made dependent upon a condition, for example, if one says, “ I engage before God to fast.”

A vow may not have for its object an action that is unjust or that is already obligatory. A person who vows to perform some indifferent action, or to abstain from it, need not keep his engagement, provided he acquits himself of the expiation for perjury, at least according to the theory which is to be preferred.

Where one vows to fast for several days it is commendable to do this as soon as possible. One may even fast for the promised number of days separately as well as together, unless a special restriction was made as to this. A vow to fast for a specified year renders a fast obligatory during the whole of this year, with the exception of the days of the great annual festivals, and of the days called ayyam at tashrik ; and it is understood of course that the fast of the month of Ramadan must be accomplished as it is by everybody, without its being afterwards necessary to repeat it by way of reparation for the month thus deducted from the vow. *When a woman makes such a vow, but is obliged to break her fast in consequence of menstruation or lochia, she must make up subsequently for the days thus lost. [*This precept is not obligatory, in the opinion of most authorities.] The vow in question involves, however, the obligation to accomplish afterwards every other day of fasting lost without this being caused by force majeure. And the reader should also be informed that the believer need not begin a new fast of a whole year when he accomplishes afterwards in this way the days of fasting that have been lost, †unless he has expressly announced that the days of fasting are to be uninterrupted.

A vow to fast for a year, without specifying what year, admits of the following distinctions :—

1. Even in the case where one promises to observe the days of the fast without interruption, it does not lose its validity by the intercalation of the obligatory fast of Ramadan, nor by the forced interruption of the days of the two great annual festivals, and of the days called ayyam at tashrik, during which fasting is not permitted. But all the fasting days not kept should be made up for during the next year by an equal number of consecutive days. Nor is this fast invalidated by an interruption consequent upon menstruation ; though it is true that there is upon this subject the same divergence of opinion we have mentioned already with regard to a similar interruption of a vow to fast during a specified year.

2. Where the vow does not make any mention of an uninterrupted succession of days the difficulties mentioned under No. 1 do not exist, and the fast lasts only for a lunar year, i.e. for 360 days chosen at those periods which are most convenient with regard to one's other duties to God.

A vow “to fast every Monday” does not oblige one to fast over again for the Mondays in Ramadan, nor for the Mondays upon which the fasting is suspended in consequence of the two festivals or the days called ayyam-at-tashrik. But where, on the other hand, it is a question of the Mondays belonging to the period during which one has to fast for two consecutive months by way of expiation, one must then make up for the Mondays not observed. A single authority does not admit this theory in a case where the obligatory expiation was antecedent to the vow. [*It is the doctrine maintained by this latter jurist that I prefer.] *In the case of a vow of this kind a woman should make up later for the Mondays upon which the fast is interrupted by menstruation or lochia.

A vow "to fast upon a certain day" cannot be regarded as properly observed if the fast is anticipated. A person who makes a vow to fast upon a certain day of a certain week, and then forgets the day of observance, should fast upon the last possible day of that week, i.e. the Friday. This fast can then be taken into account as an act of devotion accomplished too late, if it should transpire that the specified day was not a Friday. ††And a supererogatory fast becomes obligatory for whoever makes a vow to complete, while he is accomplishing it. A vow "to fast for a part of a day" has no legal consequences, though, according to some authorities one should fast then for a whole day. *A vow to fast "the day of Zaid's arrival" should be accomplished, unless Zaid arrives during the night or the day of one of the two annual festivals, or in the month of Ramadan, for in these cases the vow is considered as void. The arrival of Zaid upon a day upon which one has already broken one's fast, or begun another fast one had vowed to perform, obliges one to fast another day. And it is the same if Zaid arrives upon a day when one is already engaged in performing some supererogatory fast. Some authorities, however, maintain that in this latter case one need only terminate the fast already begun, which then counts for the fast one vowed to observe. When one utters the following vow:—"If Zaid arrives I will fast the day after his arrival, and if Amr arrives I will fast the first Thursday after his arrival," and both Zaid and Amr arrive on the same Wednesday, the fast is put off for a day, that is to say, one fasts on Thursday for the arrival of Zaid, and afterwards on another day for that of Amr.

SECTION 2

A vow "to walk to the holy temple of Mecca" or "to go there" renders it obligatory, according to our rite, to accomplish the pilgrimage or the visit; with this one difference that a vow "to go there" does not necessarily imply going on foot. *Walking is obligatory only if one has formulated a vow to "walk to the holy temple," or "to accomplish either the pilgrimage or the visit on foot." Where this last-mentioned expression is made use of, it is enough to begin walking on placing oneself in a state of ihram; †but if one says, "I will walk to the holy temple," the journey must be made on foot from the place where one has left one's family. This journey on foot does not prevent the believer taking a ride, *if he cannot otherwise continue his journey, or even if he allow himself this convenience without valid excuse. *But in either case he must make up for his fault by an expiatory sacrifice. This pilgrimage or this visit that one has vowed to accomplish should be made in person unless the pilgrim is physically incapable of going to Mecca, in which case he may be replaced by an agent. In any case it is commendable to acquit oneself of the journey as soon as possible. If a person puts the journey off and is surprised by death before he has accomplished it, though he was capable of doing so, the law prescribes that the cost of sending an agent to perform the pilgrimage or the visit must be borne by the estate. A vow "to accomplish the pilgrimage in a particular year" obliges the person taking the oath to accomplish it during the year specified, if this is possible; and if he is prevented from doing this by sickness, he must acquit himself of it subsequently. *But the law requires nothing of this sort where the preventing cause is wholly objective, e.g. a state of war. As to a prayer or a fast one has vowed to accomplish on a particular day or at a particular hour, one must always acquit oneself of it afterwards if prevented, whether the cause be sickness or a state of war.

A vow "to sacrifice a victim," without anything else, implies that one must conduct the victim to Mecca and give it to the proper persons there; but where one has specially mentioned that the victim must be given to the proper persons in a particular locality, the victim must be sacrificed there. On the other hand, a vow "to fast" does not imply that the fast must be accomplished in the place where the vow is taken. And the same is the case with a vow to accomplish a prayer, unless it is uttered in the great mosque at Mecca, or, according to one authority, in that of Medina or that of Jerusalem. [*These two mosques are, so far as regards this subject, to be regarded exactly in the same way as that of Mecca.]

A vow "to fast," and nothing else, obliges one to fast for a single day only; while that "to fast for a few days" implies a fast of at least three days.

A vow of "an alms" is accomplished by a gift of anything. A vow to accomplish "a prayer" implies two rakas, or, according to one jurist, a single one, even without adding the kiyam. This act is, on the other hand, obligatory in each raka, according to the authorities who insist upon two, unless the believer is unable to accomplish it.

A vow to "enfranchise a slave" means a slave capable of being enfranchised by way of expiation, or, according to one authority, any slave. [*It is the latter who is right.]

Where one has vowed to enfranchise "an infidel slave with redhibitory defects one may acquit oneself of one's vow by the enfranchisement of an infidel slave exempt from such defects, unless the particular defects have been specially mentioned. By virtue of this same principle one cannot remain seated when making a prayer, if one has vowed to accomplish it standing ; but the contrary is quite lawful. One must adhere rigorously to the terms of one's vow with regard to a recitation of the Koran for a certain lapse of time, or of a certain chapter of the Koran, or with regard to a public prayer. ††One may promise, by way of a vow, to perform any work, provided it be one agreeable to God, and not an obligatory act, such as looking after a sick person, making a salutation, or accompanying a funeral to the grave.

BOOK 65.—ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

CHAPTER I.—GENERAL PROVISIONS

SECTION 1

THE Moslem community is collectively responsible for the administration of justice. A Moslem who feels himself specially capable of exercising the functions of a judge, should solicit those functions ; but any individual may accept these duties if the Sovereign entrusts them to him, even though some other individual may be more capable than he. Some jurists, however, have thrown doubt upon this rule. But in such a case it is undoubtedly blamable to solicit the function of judge ; and some authorities even go further and wholly forbid any such solicitation. Where one considers oneself not inferior to another in juridical capacity, one may, it is universally agreed, accept the position of judge ; it is even commendable to solicit it where, being learned but obscure, one hopes in this way to be able to make one's light shine for the good of humanity, or create for oneself a respectable social position. [††Solicitation is always blamable, except in case of eminent capacity.] To know whether one has special aptitudes for the magistracy, it is only necessary to compare oneself with the other inhabitants of the district.

A judge must be Moslem, adult, sane, free, male, of irreproachable character ; sound of hearing, sight, and speech ; educated, and enjoying a certain degree of authority in matters of law. Such an authority can be attributed only to one who understands the Koran and the Sonna, and all the texts relating to jurisprudence ; and who knows, moreover, whether these texts have a general or special significance ; whether they are or are not still in need of explanation ; whether they abrogate other texts, or are themselves abrogated by later ones ; whether a certain tradition is or is not based upon an uninterrupted line of reporters ; whether the origin of a tradition goes back to the companions of the Prophet, or only to the first generation after him ; and whether the authority of the reporters is strong or weak. A person wishing to obtain a certain amount of authority in matters of law should also know—

1. The Arabic language, both as to the employment of words and as to grammatical rules ; and also the opinions of jurists, beginning with the companions of the Prophet.

2. Whether these opinions are in harmony with one another, or if there is some divergence between them.

3. The reasonings upon which these opinions are based.

Where, however, there is no one fulfilling these requirements, the Sultan may, if necessary, appoint as judge an individual of notorious misconductor one absolutely incompetent, in order to decide a particular question. It is then admitted, so far as regards that case, that the decisions of the individual so appointed are regarded as final, provided only that he has been nominated by a prince really invested with supreme authority.

The Sovereign is recommended to authorise a person appointed judge to choose his own substitute. Where, however, this authorisation has been formally refused him, a judge has no right to choose his own substitute ; and where nothing has been said about it he may only choose one for the cases he is unable to decide personally, not for the others. The substitute must possess the same qualifications as the ordinary judge, unless he has been designated for some special duty, e.g. the hearing of witnesses. In this latter case only the qualifications necessary for that particular duty can be insisted on. A substitute who enjoys a certain amount of authority in matters of law may decide cases himself ; but otherwise he should in all cases refer to the authority of the jurist whose opinions he has embraced ; and one has no right to give him any other instructions.

All proceedings may be compounded, except where penalties are incurred for offences against God, i.e. unremissible penalties, provided that the arbitrator is a man capable of exercising the functions of judge. A single authority does not admit arbitration ; while others limit it to cases where there is no judge in the locality, and yet others to proceedings that only involve pecuniary consequences and so deny its legality in disputes as to the penalty of talion, marriage, etc. In no case, however, is an arbitration of effect as against third parties. Thus, even where a composition is admitted on the part of a person guilty of homicide, the arbitral decision cannot be enforced against his aakila for the price of blood. Either party may revoke his offer of composition so long as the arbitrator has not pronounced his decision ; *but once this has been done no one's approval is necessary for the execution of the judgment.

The Sovereign may appoint two judges in the same district, either nominating each one to special judicial functions, or to a particular portion of the locality, or for a particular time or for a certain kind of proceedings ; or nominating both of them to the same functions, except that it is not lawful to order them to give judgment together.

SECTION 2

Lunacy or unconsciousness on the part of the judge, or loss of sight or of any of the intellectual or moral qualifications required, or carelessness or forgetfulness, has the consequence of annulling his decrees ; †and it is the same where he is of notorious misconduct. †A judge who becomes incompetent for one of these reasons cannot resume his duties of his own accord, even where the cause of his incompetence has ceased to exist.

The Sovereign may dismiss any judge who appears to him to be incapable of performing his duties ; or even a judge who is in every respect capable, if he can find one still more capable. Where the Sovereign has found an individual neither more nor less capable than the actual judge, he may, nevertheless, effect the change if it be for the public interest, or if, for instance, he hopes thereby to appease a sedition. †And the dismissal of a judge has full legal validity in spite of its being in contravention of the principles we have mentioned. According to our school the dismissal of a judge has effect from the moment he is informed of it. Thus where the Sovereign writes to him, " Consider yourself dismissed from the moment you have read this letter," the judge is dismissed, not only when he reads the letter himself, †but also when another person reads it to him.

A person specially nominated by a judge for some particular judicial duty, e.g. the sale of the property of a deceased person, ceases ipso facto to be so authorised, either upon the death or upon the destitution of the judge who nominated him. And it is the same in the case of a substitute, if the Sovereign had not empowered the judge to choose one ; or if the authorisation was given in the following terms, " You may choose a substitute of your own accord," or without mentioning if the substitute was to be appointed by the Sovereign or the judge. Where, on the other hand, the authorisation is to the effect that the judge may take a substitute, but the latter's authority is to be derived from the Sovereign alone, the substitute remains in the exercise of his duties in spite of the death or dismissal of the judge who nominated him. The death of the Sovereign does not ipso facto involve the dismissal of the judges appointed by him ; nor does the death of the judge involve the dismissal of the persons he has charged with the administration of the property of orphans, or of wakafs.

A judge who has been dismissed no longer enjoys a legal presumption in favour of the truth of his words, where he wishes to establish by a simple declaration the contents of a judgment he delivered before his dismissal; ††and a declaration of this nature from him is no longer accepted in evidence, even though confirmed by the testimony of another witness. But a dismissed judge may depose as an ordinary witness to prove the existence of a legally delivered arbitration award. A judge who is not yet dismissed may establish by his mere declaration the contents of the judgments he has delivered; provided always, however, that these judgments were within his competence, for otherwise he should be considered in the matter as a judge already dismissed.

Where, after his dismissal, a judge is accused of pronouncing an unjust pecuniary award, either because he was bribed or because, for example, he has accepted as sufficient the evidence of two slaves, legal proceedings should be taken against him for damages. An accusation is even admissible, and a summons may be issued, upon the evidence accepted by the judge, e.g. the deposition of two slaves, without the plaintiff having to plead that he has suffered any pecuniary loss; though according to some authorities the dismissed judge can only be summoned where this is the case, unless the facts alleged have already been proved. †If, when he is accused, the judge appears in person and denies the charge, the presumption is in his favour without his taking an oath. [†He does not enjoy this presumption unless he takes an oath.]

The accusation of a magistrate in the exercise of his functions, implying deceit or fraud upon his part, is never admissible, unless the facts alleged have been already proved.

In every proceeding against a judge, even when not amounting to an accusation; his functions should be performed by his substitute, and the case should, if necessary, be transferred to the court of another district.

SECTION 3

An appointment of a judge by the Sovereign should not only be drawn up in writing, but must be before two witnesses, who should accompany the new judge to his district in order to prove the authenticity of his appointment. †Public notoriety, however, is sufficient as to this authenticity; but our school never admits in any case the nomination of a judge by means of an ordinary letter.

The new judge should begin by making inquiries as to the learned jurists and persons of irreproachable character in the principal town of his district; he should make his entry there upon a Monday; and
